

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. AMERICAN LAW REPORTS ANNOTATED

VOL. 20

MRS. G. I. ELDRIDGE, Respt.,
v.
ENDICOTT, JOHNSON, & COMPANY et al., Appts.
STATE INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION, Respt.

Workmen's compensation — necessity of evidence — statutory presumption.

1. A provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act that it shall be presumed that a claim comes within the provision of the statute does not authorize an award, in the absence of at least some evidence, that an employee who dies of anthrax, after working about hides with a cut upon his neck, might, with his cut, have taken anthrax while at work about the hides.

— admission of counsel — effect.

2. A statement of counsel in a proceeding before the compensation commission, in response to a suggestion by opposing counsel that he should concede a certain fact, that he does not know much about the case and is not going to concede anything that should not be conceded, cannot be accepted as an admission of a fact which should have been proven to sustain an award.

Evidence — judicial notice — presence of anthrax germ.

3. The compensation commission cannot take judicial notice, or presume, that hides with which an employee was working when he contracted anthrax were of a kind that usually or frequently contain anthrax germs, and that a person working about them with an open wound would receive the germ and die of anthrax.

(Cardozo and Pound, JJ., dissent.)

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming an award by the State Industrial Commission.

dustrial Commission to claimant, of compensation for the death of her husband, in a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Walter L. Glenney, with Mr. Bertrand L. Pettigrew, for appellants:

The death of the deceased was not caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment within the intention of the legislature as expressed in the Workmen's Compensation Law.

Hiers v. Hull, 178 App. Div. 350, 164 N. Y. Supp. 767; Sherwood v. Johnson [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 57; Steel v. Cammell, L. & Co. [1905] 2 K. B. 237, 74 L. J. K. B. N. S. 610, 53 Week. Supp. 957.

Mr. E. C. Aiken, with Mr. Charles D. Newton, Attorney General, for respondent State Industrial Commission:

It is conceded that the deceased employee died of anthrax, and it is a reasonable inference that the anthrax germ entered the cut in the neck while in the course of his employment.

Hart v. Wilson & Co. 227 N. Y. 554, 124 N. E. 898; Higgins v. Campbell & Harrison [1904] 1 K. B. 328, 73 L. J. K. B. N. S. 158, 68 J. P. 193, 52 Week. Rep. 195, 86 L. T. N. S. 660, 20 Times L. R. 129, 6 W. C. C. 1.

The contraction of anthrax is an accident for which the State Industrial Commission may make compensation.

Mr. John Marcey, Jr., with Mr. Laverne M. Twining, for respondent:

The death of the deceased was caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, within the intent and meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Law.

Horrigan v. Post-Standard Co. 224 N. Y. 620, 121 N. E. 872; Hart v. Wilson & Co. 227 N. Y. 554, 124 N. E. 898; Plass v. Central New England R. Co. 169 App. Div. 826, 155 N. Y. Supp. 854.

Crane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On November 20, 1915, William Eldridge died, leaving a wife and four children. He lived in the village of Endicott, Broome county, New York, and worked for Endicott, Johnson, & Company, as subforeman of a freight gang at one of their tanneries. The cause of Eldridge's death was anthrax, and the claim is that he contracted it in the course of his employment, while working about the hides at the tannery. The evidence to sustain this claim presented to the commission showed that Eldridge, in November of 1915, had been cut in the neck while being shaved by the barber of the village, and that a pimple appeared after the cut had healed over. The wife pricked this with a needle, and applied a poultice of sugar and Octagon soap, and covered it with a cloth which went around his neck. At that time the neck was not swollen. This was on the 17th of the month. He went to work, and when he returned at night his neck was swollen, and three days thereafter he died of anthrax as stated.

Eldridge's work was counting hides as they were unloaded at the freight cars. The hides were called dry Ceará hides from Southern Mexico and South American countries. Some of the employees noticed that Eldridge's neck was swollen while he was at work. Solely upon this evidence, the commission found as follows: "On or about November 17, 1915, the day when the symptoms of anthrax first appeared, William Eldridge was working for his employer at the tannery above mentioned. On November 16, 1915, while being shaved at a public barber shop in Endicott, New York, William Eldridge's neck was slightly cut with a razor. The reasonable inference is that he contracted anthrax in the course of his employment. He died as a result of said anthrax November 20, 1915."

No evidence was given as to the nature of anthrax, whether hides such as those in question have anthrax bacteria, and whether and in what manner it may be transmitted to men. The commission has presumed that, because Eldridge had a cut or pimple, worked in a tannery about hides, and died of anthrax, he must have received the injury in the course of his employment. On this appeal it is said by the respondent that the employer conceded that the deceased got the anthrax germ at his work. We do not so read the record. Mr. Phillips asked the appellants' lawyer if he conceded that Eldridge received anthrax in his work. The lawyer replied, "He got a cut outside of his work, and it is supposed he got the anthrax germ at his work," to which the claimant's lawyer said, "You ought to concede that he got the anthrax germ at his work," and to this the other attorney answered, "I do not know much about this case; I am not going to concede anything that should not be conceded."

Workmen's compensation—admission of counsel—effect.

This cannot be accepted as an admission of a fact which should have been proved to sustain the award.

We do not think this is a case where the commission were justified in taking judicial notice, or in presuming, that hides such as those in question usually or frequently contain anthrax germs, and that a person working about them with an open wound is likely to receive the germ and die of anthrax.

Evidence—
judicial notice —presence of

It has been held that glanders is not a disease so frequently taken by man as to permit the court to take judicial notice of its character. State use of Hartlove v. M. Fox & Son, 79 Md. 514, 24 L.R.A. 679, 47 Am. St. Rep. 424, 29 Atl. 601. And yet instances have arisen where death resulted from glanders acquired from a horse. Richardson v. Greenberg, 188 App. Div. 248, 176 N. Y. Supp. 651. In Webster's Dictionary anthrax is defined to be "an infectious, and usually fatal, bacterial disease of animals, especially cattle and sheep, and occasionally of man, to whom it may be transmitted by inoculation."

In the absence of all proof upon the subject the commission was not justified in presuming that the hides in question had anthrax, and that the germ could pass to a person working about them; in other words, the commission could not take judicial notice of the nature of these skins, or their susceptibility to anthrax, or the method or likelihood of inoculation by an employee. Some evidence should have been given upon these matters to justify the assumption and finding made.

Section 21 of the Workmen's Compensation Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 67) is not a substitute for facts, and does not help the claimant in this particular. The commission is not authorized to make an award under this section, in the absence of at least some evidence that the employee might, with his cut, have taken anthrax while at work about the hides. Collins v. Brooklyn Union

Gas Co. 171 App. Div. 381, 156 N. Y. Supp. 957.

If this employee had been inoculated through the cut in his neck with anthrax germs from the hides, and the cut had been received a few days before at the barber shop while being shaved, a question might arise as to whether the inoculation were an accidental personal injury arising out of the course of his employment.

We do not reach this question, and shall not attempt to decide it, as the facts of the case are not substantiated by any evidence, and the matter must be sent back to the commission for a rehearing.

The order of the Appellate Division and the determination of the Industrial Commission should be reversed, and the claim remitted to the Commission for rehearing, with costs to abide event.

Hiscock, Ch. J., and Chase, Collin, and Andrews, JJ., concur.

Concisely stated, this annotation purports to deal with the cases passing on the weight and sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a finding that the diseased condition of an applicant under the workmen's compensation law is the result of, or attributable to, his employment. A liberal interpretation has been given to the word "disease," and many cases are included, involving an injury which is not, strictly speaking, a disease, but belongs to a class frequently so termed by the courts and text-writers. As illustrative of this class of physical ailments may be mentioned "hernia" and "insanity." The particular point under discussion is whether or not the evidence in a given case is sufficient to show that a disease from which an applicant is suffering is the result of his employment. This excludes the closely related question, whether the evidence is sufficient to show that the disease arose out of and in the course of the employment, and also the disputed question whether a disease is an accident within the meaning of the act. In other words, this annotation is not concerned with the question whether a disease admittedly originating in the course of the employment is such an accident as is contemplated by the workmen's compensation acts, but, conceding that it is such an accident, discusses whether it did in fact result from, and was attributable to, the employment, and not to some cause wholly disconnected from the employment. However, it is sometimes difficult to determine whether a case is concerning itself primarily with the sufficiency of the evidence to show that an ascertained cause of disease arose out of and in the course of the employment, or with the sufficiency of the evidence to show that the diseased condition was attributable to the employment. Doubtful or border-line cases have been included.

No attempt has been made to classify the cases according to the general rules governing the weight and sufficiency of the evidence, though it may be said generally that those principles apply to proceedings under the workmen's compensation acts. Thus, as a general rule, the burden of furnishing evidence from which the inference can be legitimately drawn that a disease was the result of an injury which arose out of and in the course of the employment is said to rest on the claimant, and an award which is based on mere surmise or conjecture will be set aside. The facts may be shown with sufficient certainty, however, by circumstantial evidence, and it has been frequently said that if there is any evidence in its support the finding will not be disturbed. 28 R. C. L. 812.

However, an arrangement of the cases according to these general rules would be of little value, as the courts frequently reach contrary conclusions on practically the same state of facts, though applying the same rule of law. In the final analysis, the point under discussion resolves itself into a determination whether a given state of facts was, or was not, sufficient to support a particular finding. Accordingly no attempt has been made to arrange the cases with respect to the rules governing the weight and sufficiency of evidence, but the facts in each case, and the holding of the court thereon, have been set out in detail, and the cases arranged with respect to the particular disease involved. It may be said, however, that while the general rules pertaining to the weight and sufficiency of evidence are applicable to cases arising under the workmen's compensation acts, both the courts and administrative authorities, having the beneficent purpose of the acts in view, have been most liberal in construing them, holding that claims thereunder need not be made out with the same exactness of proof required in actions in other cases.

The purpose of these laws is further evidenced, in some instances, by specific provisions of the statutes creating presumptions in favor of the applicant. Thus, in some instances, it is provided generally in the acts that it shall be presumed that claims come within the act, in the absence of substantial evidence to the contrary. This is true of the New York statute, but this presumption does not relieve the claimant from the necessity of establishing his claim by some legal evidence. See the reported case (ELDRIDGE v. ENDICOTT, J. & Co. ante, 1). Other statutes provide that particular diseases contracted in specific employments shall be deemed to have been due to the nature of that employment, unless the employer proves the contrary. The English statute contains such a provision, and it has been held that an award in favor of a claimant will be sustained although there is no direct evidence that the claimant came in contact with materials likely to contain the germs of the disease contracted, the evidence of employment in the particular work, together with the contraction of the particular disease coupled by statute with work of that nature, being sufficient. Meadows v. Ellerman Lines [1920; C. A.] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 544, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1234, 13 B. W. C. C. 227, [1920] W. N. 305, 36 Times L. R. 847, 64 Sol. Jo. 698, 150 L. T. Jo. 71, 124 L. T. N. S. 65, [1920] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 207. The effect of the application of these and similar provisions in the workmen's compensation acts to a particular state of facts is treated in detail under the specific diseases set out infra.

II. Illustrations.

A workman employed by a milling company was engaged in the work of grinding and sacking wheat and barley for feed. While actively engaged in filling sacks with the pulverized grain from the spout of the grinding mill, he became afflicted with an affection of the nose and mouth which was diagnosed as actinomycosis. The medical testimony was in conflict as to the nature and causes of the disease, and as to whether it could be conveyed by grain to the human organism, but some of the physicians who treated the applicant and diagnosed his case testified in effect that his employment in and about the grain caused him to contract the disease. The applicant testified that he had not theretofore suffered from any such disorder, but that it had become acutely developed while he was engaged in the work of sacking and handling the grain for his employer. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to support a finding that the disease was attributable to his employment. Hartford Acci. & Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 32 Cal. App. 481, 163 Pac. 225.

b. Aneurism.

A workman and another man were engaged in unloading steel sheets from a car. Each sheet weighed from 465 to 485 pounds, and was moved by means of a crane. The sheets stood on edge in the car, and sometimes became jammed together so that their separation required a great deal of physical effort. The morning of his injury, the workman came to his work feeling well. Later he was seen to put his hand to his throat, to stagger, and to complain of feeling sick. He was found to be suffering from an aneurism of which the medical evidence was to the effect that the strain was the exciting or aggravating cause. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding that he suffered personal injuries by accident "arising out of and in the course of the employment." Haskell & B. Car Co. v. Brown (1917) 67 Ind. App. 178, 117 N. E. 555.

There were two accidents, one in October, when a workman fell into an excavation and sustained bruises of the chest and ribs; the second in November, when he fell dead while doing some heavy lifting. After the first accident he was examined by the employer's physician, who found heart irregularity and aneurism of the aorta. The trial court inclined to the view that the accident in October produced a condition that brought on the decedent's death under the strain of November, although he held that it could reasonably be found that the strain of November, in his diseased condition, was the cause of death, and therefore found that the workman came to his death by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. The latter theory was held to be sufficiently sustained, and the finding was affirmed. Winter v. Atkinson-Frizelle Co. (1915) 88 N. J. L. 401, 96 Atl. 360.

A workman, suffering from an aneurism in so advanced a state that it might have burst at any time, was tightening a nut with a spanner, when the strain, which was an ordinary one in the work, ruptured the aneurism. The county court judge found that the death was due to strain arising from the ordinary work, acting on the diseased condition of the man. It was held that there was evidence to support the finding, and that the accident arose out of the employment. Where a man in a diseased condition dies at his work, the case is within the act, if the employment is one of the contributing causes to the accident; i. e., the question for the arbitrator in each case is whether the accident came from the disease alone, or whether the employment contributed to it in a material degree; whether, looking at it broadly, free from overnice conjectures, the man died from the disease alone, or from the disease and employment taken together. Clover, C. & Co. v. Hughes [1910; H. L.] A. C. (Eng.) 242, 79 L. J. K. B. N. S. 470, 102 L. T. N. S. 340, 26 Times L. R. 359, 54 Sol. Jo. 375, 3 B. W. C. C. 275, 47 Scot. L. R. 885, affirming [1909] 2 K. B. 798, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1057, 101 L. T. N. S. 475, 25 Times L. R. 760, 53 Sol. Jo. 763, 2 B. W. C. C. 1.

A workman was suffering from an aneurism of the aorta, an aneurism in such a condition that there might be a rupture at any moment, from exertion. While moving a box he fell down dead. It was held that this was an accident arising out of his employment. McArdle v. Swansea Harbour Trust (1915) 113 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 677, 8 B. W. C. C. 489, 11 N. C. C. A. 175, following Clover, C. & Co. v. Hughes (Eng.) supra.

c. Ankylosis.

The claimant was working for a stonemason. In May, 1917, a piece of stone fell on his right toe, severely injuring it. He was unable to work because of the injury; several hearings were had before the industrial commission, and he was allowed $13.08 for a period of forty-two weeks. On May 10, 1918, the case was closed. The toe continued to trouble the claimant and render him unable to work. After that the claimant went to a hospital; his toe was operated on to relieve his pain and correct defective walking, caused, as claimed by him, by the injury. The operation was successful for the purpose for which it was had, but ankylosed the joint of the toe. The toe was practically a total loss. The employer contended that at the time the case was closed, in March or May, 1918, it had healed. That seemed to be the fact appearing in the evidence. The case was reopened, and on the rehearing claimant said that at the time of the injury, and since infancy, he had had on the great toe of each foot a bursa or bunion, and that the injury to the right great toe was to or on this bunion, greatly enlarging it, and rendering the foot practically useless in its then-present condition; that the operation was necessary to enable him to work at all; and that the whole condition was the result of the injury. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the injury was the cause, or contributing cause, which made the operation proper, practicable, and necessary. Vaselenito v. Kasenetz (1920) 190 App. Div. 879, 180 N. Y. Supp. 651.

A workman's arm was broken while he was engaged in the duties of his employment. The fracture properly united, but during the course of the treatment, due to the abrasion or infection of the skin from the rubbing or pressure of an unguarded or unpadded splint, there developed an abscess of the fleshy part of the thumb, which resulted in ankylosis, making the thumb and the first and second fingers permanently useless. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to justify a finding that the diseased condition resulted from the accident, which was attributed to the employment. Newcomb v. Albertson (1914) 85 N. J. L. 435, 89 Atl. 928.

d. Anthrax.

The foreman of the halter department in a tannery picked a pimple on his neck, causing it to bleed slightly. Two days later he had to leave his work and go to a hospital, from which he returned with his neck bandaged. His neck was swollen, and the next morning a physician was summoned who treated him for diabetes. Two days later he died. An examination of the tissue cut from his neck showed the presence of anthrax bacilli. It was shown in evidence that anthrax was an infectious and usually fatal disease of animals, especially sheep and cattle, and occasionally man, and the men who became its victims were usually those engaged in handling wool, hides, or animals that were infected. That the disease might be acquired either by inhaling the bacteria or by inoculation through an abrasion of the skin, and that the latter was the most usual way. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that the death was due to the employment. Chicago Rawhide Mfg. Co. v. Industrial Commission (1920) 291 Ill. 616, 126 N. E. 616.

A workman was employed as a wool sorter. When he went to his work one day he was perfectly well and had no abrasion or mark on his neck, but when he left there was a little scratch or abrasion on his neck, which caused a swelling, and which developed into external anthrax, from which he died. The medical testimony was to the effect that if the workman was a wool sorter, and had no abrasion on his neck when he went to his work, and sustained an abrasion on his neck, and the neck immediately began to swell and external anthrax developed, this condition was probably brought about by the anthrax germ entering through the abrasion; that anthrax germs were frequently found on the hair and skins of animals. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the scratch occurred during the course of his employment, and that at that time the anthrax germs entered the body of the workman, subsequently causing his death. McCauley v. Imperial Woolen Co. (1918) 261 Pa. 312, 104 Atl. 617, 17 N. C. C. A. 864.

It is provided by the English Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 that "if the workman at or immediately before the date of the disablement or suspension was employed in any process mentioned in the second column of the third schedule of this act, and the disease contracted is the disease in the first column of that schedule set opposite the description of the process, the disease, except where the certifying surgeon certifies that in his opinion the disease was not due to the nature of the employment, shall be deemed to have been due to the nature of that employment, unless the employer proves the contrary." Construing this provision, it has been held that the words "employed in any process mentioned in the second column of the third schedule" related to the general nature of the workman's services. Where, therefore, a workman employed as a foreman of a gang of laborers who were engaged in unloading hides and skins from a ship, died from anthrax, one of the diseases mentioned in the schedule, it was held that the onus of proving that his death was due to the nature of his employment was not shifted to the dependents of the deceased workman, notwithstanding that there was no direct evidence to show that he had himself in fact handled any of the hides or skins; and that, as the employers had failed to prove that the disablement was not due to the nature of his employment, his dependents were entitled to an award. Meadows v. Ellerman Lines [1920; C. A.] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 544, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1234, 13 B. W. C. C. 227, [1920] W. N. 305, 86 Times L. R. 847, 64 Sol. Jo. 698, 150 L. T. Jo. 71, 124 L. T. N. S. 65, [1920] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 207.

In the reported case (ELDRIDGE v. ENDICOTT, J. & Co. ante, 1) it appeared that an employee at a tannery died of anthrax. He had a small cut on his neck, and it was claimed that he contracted the disease from handling hides which were infected with anthrax germs, but no evidence was given as to the nature of the disease, nor as to whether the hides in question were infected with anthrax germs. It is held that in the absence of some evidence on these points, and that he might with his cut have taken anthrax, the commission was not justified in finding in favor of the claimants, as it could not take judicial notice, or presume, that hides frequently contained anthrax germs and that a person working about them with an open wound was likely to contract the disease. The court says that § 21 of the New York Workmen's Compensation Law (64 McKinney, Consol. Law), providing that it shall be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that a claim comes within the provisions of the law, was not a substitute for facts and could not sustain an award in the absence of any evidence.

American Soc. (1920) 191 App. Div. 6, 180 N. Y. Supp. 867, wherein it appeared that the claimant was an ambulance driver for the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and died of anthrax taken through a boil on his nose. It was held that, in the absence of some evidence that the disease was contracted in the course of his employment other than the bare proof of the nature of his employment, an award in his favor could not be sustained. The court said: "As to the second theory, that an anthrax germ attacked the deceased through an incision in the boil, there is no evidence that he contracted the disease in the course of his employment. It does not appear that any of the animals with which he came in contact had anthrax. It does not even appear that about the time when he contracted the disease he came in contact with any diseased animal, except a lame horse, or with any other kind of animal, either sick or well, except horses. It does not appear that the disease is peculiar to horses. No evidence was given as to the nature of anthrax, or as to the circumstances or conditions under which it attacks mankind. Because the deceased died of anthrax, and because his employment was in connection with animals, the commission has concluded that a causal relation between his employment and death existed. Such a conclusion is not justified in the absence of evidence establishing a causal relation. The case, in this particular, is very similar to the reported case (ELDRIDGE v. ENDICOTT, J. & Co. ante, 1), and is controlled by the decision in that case."

But see Hiers v. John A. Hull & Co. (1917) 178 App. Div. 350, 164 N. Y. Supp. 767, wherein it appeared that the occupation of the claimant was weighing hides on the piers in Brooklyn, which hides constituted cargoes, or parts of cargoes, unloaded from vessels. He was doing this work in the performance of the duties which, as an employee, he owed to his employer. Previous to February 10, 1916, while in the same work, wet salt from the hides had permeated his gloves and caused a swelling on the back of one of his hands, and a fissure or abrasion of the skin resulted. On the day mentioned he was handling dirty and diseased hides, and anthrax germs contained therein were communicated to him through the fissure in the back of his hand, causing infection and disease for which the award in question had been made. The court sustained the award in favor of the claimant without discussing the sufficiency of the evidence further than to say: "There seems to be no question in this case but that the claimant contracted the disease in the manner and under the conditions above indicated."

A gamekeeper handled dead animals on July 31 and on August 2, 3, and 5. The animals he handled on July 31 and August 5 were handled in the course of his employment, but not those on August 2 and 3. The animal he handled on August 5, a dog, was proved to have died from anthrax. There was no evidence as to the cause of the death of the other animals. On August 11 he fell ill, and died on August 18. The county court judge found that the deceased did not die from an accident, and that if he did the accident was not proved to have arisen out of the employment. It was held that the burden of proof was on the applicant, and that it had not been discharged. Sherwood v. Johnson (1912) 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 686.

A workman engaged in operating a machine for the sawing and shaping of boards suffered an accident on August 7, 1918, by having three of his fingers cut off. He died on October 13 following the accident, the immediate cause of death being the third of a series of apoplectic strokes, occurring at intervals following the injury to his hand. The workman was sixty-one years of age at the time of the accident. Immediately following the accident he was taken to the hospital, where he was given an anesthetic, followed by proper surgical treatment. He remained at the hospital six days, and while there, and some two days after the injury, suffered a slight apoplectic stroke, his left side being affected, with paralysis of the face and loss of power of speech. He recovered from the shock, and when he left the hospital was apparently in his normal condition, barring the injury to the hand. He suffered another and more severe stroke on the 18th of August, from which he made only a partial recovery, and a third stroke on October 10, 1918, resulted in his death three days later. The medical testimony tended to show that the injury was a severe nervous shock to the workman's system, reducing the power of resistance of the tissues of the body, bringing on or causing an embolismic condition, which in turn caused the apoplectic strokes, the third of which resulted in his death. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the apoplexy was attributable to the employment. State ex rel. George D. Taylor & Sons v. District Ct. (1920) 147 Minn. 10, 179 N. W. 217.

A miner, while assisting in pushing and dumping a buggy or dump wagon, received a blow on the head when the buggy went back. He sat down for awhile, and then got up and again attempted to help push the buggy, but was unable to do so and became unconscious. He was taken to his home, and from there to a hospital, where he died without ever regaining consciousness. The medical testimony showed that he died from a hemorrhage of the brain, producing apoplexy and unconsciousness. He suffered from arteriosclerosis, but he had been working prior to the time of the accident without any evidence of any discomfort or illness, and the doctors testified that the condition of the arteries was not such as that the apoplexy would have resulted without some exciting or inducing cause, and that a blow such as he was said to have received might be the inducing cause which would produce the apoplexy. A recent scar was found on his head over the place where the hemorrhage occurred, which the doctors testified had been healed too long to have been the result of the blow alleged to have been the cause of his death, and there was no evidence as to the manner in which this scar had been received. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the death of the workman was due to an injury received in the course of his employment. Yadis v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. (1921) 269 Pa. 586, 113 Atl. 73.

A gatekeeper, whose duty it was, besides attending to the gate, to take charge of the ambulance appliances for use in case of accidents occurring in the works, to telephone for the doctor, and to attend personally to minor accidents, was informed while on duty of an accident in the works. He ran to the scene of the accident and then back to the gate to telephone for the doctor. The exertion of running, and the excitement, brought on an apoplectic shock, from which he died in a few hours. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that his condition was attributable to his work. Aitken v. Finlayson, B. & Co. [1914; Ct. Sess.] S. C. 770, 51 Scot. L. R. 653, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 398.

A fireman, after having been for some time at work shoveling coal and raking fires in the stokehold of a steamship, had an apoplectic stroke. The medical evidence went to prove that the man was in a diseased condition, and that such a stroke would be likely to be brought on by such exertion. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to justify the inference that the apoplexy was caused by the employment. Broforst v. The Bloomfield (1913; C. A.) 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 613.

A finding that apoplexy was caused by an injury in the course of employment cannot be sustained, where there is no evidence of any strain, and the evidence adduced is equally as consistent with the fact of no accident, as with the fact of an accident. Barnabas v. Bersham Colliery Co. (1910) 103 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 513, 55 Sol. Jo. 63, 4 B. W. C. C. 119.

So, where, on medical evidence, the arbitrator finds that heat apoplexy from which a ship stoker was suffering might have been caused by the heat of the sun or by the heat of the stokeholds, the arbitrator is justified in holding that the evidence will not permit him to draw the inference that the injury was caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. Olsen v. The Dorset (1913) 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 658.

As to apoplexy producing paralysis, see infra, II. 11.

f. Arsenical poisoning.

An employer had operated his plant for nearly fifty years, and no case of lead, zinc, or arsenical poisoning had ever appeared there. The applicant during all his years of service had been in good health, with the exception of two accidents. He had never been affected with any appearance of disease or disability by lead, zinc, or arsenical poisoning, and in the year before his fatal illness he never missed a day except when there was no work. Two other men who worked with the applicant, doing precisely the same work, for more than ten years, had never been injuriously affected in any way by their work. October 6, 1914, came on Tuesday, and the claimant was in his usual health up to the morning of that day. The plant was operated only five days in the week, and he worked on the previous Saturday until 10 o'clock at night, but did not work on Sunday or Monday. On Tuesday morning he began work at 6 o'clock, and on leaving home for the plant said that he did not feel like going to work. He worked until 2 o'clock in the afternoon, when he went home sick and had dysentery. His daughter had been slightly affected in the same way during the day, and she at first attributed his sickness to coffee which he had drunk, which was discolored when milk was poured in it; but the attending physician found that there was nothing the matter with the coffee, and other members of the family who had drunk the coffee were not affected. About 8 o'clock in the evening he was seized with cramps through his arms and legs, chest, stomach, and bowels, and from that time he grew steadily worse. His discharges were black and loose. His teeth became black and loose, there was a dark line around his gums, his toe nails and finger nails became black, his eyes had a glassy, staring look, his wrists dropped, and his mind wandered. He was treated at home until October 12, when he was taken to a hospital, where he died on October 14. The medical testimony was to the effect that the death was due to acute rather than chronic arsenical poisoning. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the workman came to his death from acute arsenical poisoning contracted on October 6, 1914, and attributable to his work. Matthiessen & H. Zinc Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1918) 284 Ill. 378, 120 N. E. 249.

g. Arteriosclerosis.

A laborer, while attempting to start a gas engine, caught his foot in the crank case, lacerating it, and in attempting to release himself he fell backward into a box of trash and pieces of old iron; he lay there in a faint from half to three quarters of an hour, and when he got up he could not stand on his left foot; shortly after his injury he felt a severe pain in his neck and back; he had fits of shaking and trembling, and lost the use of his limbs so that he walked with crutches. At the trial, which occurred about two years after his injuries, it was conceded that he was suffering with multiple sclerosis. Previous to the injury he was an able-bodied man, working as a common laborer for about two years at construction work. The medical testimony was conflicting. The claimant's physician testified that in his opinion the injury was contributory, but would not say that it was absolutely the cause of the disease. Another testified that it was possible that the injury brought on the nervousness and jerking sooner than it would otherwise have developed, and still another testified that the claimant's condition was due to an injury or shock, which undoubtedly aggravated and may have been the absolute cause of the disease. On the other hand there was testimony that the claimant's injury was absolutely independent of, and had nothing to do with, the disease. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to sustain an award in favor of the claimant. Blackburn v. Coffeyville Vitriified Brick & Tile Co. (1920) 107 Kan. 722, 193 Pac. 351.

A plumber who had worked for the defendant employer for five months became ill from lead poisoning. There was evidence that during this time he was handling lead pipe, and his handkerchiefs and napkins would be colored red from the red lead. His family physician testified that for the past few years he had treated him for what he supposed was lead poisoning. An expert, after reviewing the history and symptoms, gave as his opinion that the cause of death was sclerosis of the coronary arteries, and that it was undoubtedly caused by lead poisoning. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain an award in favor of the claimant; that on the testimony of the expert it could be found that the lead poisoning, which was a contributing cause of the employee's death, was progressive, and probably due to the constant assimilation of the lead during the period he had been exposed to it. O'Donnell's Case (1921) 237 Mass. 164, 129 N. E. 353.

A workman was employed as yardman by a firm of paving contractors. In a building on their premises was a desk phone. Shortly before noon this telephone rang, and he, in answering it, picked up the phone with his right hand and lifted the receiver with his left. He received a shock of sufficient severity to make it difficult for him to release himself from the instrument. It was raining that morning and his clothing and shoes were damp. He felt the shock all over his body, but mostly on his right side. The numbness continued to grow worse until afternoon, when he first realized that his face was partially paralyzed. He then discovered that he could not use his lips to draw his pipe. He went home about 4 o'clock, and there found that his left eye and the left side of his mouth were drawn down. The next morning he could not close his eyes, and he had pains in his back and head. He did no work after the day of the accident. Physicians who examined him testified that he was suffering from arteriosclerosis, and that, while the shock may have aggravated this condition, the real cause of his disability was the disease. The court was of the opinion that a clear preponderance of evidence showed that the condition of the applicant was due largely, if not entirely, to an organic disease, but held that there was sufficient evidence on which the commission could base its finding that the disability was due to an injury arising out of the course of the employment. McGarry v. Industrial Commission (1919) 290 Ill. 577, 125 N. E. 318.

A workman was ruptured while engaged in the performance of his duties. He was operated on, and made a fair recovery from the operation, and was able to go about for a time, although in a weakened condition. Six weeks after the operation his condition became such that he had to take to his bed, and he died about a month later. The medical testimony was to the effect that he died from chronic arteriosclerosis. There was no evidence that the operation or anesthesia was the cause of the death, and two physicians testified that they did not think the operation or the anesthesia accentuated or accelerated the disease, or hastened the death of the decedent. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain a finding that the death was caused by an injury received in the course of the employment. Tucillo v. Ward Baking Co. (1917) 180 App. Div. 302, 167 N. Y. Supp. 666.

In Selvage v. Charles Burrell & Sons [1921; C. A.] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 355, (1920) W. N. 373, 90 L. J. K. B. N. S. 209, 124 L. T. N. S. 428, 13 B. W. C. C. 277, [1921] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 12, 37 Times L. R. 95, 65 Sol. Jo. 133, affirmed in (1921; H. L.) 65 Sol. Jo. 734, 14 B. W. C. C. 161, 90 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1340, the applicant was employed in the copper-plating department as a finisher of shell adapters. In the course of her employment, extending over a period of about six months, she from time to time sustained scratches to her hands, which were commonly followed by gatherings, and the pus thereby formed caused blood poisoning. Her condition gradually became worse until ultimately she was found to be suffering from arthritis of the joints, caused by the poison of the pus, with the result that she was totally incapacitated. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to warrant a finding that the disease was occasioned by an accident arising out of and in the course of her employment, and that it was not material that it was caused by a number of accidents which all contributed to that condition, or that they extended over a period of time, as under the circumstances she was not required to show the exact time of the accident further than she had shown.

A deal carrier met with an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, causing injury to one of his knees. At the time of the hearing he was found to be suffering from arthritis in the knee. Arthritis was the natural result of such an injury as he had suffered. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to justify an award in favor of the workman, and that the burden of proving that it was caused by intervening improper medical treatment was on the employer. Bower v. Meggitt (1917) 86 L. J. K. B. N. S. (Eng.) 463, [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 40, 116 L. T. N. S. 178, 10 B. W. C. C. 146.

A workman bruised his leg through an accident happening in the course of his employment. There was no abrasion, but a discolored spot, and later the leg became inflamed and swollen. A physician opened the place and made a microscopic examination of the substance which came from the leg, and found that it contained gonococci, and was of the opinion that he had gonorrheal arthritis. Other physicians agreed with this diagnosis. It became necessary to remove a part of the bone which was infected. The doctors testified that the disease, if dormant, could have been lighted up and aggravated by a blow such as the claimant was said to have received, or it might have been caused by other things. It was held that, though the physicians indicated that there might have been other causes, there was no evidence suggesting any other than the injury, and there was evidence sufficient to sustain a finding that the disease was lighted up or accelerated by the injury. Hanson v. Dickinson (1920) 188 Iowa, 728, 176 N. W. 823.

4. Beat hand.

The applicant was employed as a "riveter's holder-up" by a shipbuilding company. His work consisted of knocking rivets into holes, and then holding them up against the hammering of the riveter with a 3½-pound hammer. When he had been at work for about two years his hand became sore, and the certifying surgeon certified that he was suffering from "beat hand" as a result of his employment. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain an award in his favor. Wilson v. Blyth Shipbuilding & Dry Docks Co. [1919; C. A.] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 324, 88 L. J. K. B. N. S. 27, [1918] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 385, 11 B. W. C. C. 173, 120 L. T. N. S. 1, 63 Sol. Jo. 67.

5. Blood poisoning.

A workman sustained a contused wound on the great toe of his right foot while engaged in the service of his employer. Three days later he had the toe dressed at the hospital. On the fourth day the toe was so painful that after starting to work he returned home, and undertook to treat the toe himself. On the next day he complained of a swelling on his face, and on the day following the symptoms of the face became so alarming that he was removed to a hospital, where it was discovered that there was a streptococcal infection of the injured toe. The skin surrounding the toe was in an erysipelatous condition, and there was a development of erysipelas on the face. The facial infection resulted in septicemia, from which the man died in about a week. The medical testimony was to the effect that the germs which caused the facial infection were carried by external means from the toe to the face; that such a method was exceedingly common. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the claimant's death was attributable to the injury received in his work. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corp. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1919) 181 Cal. 500, 7 A.L.R. 1180, 185 Pac. 179.

An employee was engaged with the assistance of another in cleaning a gear. In order to clean the gear it was necessary to remove a sheet-iron cover. The fellow workman testified that the edges of the cover were thin and sharp, and that he himself had cut his hand on it at another time; that after they had finished cleaning the gear he noticed blood on the workman's hand, and spoke to him about it. The cut on the hand became infected, finally causing death by blood poisoning. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to warrant a finding that the hand was cut or scratched in the course of the employment, resulting in death by blood poisoning. McRae v. Morgan & Wright (1919) 205 Mich. 493, 171 N. W. 394.

In the discharge of his duties a fireman was required to take out clinkers from the combustion chamber, clean the boilers and fixtures, polish the same, clean the engine, and oil it. One day he was attended by a physician who discovered two little cuts through the skin and the thumb, about an eighth of an inch apart and half an inch long, around which there was some redness, and from the condition of which he judged that he was suffering from streptococcic infection. Two days later the hand was more swollen, the next day he had chills and his temperature had gone up. He was removed to a hospital, grew worse, and died four days later of septicemia. It was held that there was evidence to sustain the finding of the commission that the death was due to an injury received in the course of his employment. William Rahr Sons Co. v. Industrial Commission (1917) 166 Wis. 28, 163 N. W. 169.

An award for the death of a printer from streptococcic infection originating from a small cut in the index finger of the right hand was affirmed in McCartney v. Wood-Temple Co. (1922) — Mich. —, 187 N. W. 251,—against the objection that there was no testimony that the accident was received while deceased was working in the printing office,—upon the strength of reports made by the employer shortly after the accident which, under the authorities, were prima facie evidence that the accident arose out of and in the course of employment, although, as the court said, the other evidence, without the reports, would probably have been insufficient.

A workman was employed to assemble brake and clutch pedals, in which employment abrasions were a common form of injury. Shortly before quitting time, he went to the foreman and exhibited his thumb, which was dirty, torn up, and clotted over the nail with blood, and was sent by the latter to a doctor. The abrasion was treated, but was infected, septicemia followed, and the workman died therefrom. It was held that the facts supported the inference that the injury arose out of and in the course of the employment. Kinney v. Cadillac Motor Car Co. (1917) 199 Mich. 435, 165 N. W. 651.

An employee was engaged in loading and unloading bags into and from box cars. When he arrived home one evening he had a scratch on one hand. It was about 1½ inches long and had been bleeding "quite badly." He had wrapped it in a piece of handkerchief which was bloody. The blood was hard, and witnesses testified it looked as if the scratch was about two hours old. The time required to go from his work to his home was about twenty minutes. Deceased had no scratch on his hand when he left home for work that morning. It was shown that the men engaged in his line of work often received scratches on their hands, sometimes from nails inside the cars. Blood poisoning shortly set in, causing his death. A letter of the insurance company stated that it had examined all the workmen at the plant, and found only one man who knew anything about the workman being injured. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to show that the blood poisoning and death were due to the scratch, and that, while there was no direct evidence, the circumstances were sufficient to sustain a finding that the scratch was received in the course of the employment. The court said: "The fact that deceased had no scratch when he left home in the morning and had one when he came home from work at night; that he must have come home immediately, for he was home within half an hour of the time he quit work; that the scratch had blood upon it which had hardened, indicating that the scratch had been received earlier than the time he quit work; that it was such a scratch as he was not likely to receive on a trip from his work to his home, and such a scratch as he might well have received while at work—these facts, taken in connection with the letter, . . . which is of some force as an admission, were such that the court might infer that the scratch was received while deceased was in the course of his usual work, and that it arose out of it." State ex rel. Albert Dickinson Co. v. Dist. Ct. (1917) 139 Minn. 30, 165 N. W. 478.

A man working as a repairer on night shift in a colliery left home with a sound finger and arrived at work with a sound finger. He came home in the evening with his finger injured, and a rag round it, and died later from blood poisoning. It was held that there was evidence from which it could be inferred that the injury arose in the course of the employment. Mitchell v. Glamorgan Coal Co. (1907) 23 Times L. R. (Eng.) 588, 9 W. C. C. 16.

A bricklayer returned from work on December 27, 1911, with a sore on the back of the thumb of his left hand. The wound appeared to heal, but ultimately blood poisoning ensued in the armpit, and the workman died on January 30, 1912. Evidence was given that injuries such as this were common in case of bricklayers. The workman was engaged in cutting grooves in a wall, and had to use a hammer and chisel. In doing such work the face of the hammer might slip off the chisel and hit the workman's hand. The medical evidence was that the inflammation started under the man's armpit in the form of an abscess, due to an inflamed gland, and that an injury to the back of the thumb might give rise to this. The doctor was of opinion that the bacillus entered through this injury, but he said in cross-examination, that he could not say that a dirty condition of the armpit might not have caused the abscess. It was held that there was evidence from which the court might infer that the injury to the workman happened to him while he was at work. Feet v. Johnson [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 149, 57 Sol. Jo. 226, 29 Times L. R. 207, 6 B. W. C. C. 60.

A miner, who was employed at a colliery in moving tubs from the working place to the shunt, arrived at the colliery apparently in his normal health, but in the course of his work he was seen by two of his fellow workmen to be rubbing his knee and to limp, and on his return home he had a slight abrasion on his knee. The next day he absented himself from his work owing to the injury to his knee, and after resuming work again for two days he called in a doctor. Two days afterwards the man died from blood poisoning caused by the injury to his knee. It was held that there was evidence to support a finding that the death resulted from an injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. Hayward v. Westleigh Colliery Co. [1915; H. L.] A. C. (Eng.) 540, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 661, [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 233, 8 B. W. C. C. 278, 112 L. T. N. S. 1001, 31 Times L. R. 215, 59 Sol. Jo. 269, [1915] W. N. 67, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 877, reversing [1914; C. A.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 21, 7 B. W. C. C. 53.

On March 6, 1915, a workman came home with his hands scratched, and complained that they had been knocked about at his work of shell making. Next day his doctor saw him, and immediately diagnosed blood poisoning from a small wound on a finger, from the effects of which he died on March 14, 1915. The nature of the workman's duty was likely to cause abrasions on the hands. There was no evidence as to the exact date of the injury. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that the disease was the result of an injury received in the course of the employment, and that, as it was not possible to state an exact date for such an injury, an approximate date was sufficient. Burvill v. Vickers [1916] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 180, 85 L. J. K. B. N. S. 256, 114 L. T. N. S. 29, 9 B. W. C. C. 50.

A workman employed in "spreading sod, cultivating, and doing work in the line of improving the grounds," received a scratch on the back of his hand which became infected, and he died of blood poisoning. It was held that the evidence sustained a finding that the injury arose out of and in the course of his employment. Re Bean's Case (1917) 227 Mass. 558, 116 N. E. 826.

A workman in a machine shop appeared at his work with his hand bandaged. The foreman inquired the cause, and was informed that he had scratched his hand at a manifold sometime previously. A doctor and nurse both testified that there was a wound upon his hand when they treated him for blood poisoning. The workman died. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to sustain a finding that the injury arose out of and in the course of his employment. Fitzgerald v. Lozier Motor Co. (1915) 187 Mich. 660, 154 N. W. 67.

The claimant was employed in making metal brushes. The performance of this work necessitated a constant pressure with the hand on the prongs of pliers with which the wire used in making the brushes was manipulated. He developed a blister on his hand. He continued to work until the blister broke and blood came, and a crack in the flesh under the skin was seen by his fellow workman. Almost immediately it commenced to smart, pain, and swell, the swelling extending to and involving the back of the hand. Some way in connection with the work, dye was present, and by that, or something from some other source then and there present, infection entered the hand through this cut or broken skin. Claimant painted his hand with iodine; it continued to swell and grow worse, and the following day, or the second day thereafter, he went to a doctor who pronounced it a "palmar abscess," and who testified on the hearing: "There must be some point of infection; there must be some cut, scratch, or break in the skin to cause infection." In his report the physician stated that the symptoms from which the claimant was suffering were due entirely to the injury to his hand, and he later testified that the condition of the hand was due to infection. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the condition of the claimant's hand was due to an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment. Scoville v. Tolhurst Mach. Works (1920) 193 App. Div. 606, 184 N. Y. Supp. 608, affirmed without opinion in (1921) 231 N. Y. 510, 132 N. E. 867.

In Blaess v. Dolph (1917) 195 Mich. 137, 161 N. W. 885, a finding allowing recovery for an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment was sustained where there was evidence that the employee, who was an undertaker's assistant, had a cut on his finger, which became infected with malignant poison germs while he was assisting in embalming one who had died from the same germs, or while he was sterilizing the instruments.

A workman was employed by a manufacturer of peroxide and toilet articles. His duties consisted, in part, in washing and filling bottles. On the day of the alleged accident he came to a fellow workman and told him that he had hurt his hand. He also told the forelady in charge of his department the same thing, and showed her his bleeding hand. He worked at the plant after this time, and witnesses saw that his hand was bandaged. No witness saw the actual accident. Three days after the accident he died. A post-mortem examination showed a dark, prominent, and large swelling, involving the upper half of the right forearm and extending up into the region of the neck. The doctors agreed that he died of septic poisoning. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the death was due to an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. The court said: "This court has said more than once that the burden rests upon the claimant to show by competent testimony not only the fact of the injury, but that it occurred in connection with the employment of the deceased; to furnish evidence from which the inference can be logically drawn that the injury arose out of and in the course of his employment; that the proof must be based on something more than mere guess or conjecture; that the proof of such facts may be established by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence, and the greater or less probability, leading on the whole to a satisfactory conclusion, is all that can reasonably be required to establish controverted facts. Ohio Bldg. Safety Vault Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1917) 277 Ill. 96, 115 N. E. 149, 14 N. C. C. A. 224; Mechanics Furniture Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1917) 281 Ill. 530, 117 N. E. 986; Smith-Lohr Coal Min. Co. v. Industrial Commission (1918) 286 Ill. 34, 121 N. E. 231. It is not necessary, under these authorities, that there should be eyewitnesses to the accident. We think there is evidence in the record that justified the industrial board in finding that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment of the deceased." Hydrox Chemical Co. v. Industrial Commission (1920) 291 Ill. 579, 126 N. E. 564.

A workman stated to his employer, his wife, and his physician that he had hurt his thumb while at work, by running a sliver from a screw into it. His hand and forearm subsequently became infected, and about ten days after the alleged accident he died. The medical testimony was to the effect that he died as a result of the injury to his thumb. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that his death was due to an injury received in the course of his employment, and the fact that the evidence of witnesses to whom the workman had stated the origin of his injury was hearsay was cured by the failure to raise timely objection thereto. Hege & Co. v. Tompkins (1919) 69 Ind. App. 273, 121 N. E. 677.

A workman employed as a furnace laborer in the course of his work was required to shovel up and screen calcined ore. He had chilblains on his hands, and while so working a frost crack opened up and bled so freely that he got a fellow workman to bind up his hand with his handkerchief. On the following day septic poisoning set in and for a time he was unable to work. The arbitrator found that the microbes entered the frost crack while the man was working, and that the evidence showed that calcined ore dust was liable to render a sore septic, but held that he could not decide from the evidence whether the microbes came from the calcined dust, or from the man's handkerchief, or from some other source which had not even been suggested, and he therefore made his award for the employers. It was held, on appeal, that the evidence was sufficient to justify a finding that the injury arose out of and in the course of the employment, although the source of the infection could not be determined, such source being immaterial. Saddington v. Inlup Iron Co. (1917) 87 L. J. K. B. N. S. (Eng.) 184, 62 Sol. Jo. 120, 52 L. Jo. 438, 144 L. T. Jo. 75, 118 L. T. N. S. 138, 10 B. W. C. C. 624.

The applicant was employed in the kitchen of a golf club. She stated that she cut her finger on a piece of glass that was in some crockery she had washed. The finger was bound up. The next morning she found her finger very painful and discolored, and she told the stewardess of the club what had happened, and how, and when. The stewardess applied remedies, but the finger gradually grew worse until applicant finally got leave from the stewardess to go home, as she was unable to do her ordinary work, and she was incapacitated from work for about a month. The employers suggested that the state of the applicant's finger was not caused by any accident that took place on their premises, or on the date alleged by the applicant, but that for some time before she had been suffering from a whitlow. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the accident occurred in the course of the employment. Venters v. Sundridge Park Golf Club [1918] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 224, 118 L. T. N. S. 799, 11 B. W. C. C. 55.

A small burr from a screw head entered the little finger of a workman. He picked it out, this causing no wound and no bleeding, and he went on with his work. Three days afterwards blood poisoning set in, and the man was seriously ill and in bed for ten weeks. A doctor testified that the condition of the man was consistent with its being caused by the accident, and there was no other explanation of the blood poisoning. It was held that the inference drawn by the county court that the blood poisoning was due to the accident was justified, as it was not a case in which there were two alternatives, but only this one circumstance which could have caused the blood poisoning. White v. Ford Motor Co. [1918] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 25.

A workman met with injury by accident in the course of his employment, having a middle finger crushed. Healing progressed favorably for three weeks, when symptoms of blood poisoning appeared, and a fortnight later the finger had to be amputated. Shortly afterwards a medical examination disclosed the fact that the workman was suffering from syphilis, which must have been contracted before the date of the operation and after the original injury. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that the workman's incapacity at the date of the arbitration was not due entirely to the syphilis, but to the original injury, aggravated by the infection, and that there was no novus actus interveniens, and that the complainant was, therefore, entitled to compensation. Laverick v. William Gray & Co. (1919; C. A.) 12 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 177, [1919] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 173, 121 L. T. N. S. 289.

A workman who had an old wound on his foot, which was unhealed, was obliged to wade through foul and dirty water which had overflowed the yards of his employer's plant. On the morning after wading in the water his foot was badly swollen, and the swelling increased for several days, finally necessitating amputation. The medical testimony was to the effect that the infection could be, and probably was, caused by wading in the dirty water. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the injury arose out of and in the course of his employment. Monson v. Battelle (1918) 102 Kan. 208, 170 Pac. 801.

In Dove v. Alpena Hide & Leather Co. (1917) 198 Mich. 132, 164 N. W. 253, an award based on septic poisoning alleged to have been caused by handling South American hides was held to have been warranted by the evidence, which the court summarized as follows: "The testimony has been carefully examined, and we think it tends to establish the following facts: (a) That the cause of death was 'septic infection.' (b) That dust arose from the handling of the hides, and that the ventilation in the hide house was very poor. (c) That septic infection could be taken into the body by means of inhalation. (d) That the throat of deceased was badly inflamed. (e) That the infection which caused death was contracted from without. (f) That if the dust contained infection, the deceased could have contracted it by working on the hides in a poorly ventilated room. (g) That the dust arising from the hides contained infection."

A finding that infection, causing blood poisoning of a workman engaged in handling fertilizer consisting mostly of bone dust, in which bacilli likely to cause such infection were present in large numbers, arose out of and in the course of his employment, is warranted where there is medical evidence to the effect that it was in the highest degree probable that the workman received the infection from the germs contained in the bone dust, and highly improbable that he contracted it elsewhere, although it also appeared that such bacilli were found in the air and in other substances, though in a much lesser degree, and it was impossible to say with certainty when the infection occurred. Innes v. Kynoch

A workman who had undergone an operation returned to work before the operation wound had completely healed, having been instructed not to strain himself. He worked at the lever of a machine. A fellow workman, noticing that the machine was stopped, looked for the man, and saw that he was talking to the foreman some yards away. It was then seen that the operation wound had burst open, and that the blood was flowing freely. Septic poisoning followed, and the man died. The county court judge inferred that the wound had been burst open by the strain of working the lever, and found that the accident arose out of the employment. It was held that there was evidence to support the inference. Groves v. Borrowghes & Watts (1911) 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 185.

A woodworker, while engaged in the duties of his employment, suffered an injury which resulted in the crushing of the end of the index finger, and the making of a blood blister on the side and near the distal joint of the middle finger of his right hand. By reason of his work the knuckles of his fingers had become calloused, and these callouses would become hard and sore, something like a corn. The blood blister was near the edge of the callous on the middle finger of his right hand. He went to a physician, who dressed his fingers. November 26 he was discharged as cured. About December 5 the callous on the finger where the blood blister had been became sore, and he scraped the calloused place with a pocket knife. There was no evidence, however, that in doing so he caused an incision or break in the skin. On December 8 he reported his condition to his foreman when he quit work for the day, and on the 9th he went to a physician, who discovered a serious infection in or under the callous. The infection became so serious that it was necessary to remove the finger. As a further result of the infection the other fingers of the hand were stiffened, and the commission found a loss of two thirds of the use of the right hand. It appeared from the testimony of the physicians that it would be necessary to have an incision or wound before an infection could follow, and that it was entirely possible for the infection to be the result of the accident of November 2. An award in favor of the applicant was held to be consonant with justice, when all the circumstances of the case were considered, as it could not be said that there was no evidence on which it could be based. Challenge Co. v. Industrial Commission (1920) 292 Ill. 596, 127 N. E. 83.

An employee claimed that while engaged in his work he slipped on the snow and ice, and fell, and struck his arm against a stump; he continued his work the rest of the day, and said nothing about the matter to other workers. The next day he felt sick, and his arm pained him. He did not work, and on the day following was discharged and left the neighborhood. That his arm got worse, and thereafter he found and pulled out of his arm two long slivers, which had penetrated deeply into it. The arm continued to grow worse, and shortly thereafter he received medical and hospital attention. Amputation became necessary. The commission held three hearings at intervals of several months, at each of which applicant testified. There was testimony of the hospital matron and another that when the applicant came to the hospital there were two marks on his arm, near the seat of infection, where the skin was broken, and which looked as though something might have been pulled out there. There was testimony on behalf of the employer, by fellow employees of the company and the keepers of a boarding house at which applicant lived at times, that his left hand was swollen and discolored before the alleged accident, and that no one had heard of or knew of the alleged accident. Applicant testified that his hand had been calloused, but was otherwise in good condition, and this was corroborated by the testimony of persons at the hospital. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to sustain a finding that the condition of the applicant's arm was due to an injury received in the course of his employment. Hackley-Phelps-Bonnell Co. v. Cooley (1920) 173 Wis. 128, 179 N. W. 590.

An employee died as the result of an infection received through an opening in his right foot, which was caused by a traumatic injury. It was claimed that he received the injury by the falling of a billet of steel on his foot while engaged in his work for his employer. In support of the claim a statement made in the employer's report of the injury was received in evidence. In this report it was stated that the workman was unloading billets, and one of the billets scratched his foot. The attending physician found blood poisoning, and had the man sent to a hospital. It was held that the admission contained in the report, together with the statements of the workman as to the cause of the injury, which were not set out, constituted sufficient evidence to sustain a finding that death was attributable to an injury received in the course of employment. Athus v. Rail Joint Co. (1920) 193 App. Div. 571, 185 N. Y. Supp. 314, affirmed without opinion in (1921) 231 N. Y. 557, 132 N. E. 887.

A woman alleged that her thumb was poisoned by accident while cleaning dirty red oxide drums for her employer. She continued working for five days after the alleged accident. Three days later her thumb was operated on for septic poisoning. The only evidence of any accident was her own statement that her thumb "became painful and sore," and that of a fellow worker that she saw her with a rag on the thumb. No cut or abrasion was alleged. The uncontradicted medical evidence was that her thumb would have been very painful within forty-eight hours of its being poisoned. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to support a finding that the thumb was poisoned by an accident arising out of and in the course of her employment. Miller v. Jensen & Nicholson [1918] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 51.

A collier returned home from work with a red patch on his wrist. This patch was a symptom of blood poisoning, which was due to an abrasion on his thumb. There was no evidence as to how the abrasion was caused; but there had been a fall of stone in the colliery during his shift, some four hours before he got home. He died from the blood poisoning, and his dependent claimed compensation on the ground that the fall must have caused the abrasion. The medical evidence showed that at least twelve hours must have elapsed between the abrasion and the appearance of the red patch. The county court judge inferred that the abrasion occurred at work, and that the accident, therefore, arose in the course of the employment. It was held that there was no evidence to support the inference. Jenkins v. Standard Colliery Co. (1912) 105 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 730, 28 Times L. R. 7, 5 B. W. C. C. 71.

A collier, on return from his work, was seen to have a small scratch on his knee and a large lump on his groin. The lump was a bubo due to blood poisoning. He died in a few days of blood poisoning, caused by the scratch. The dependent claimed compensation, alleging that the scratch was caused at work on the day when it was first seen. There was no direct evidence as to the cause of the scratch, but there was medical evidence that, if the lump was due to the scratch, the scratch must have been received at least three days before the lump appeared. The county judge inferred that the scratch was caused at work, and that the accident accordingly arose in the course of the employment. It was held that there was no evidence to support the inference. Wood v. D. Davis & Sons (1911) 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 113.

A railway fireman cut his finger at home. He bandaged it and went to work. Coal dust and oil worked into the cut at his work. Blood poisoning (caused by the entry of streptococci into the wound) supervened, and caused incapacity. The county court judge inferred that the streptococci entered with the coal dust and oil, and that this arose out of the employment. It was held that there was no evidence to support the inference. Chandler v. Great Western R. Co. (1912) 106 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 479, 5 B. W. C. C. 254, [1912] W. C. Rep. 169.

A collier died from acute blood poisoning, caused, according to the medical evidence, by septic infection getting into a superficial abrasion of the skin just below his kneecap. That was stated to be a frequent cause of blood poisoning in colliers, abrasions being occasioned by kneeling on the coal dust while working in a very narrow seam. It was held that the burden had not been sustained by the applicant. Howe v. Fernhill Collieries (1912) 107 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 508, [1912] W. C. Rep. 408, 5 B. W. C. C. 629.

The conclusion of the commission that abscesses on both knees, caused by streptococcic infection which developed about three weeks after a fall from a pile of lumber, the employee having been engaged in his usual employment in the meantime, were not proximately caused by the fall, was justified where the only expert witness who testified stated that the accidents alleged were slight, and in his opinion were not contributing causes of the abscesses. Nelson v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1921) — Cal. App. —, 204 Pac. 23.

A woman claimed for injuries from blood poisoning in her hand, alleging that the injury was caused by pricking her thumb on a nail while working on her employers' premises. The employers alleged that the injury was received at her home. At the hearing she was cross-examined as to alleged statements made by her to certain persons that she had done it at home, and their evidence as to these statements was heard. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to prove that the injury arose out of and in the course of the employment. Jones v. South-Eastern & C. R. Co. (1918) 87 L. J. K. B. N. S. (Eng.) 775, [1918] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 190, 118 L. T. N. S. 802, 11 B. W. C. C. 38.

A workman, on returning home from work one evening, showed his wife a scratch or mark behind one ear. He continued to work, but continually complained of pain, and after a fortnight died of acute blood poisoning. Evidence was given on behalf of the employer that the deceased had a pimple behind his ear, and that if he scratched it, and dirt got in, blood poisoning would be caused. It was held that the facts in evidence supported the decision of the county court judge that he was not satisfied that there was "personal injury caused by accident arising out of and in the course of the man's employment." Fitzgerald v. Murphy, 45 Ir. L. T. 200.

A woman who was employed in operating a multigraphing and typewriting machine claimed that she cut her finger while operating the machine. On the following day the finger showed signs of infection, and was ultimately amputated, and her hand was otherwise affected. No one witnessed the alleged accident. The claimant testified that she cut her finger while operating the machine, but that the cut was so slight that she did not pay any attention to it, that she could not point out what part of the machine caused the cut, and that she really did not know where she hurt it. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to sustain an award in her favor. The court said: "Although the claimant cut her finger while operating the multigraphing machine in the course of her employment, she is unable to say how she hurt it, or even that she hurt it on the machine. A cut so slight as not to arrest the attention of its victim, and the origin of which she is unable to indicate, cannot be said to have been caused by a machine on which she was at the time working. Furthermore, the evidence is that the multigraphing machine had no sharp edges, nor any place where an operator could cut himself. This evidence is uncontradicted, although, if incorrect, it was susceptible of contradiction by the claimant herself. She had several interviews with her employer, after the accident, concerning the condition of her hand, but admits that she never claimed to him that she injured it on the machine. From her testimony it does not appear that she ever made such claim to any person. She did not even so state in her claim for compensation filed with the commission. It has been so frequently held that the burden of proof is on the claimant in these proceedings as to render superfluous the citation of authorities to that effect. The nature of some injuries is such as to indicate their origin, but that is not true of a slight cut or scratch on the finger, which may have occurred in various ways. In my opinion it cannot be held, on the evidence produced, that this accident arose out of the employment." Gale v. Munro (1920) 193 App. Div. 561, 184 N. Y. Supp. 413.

A woman employed to work a particular machine scratched her hand on another machine of a different sort. Blood poisoning ensued, and she died. There was no evidence as to how or why she was at another machine, but she had to pass it on her way in and out of the room where she worked. It was held there was no evidence to support an inference that the accident arose out of her employment. Cronin v. Silver (1911) 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 221.

An employee finished his work on Saturday at noon. The following Monday forenoon a scratch upon his hand was observed, and there was testimony of swelling and of red streaks upon the hand. Later a doctor was consulted, who found a developed case of septic poisoning. The scratch and the resulting infection caused death. Based upon the condition and appearance of the hand on Monday forenoon, as related by witnesses, there was medical testimony that the scratch had been suffered not less than forty-eight hours, and not more than six days, prior thereto. This brought the time of injury within the last week of the employment. There was testimony that a part of the employment was spreading cotter pins, which was likely to produce scratches upon the hands; that deceased and another employee had been so scratched several times in such work. There was no testimony that he had suffered a scratch in such employment during the last week thereof, or at any other definite time. There was testimony that he did many and various chores about his home, including gardening and housework, and that he kept and cared for a cow. It was held that a finding that the blood poisoning was due to a scratch which arose out of and in the course of the employment was not sustained by the evidence, but was based on the conjecture that the scratch was received while working. Hubbard v. Republic Motor Truck Co. (1921) — Mich. —, 185 N. W. 715.

So, in Wilio v. Quincy Min. Co. (1922) — Mich. —, 187 N. W. 249, an award for death due to blood poisoning caused by a cut or scratched thumb was set aside because, aside from hearsay or conjecture, there was no proof that the deceased scratched or cut his thumb while engaged in his work, or that it was an accidental injury.

In his particulars of claim a dependent alleged that the workman was moving scenery "when a splinter was driven into the middle finger of his right hand," and that he had died of blood poisoning following on this injury. The doctor who attended the workman stated that he saw a place where a small wound had been in the middle finger of the deceased's right hand, and that the inflammation was in his right arm. But a fellow workman, who saw the deceased with a splinter in his finger and who removed it with a knife, said that the splinter was in the tip of the middle finger of the left hand. It was held that there was no evidence from which the arbitrator could find that there was an accident arising "out of and in the course of" the employment. Ford v. Gaiety Theatre [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 53, 7 B. W. C. C. 197.

A miner was required to work for some weeks in foul air and dioxide gas, which came from an old inclosed entry which was broken into. He became sick and was taken to a hospital, where he later died of septicemia. The medical testimony was to the effect that working in the bad air depleted the system of the deceased, and rendered him more susceptible, or less resistant, to disease. There was no other evidence connecting the conditions of work with the disease, and it was shown that the disease which caused death was caused by a definite infection by a germ. There was no evidence of the time, place, or manner of the infection. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain a finding that the disease causing death was attributable to the employment. Prouse v. Industrial Commission (1920) 69 Colo. 382, 194 Pac. 625.

A workman, while cutting kindling in the course of his duties, got a splinter in his finger. He died a week later of septicemia, claimed to have been a result of the injury. There was no evidence as to how or where he injured his finger, except the statements of his family, friends, and the physicians as to what the injured man had told them. No splinter was found in his finger by the physicians. It was held that there was no evidence on which a finding that the injury arose out of or in the course of his employment could be based. Valentine v. Weaver (1921) 191 Ky. 37, 228 S. W. 1036.

k. Cattle ringworm.

A girl who was employed to look after calves noticed at the beginning of February, 1915, that some of the calves had scabs on their necks and heads. The calves were kept in a pen, and when the girl went to feed them they used to push forward and try to get out. She had then to push them back, and sometimes she used a stick for this purpose, and sometimes her hand. On February 13, she noticed that her arm was breaking out in scabs, and on seeing a doctor she was found to be suffering from cattle ringworm. It was admitted by the employer that the cattle had the disease, which, according to the medical testimony, was contagious. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to show that the girl's illness was due to an injury arising out of and in the course of her employment. Scott v. Pearson [1916] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 61, 85 L. J. K. B. N. S. 825, [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 128, 114 L. T. N. S. 833, 60 Sol. Jo. 428, 32 Times L. R. 412, 9 B. W. C. C. 229.

A workman suffered a fall while engaged in his work at the plant of his employer. He made claim for compensation for a sarcoma or cancer on his left clavicle, which he contended resulted from his fall. The testimony of the physicians who were called as witnesses before the commission was in accord on the point that the lump or swelling indicating the presence of a sarcoma, if it was caused by a fall or a blow, would not make itself manifest on a bone on the day of the injury, or on the next day, but only after a "few days," at the earliest; and the evidence appeared to show that a sarcoma, once appearing, would remain apparent to palpation. The claimant, his wife, and a friend of his family all testified to the presence, three or four hours after the accident, of a lump at the place on the clavicle at which, according to the testimony of nearly all of the experts, there was, at the time of the hearing before the commission, a sarcoma. The physician who attended the claimant immediately after the accident, and on the same day it occurred, said that he then discovered no injury to him except a scalp wound. He saw the patient the next morning, however, and at the request of his wife made a special examination of his left shoulder, stripping it up and down, and going over it carefully. He said: "It was sensitive, also tender. I don't recall that it was swollen." The accident occurred on September 5, 1916, and on the 8th the physician took an X-ray picture of the region he had thus examined. He said: "It showed a normal condition of the clavicle." There was other testimony to the same effect from the same physician. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain an award in the claimant's favor. Santa Ana Sugar Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 35 Cal. App. 652, 170 Pac. 630.

A workman was blown a distance of 30 feet by the explosion of a still in the employer's plant. The only physical injury suffered as a result of the explosion was a bruise on the left side of his face, which disappeared in a few days. There remained, however, a pain in his jaw, first noticed the evening of the accident. The intensity of the pain continued to increase during the week, and the trouble was diagnosed by two physicians as malignant cancer, termed carcinoma. An operation was performed which gave temporary relief, but a recurrence of the disease a few months later resulted in his death, more than six months after the accident. At the time of the accident the workman was suffering from a slight cancerous affection of the cheek at or near the place of injury. There was medical testimony to the effect that the injury might have been the cause of the rapid development of the cancer. There was no evidence to indicate any other cause for the sudden change in the development of the disease from normal to abnormal. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to warrant a finding that the workman came to his death through the aggravation of the disease by the accident, and was, therefore, entitled to an award. Whittle v. National Aniline & Chemical Co. (1920) 266 Pa. 356, 109 Atl. 847.

An employee who rode a bicycle in the course of his work arrived at his employer's shop one day, lame, covered with mud, and wheeling the machine. He complained of injury caused by a side-slip, and went home, where he rested for two days. He then returned to work, though still suffering slightly from the effects of the fall. In about a month the pain became worse, and he consulted a doctor. A week later an operation was performed and cancer diagnosed. Two other operations were performed, but the workman died of sarcoma about five months later. The medical evidence was to the effect that the disease was brought about by the accident. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding in favor of the applicant. Haward v. Rowsell [1914; C. A.] W. C. Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 314, 7 B. W. C. C. 552, 111 L. T. N. S. 771.

The superintendent of a machinery company died of sarcoma of the ribs and pleura. Compensation was claimed by his widow on the ground that the disease was caused by an injury received during his employment. The only evidence of any injury was the statements made by the injured man to his wife that while engaged in his work he was struck by a casting, which fell when a chain broke, and that his side was hurt, and to a physician, who attended him five days later, that his injury was due to being thrown against an automobile lamp while cranking an automobile. This physician testified that he made a thorough examination, and did not then discover a fractured rib or any other serious injury to the side. The injured man did not consult another physician until sometime during the following August, when an examination disclosed a fractured rib. In the meantime it appears he had been in at least two automobile accidents, and, when complaining about his side, declared to at least one witness that it was due to one of such accidents, and to sustain this statement the foreman of the employer's plant testified that no casting fell while the superintendent was present. Another employee testified he was at work in the plant at the time when the accident was alleged to have occurred, and he never heard of it; and the one whose duty it was to make a report of all accidents also testified that she never heard of it. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to sustain an award in favor of the claimant, the court saying: "If an accident had occurred, as here claimed, to the superintendent and general manager, it is fairly to be inferred that someone other than himself would have heard of it, and yet not a single witness was produced to testify thereto. Under such circumstances, to permit a claim against the employer to be sustained is to base an award upon sympathy, and not evidence. This court has held that great liberality should be allowed in establishing claims under this statute, but in the final analysis, notwithstanding such liberality, there must be evidence setting forth facts of a probative character, outside of hearsay statements, to prove the award and show it is fair and just." Belcher v. Carthage Mach. Co. (1918) 224 N. Y. 326, 120 N. E. 735.

An employee of a construction company, while walking in a dark passageway, fell and broke his leg. He was taken to a hospital, and it was found that he had cancer of the bone at the point of the fracture. The attending physician testified that the disease was malignant and necessitated the amputation of the leg; that the amputation was rendered necessary by the disease alone; that if the accident had occurred as described, and there had been no disease at that point, no operation would have been necessary. The disease existed before the fracture. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain an award in favor of the claimant. Brady v. Holbrook C. & R. Corp. (1919) 189 App. Div. 405, 178 N. Y. Supp. 504. And upon a subsequent appeal in (1921) 195 App. Div. 74, 185 N. Y. Supp. 541, it was held that an award for the loss of the whole leg was not a proper one, but that the compensable injury should be limited to the fracture, exclusive of the bone cancer or any results flowing therefrom.

The claimant was employed in a department store. While pulling out a large drawer, in the work of cleaning up her department, she said she felt something snap in her chest, and fell fainting. In falling the drawer fell on her chest. She remained out of the store for three days, in the meantime submitting to an X-ray examination, which showed a negative result. She remained at work for seven months, when she visited a physician because of a rash on her breast, and was sent to a hospital where an operation for cancer of the breast was performed. The physician testified that it could not be said positively that a blow would cause cancer; that neither he nor anyone else knew; but that he connected the cancerous condition with the injury, because there was a certain amount of evidence that cancer might follow an injury. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to sustain a finding that the cancer was attributable to the injury. Schapiro v. Wanamaker (1921) 197 App. Div. 810, 189 N. Y. Supp. 843.

A workman crushed his finger in a drill at which he was working in the regular course of his employment. Blood poisoning set in, and for a time he complained of general soreness in different parts of his body. Settlement was made for the injury, and he returned to work for his employer, and remained in his employment for two years, doing substantially the same work as he had done before his injury. He then filed a petition for a rehearing, and asked for additional compensation because of disabilities that had recently developed. The physicians testified that he was suffering from a cancer which had recently developed in his private parts. Two testified that the injury to his hand received two years previously did not have anything to do with the cancer, while the third testified that the claimant's reduced vitality and run-down physical condition, imputable to his accident, might have contributed to the development of the cancer. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to show that the cancer was attributable to any injury received in the course of the employment. Ortner v. Zenith Carburetor Co. (1919) 207 Mich. 610, 175 N. W. 122.

m. Deafness.

An employee of a bridge company filed a claim for compensation, in which he alleged that while working in air pressure, sinking a pier, his left ear was injured, impairing his hearing. He did not testify himself, or introduce any evidence other than the report of the medical examination. This report showed an injury to the drum of the left ear, with a small amount of mucopurulent discharge, with total deafness in that ear. The report concluded with the statement that it was impossible to state whether the deafness was due to disease or injury. The attending physician's report stated that the appearance indicated a chronic ear disease, but the patient declared there had been no trouble previously. It was held that there was no evidence to support a finding that the deafness was due to an injury received during the course of the employment. Associated Employers' Reciprocal v. State Industrial Commission (1921) — Okla. —, 200 Pac. 862.

In Ferst v. Dictograph Products Corp. (1920) 193 App. Div. 564, 184 N. Y. Supp. 422, the work of the claimant was to assemble and test motor dictographs, which were manufactured by his employer. He had been engaged in this work about three weeks when his right ear began to trouble him with pains and temporary deafness. He thereafter received the sound of the dictograph with his left ear, instead of his right ear. After thus continuing his work about one week he suddenly felt sharp pains in the left ear, and found it bleeding freely. He said that he held the receiver about 1 foot from his ear, and never held it close to his ear. He further testified that it was his belief that the continual wear of the ear vibrations on the ear caused the irritation and final swelling and the bleeding. He tested about thirty or forty dictographs each day, and had never had any previous difficulty with his ears. Claimant was the only witness before the commission. He received medical treatment, but no medical evidence was offered. The medical adviser of the commission reported, after examination, that the left ear, from which blood and other substance was discharged, showed no evidence of injury to the drum; that the right ear showed evidence of a slight retraction and some fibrous band over the left upper half of the drum; that there was good hearing in both ears, with slight diminished hearing in the right ear as compared with the left; and that the claimant was able to continue his usual vocation. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to support an award in favor of the claimant, the court saying: "No causal relation has been established between the work performed by the claimant and his injury. It may have resulted from natural causes entirely independent of his work. The hiatus between cause and effect has not been bridged. In the absence of all proof on the subject, the commission was not justified in finding that the disease of the ears was the result of vibrations caused by the dictographs. No effort was made to prove that the vibrations could have caused such a result. It would seem that the physicians who examined claimant and prescribed for him could supply the necessary evidence, if his theory of the accident is correct."

n. Delirium tremens.

A workman was employed by an ice company as a driver on one of its wagons. On his return home from work one day he told his wife that a 300-pound cake of ice had fallen on his stomach. He made the same statement to a physician who was called in to treat him, to a neighbor, and to the physicians at the hospital where he was taken. He was suffering from an epigastric hemorrhage and rigidity of the stomach, and later developed delirium tremens, from which he died. A helper on the ice wagon and two cooks at the saloon where the ice was delivered testified that they were present at the time and place when it was alleged that the driver was injured, and that they did not see any accident whatsoever, or see any cake of ice fall. The physicians who subsequently examined the decedent testified that there were no bruises, discolorations, or abrasions on the surface of the body. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain an award in favor of the claimant, the court saying that, while hearsay evidence was admissible in workmen's compensation cases under the provisions of the statute, it was of no probative value as against the substantial evidence of eyewitnesses, which directly contradicted the hearsay evidence. Carroll v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. (1916) 218 N. Y. 435, 113 N. E. 507, reversing (1915) 169 App. Div. 450, 155 N. Y. Supp. 1.

o. Dermatitis.

An assistant to a hairdresser, while in the employ of the latter from October 21, 1913, to March 30, 1914, had to use a dry shampoo furnished by his employer. He left his employment on March 30, suffering from dermatitis on his hands. He alleged that this was caused by the use of the dry shampoo on January 17, 1914, and claimed compensation for injury by accident on that day. It was held that there was no evidence that the injury occurred during his employment, and compensation was properly denied. Petschelt v. Preis [1915; C. A.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 11, 8 B. W. C. C. 44, 31 Times L. R. 156.

p. Diabetes.

An employee, during the course of his employment, was caught between the door and casing of an elevator and severely injured. He was taken home in a nervous and dazed condition, and put to bed. There were black and blue marks over the seat of his liver, and he was suffering from shock. He grew steadily weaker, and seventeen days later he died. The medical testimony as to the cause of his death was in conflict. There was some evidence that he was suffering from diabetes and influenza at the time of the accident, and that his death was due to one or other of these diseases, while other doctors testified that up to the time of his death he was quite well, and there was evidence that he had never lost any time from illness, and for many years had not required the services of a physician. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that his death was attributable to his employment, whether the disease was caused wholly by the accident, or, being existent in a latent form, was developed and hastened by the accident. Geizel v. Regina Co. (1921) — N. J. L. —, 114 Atl. 328, affirmed on opinion below in (1922) — N. J. L. —, 116 Atl. 924.

An award of compensation was sustained in Balzer v. Saginaw Beef Co. (1917) 199 Mich. 374, 165 N. W. 785, in favor of an employee who suffered an accidental injury arising out of and in the course of his employment, and was thereafter found to be suffering from diabetes. The expert testimony was that the disease might have been caused by the injury, and he had previously been a strong healthy man, and had been pronounced a healthy man after an examination for life insurance about three months prior to the injury.

q. Diphtheria.

A carpenter was obliged, in the course of his employment, to enter a pit 20 inches below the floor level, and to lie down to perform his work. The pit was damp, and he was obliged to go out in the rain to get his materials, and got his clothes wet. When he went home at night he was not feeling well, and awoke in the morning with a cold, and later developed diphtheria. There was no evidence of anything in the nature of an accident occurring in the pit. The claimant's physician refused to testify that there was any necessary relation between the diphtheria and the work which the claimant was doing. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to sustain a finding that the diphtheria was attributable to the employment. Bixby v. Cotswold Comfortable Co. (1921) 195 App. Div. 659, 186 N. Y. Supp. 762.

r. Erysipelas.

An employee of an insurance company was required to visit various places at definite times, regardless of the weather conditions. One day, during the month of February, while in the regular course of his work, he traveled some 15 or 20 miles. The day was very cold, and he suffered a frostbite of the nose, which produced a lesion of the skin and surface tissues adjacent thereto. Subsequently he contracted erysipelas, from which he later died. The doctor testified that he diagnosed the injury on the day after the injury as frostbite, and on a later day, probably the next, he for the first time diagnosed the case as erysipelas. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that he contracted the disease from which he died as a result of the injury received in the course of his employment. Larke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1916) 90 Conn. 303, 97 Atl. 320.

s. Eye inflammation or infection.

A workman in falling from a ladder while engaged in the duties of his employment struck his head on the roof of a shed. The second day thereafter he experienced intense pain above the left eye and on the left side of the head, and ten or fifteen days thereafter lost the sight of his left eye. He had had no trouble with his eye before the injury. The medical testimony was to the effect that such an accident could cause the loss of the sight of the eye. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to sustain a finding in favor of the claimant. Struple v. Bishop (1916) 202 Ill. App. 349.

The finding of the board that detachment of the retina of the eye was attributable to a strain or exertion in lifting a heavy barrel, which fell and struck the employee on the knee, was held in Sullivan's Case (1922) — Mass. —, 134 N. E. 393, to be justified by evidence that on the night after the accident the employee observed some trouble with his eye and that the detachment was discovered twelve days thereafter, and the testimony of physicians to the effect that the accident caused the condition.

A workman while working in his employer's coal mine received an injury to his left eye. Following this injury he was not able to work for two or three weeks. He had the eye treated by eye specialists. His sight began to fail shortly after the injury, and in six or seven months thereafter he had completely lost the sight of both eyes. The attending physician testified that the condition of the man's eyes, the atrophy of the optic nerves, might have resulted from the injury which he had suffered. This statement, when taken in connection with the other evidence, was held to be sufficient to sustain a finding that the disability was attributable to the employment. Indiana Power & Water Co. v. Miller (1920) — Ind. App. —, 127 N. E. 837.

A carpenter suffered an injury while engaged in the course of his employment, and made claim for compensation on the ground that the injury resulted in the loss of the sight of one eye. He testified that up to the time of the accident he used either eye as convenience dictated, and that there had been no trouble with or diminution of his vision. A neighbor testified that about a year before the accident he was with the claimant when he was shooting hogs, and that he could shoot from one shoulder as well as the other, and that he never complained about his eyesight. The medical testimony was in direct conflict, it being the opinion of some of the physicians that the loss of sight could not have been caused by the injury, while others testified that it might have been so caused. There was no evidence that the claimant was ever afflicted with any germ-carrying disease which might have caused the trouble, and he testified that he was not and had never been so afflicted. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain an award in favor of the claimant. Nelson v. Industrial Ins. Dept. (1918) 104 Wash. 204, 176 Pac. 15, 17 N. C. C. A. 1057.

The claimant got a foreign substance in his eye while working at the plant of his employer. He testified that the substance was from an emery wheel. He visited in turn four doctors, one of whom testified that he removed the foreign substance from the claimant's eye. His eye continued to grow worse until it had to be removed. One physician testified that he found the claimant suffering from a corneal ulcer of the eye; that the cause was infection, which might result from getting emery dust in the eye, and from the inflammation attendant upon it; that a corneal ulcer depends on the abrasion of the corneal surface, and that it is usually secondary to an injury, and that you could not get an ulcer without an abrasion to the cornea. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the infection of the eye was due to an injury received during employment. Riley v. Mason Motor Co. (1917) 199 Mich. 233, 165 N. W. 745.

A woman employed as a kitchen servant in a restaurant was permitted, with other employees, to use the laundry in the basement of the hotel operated by her employer, for doing personal laundry. The evidence showed that, while engaged in the course of her employment, she was directed by the management of the restaurant to wash the dish towels; that accordingly she went to the laundry in the basement of the hotel and started to wash the towels, and at the same time included some of the clothes of herself and husband; that when she had finished washing she undertook to replenish the fire in the laundry stove; and that while in the act of breaking a stick of wood for the fire, a splinter flew into her right eye, inflicting the injury complained of. She also testified that she was required to and did wash dishes, scrub floors, prepare vegetables, wash dish towels, and do other kinds of work about the restaurant. An eye specialist testified that when he examined her about a week later he found a small wound in the eye with marked inflammation; that when he performed an operation on the eye he found a little splinter; that her eye was, as a result, practically useless. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the condition of the eye was due to an injury received in the course of the employment. Butch v. Shaver (1921) — Minn. —, 184 N. W. 572.

handle cement, testified that while putting loose cement in a sack on a windy day some of it got in his eye; that it caused pain and made the eye red; that the eye continually grew worse and more painful thereafter, although he applied various home remedies and remedies which he obtained at a drug store; that, these affording no relief, he consulted a doctor and applied the medicine prescribed by him; and that, his eye continuing to grow worse, he finally consulted an eye specialist. He first consulted the specialist about three months after the cement got in his eye. The specialist testified, as to the condition of the eye when he first examined it, that he had seen the action of cement on the exposed portion of the eye in many cases; that such action is caustic and corrosive, and destructive of the tissues; and that the condition in which he found claimant's eye might have resulted from getting cement in it. It was held that a finding that the loss of the eye resulted from getting cement in it, as alleged, was sustained by the evidence. Kraker v. Nett (1921) 148 Minn. 139, 180 N. W. 1014.

Where a workman stated in his application for compensation that dirt, or sawdust, or some other foreign substance entered his left eye while he was sawing timber, and in his testimony he said that he was sawing some timber, and the wind was strong, and the dust flew into his left eye, it was held that it could fairly be inferred that the dust caused by his sawing flew into his eye, and that the injury arose out of the employment. Dickinson v. Industrial Bd. (1917) 280 Ill. 342, 117 N. E. 438.

An employee, while working in a foundry in the dust, received an injury to his eye by a particle of some hard substance entering it. He continued to work; the eye pained him some in the afternoon and became inflamed, and was observed and commented on by persons whom he met on that evening and the following day. On the day after the injury he consulted an eye specialist, who testified that he removed a particle of some hard substance from the eye. That the eye was inflamed at the time and subsequently became infected, and he lost nine tenths of his normal vision. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the condition of the eye was due to an injury received in the course of the employment. Newcastle Foundry Co. v. Sopher (1918) 68 Ind. App. 509, 120 N. E. 713.

A workman suffered burns to his head, face, and limbs during the course of his employment. He was sent to a hospital, where his burns were treated. The claimant testified that when he left his bed, after a confinement of five or six weeks, he discovered that he could not see out of his left eye, and but little out of his right eye. The oculists testified that this condition had existed for a long time, and was due to causes of which they knew nothing, long preceding the injury from the burn. One oculist testified that he had the claimant come to him on two different occasions, in the hope that he would acknowledge more vision, or that he could prove that he was an exaggerator or malingerer, but that he was unable to do so, and his opinion that the claimant was exaggerating was based on no definite proof, but that his reason for disbelieving him was because he had never seen a case like it before. A contractor testified that the claimant had worked for him for eighteen years, on buildings, stages, beams, etc., and that there was nothing defective in his eyesight that showed in his work in those dangerous places. Coworkers said his eyesight was bad, but none could tell of any instance where he manifested it by acts or words. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to warrant a finding that the condition of his eyes was due to the injury received in his work. Raina v. Standard Gaslight Co. (1920) 193 App. Div. 54, 183 N. Y. Supp. 264.

The claimant, in the course of his employment, sustained an injury to his right eye which made its removal by operation necessary. Simultaneously with the operation the sight of the left eye became affected—became almost wholly lost. No injury appeared to have been done to the eyeball, the optic nerve, or any physical thing constituting a part of the organ of sight, yet distinguished physicians agreed that the claimant was not simulating blindness, and in fact did not see. A physician who was paid for his services as a witness by the employer stated: "He cannot see at all." He diagnosed the trouble as "traumatic neurosis," or "hysterical blindness," and said: "This psychic shock, the surgical operation which produced the shock, was the primary means of producing that hysterical blindness." It was held that an award in favor of the claimant was warranted, the court saying: "It is not important that the claimant has an uninjured physical equipment with which he should, but cannot, see. After all, a man sees with his brain, not with his eyeball or his optic nerve, and if an operation performed upon an eye so affects the mind, the nerves, or even the imagination, that a man genuinely loses vision with his other eye, then the faculty of sight has been more directly attacked than when assailed through the mechanical contrivances by which it functions." Weber v. George Haiss Mfg. Co. (1920) 191 App. Div. 12, 181 N. Y. Supp. 140, affirmed without opinion in (1920) 229 N. Y. 525, 129 N. E. 900.

A worker, while engaged in the work of welding rails, operated an electric welder which used about 550 volts of electricity. In the operation of welding a dazzling light was generated, and it was necessary for the welder to protect his eyes with colored glasses. While in the performance of his duties one set of the glasses broke and dropped, and he received the flash of light on his naked eye. For some minutes his sight was blurred so that he could not see, but after a few minutes' rest he replaced the broken glass and returned to work. His sight thereafter continued to fail until he was no longer able to work. The claimant was thirty-three years of age, and up to the time of the accident had never had any trouble with his eyes. About two years before this accident a doctor removed a little piece of solder from the right eye of the claimant. The injury was not a serious one, and had little, if any, permanent effect on his eye. The doctor tested the claimant's eyes at that time, and found the vision of his right eye to be two-fifths normal, and the vision of his left eye better than normal. Immediately after the accident his eyes began to pain him. They bothered him while he was at his work, and he was unable to sleep at night on account of the pain. On the 23d of May he resigned because his eyes were in such condition that he could no longer attend to the work. There was no evidence that the claimant was suffering from a pre-existing disease which might eventually have affected his eyesight. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the blindness was the result of the accident, and even if caused by the acceleration of a pre-existing disease, the claimant could nevertheless recover. Rockford City Traction Co. v. Industrial Commission (1920) 295 Ill. 358, 129 N. E. 135.

In Stansby v. Ayrton & Co. (1919; C. A.) 122 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 149, [1919] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 266, 12 B. W. C. C. 301, the applicant was employed as an apprentice turner. On September 11, 1918, he was engaged in turning a steel piston when a piece of steel flew off and entered his eye. He went to an eye hospital, and it was found that a piece of steel had lodged under his eyelid, and it was removed. He was prescribed for at the hospital and received from the dispensary some drops and a lotion. The applicant attended as an out-patient at the hospital for a considerable time, using the drops and the lotion. On October 19, 1918, when the applicant's eye was very much inflamed, he was seen by a doctor, and again on November 1, the first time the doctor saw him being considerably more than a month after the accident happened to him. Ultimately the eye had to be removed, which took place on November 5. The doctor testified that, as he could find no mark of any actual injury to the applicant's eye, he was driven to the conclusion that the inflammation must be attributable, not to a foreign body which had undoubtedly been in the eye, but to tuberculosis. He gave evidence, however, on cross-examination, to the effect that inflammation would follow the presence in the eye of such a foreign body as a piece of steel, and that, as he could not find any abrasion on the eye, he thought that there was some other cause, such as tuberculosis, for the inflammation. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the injury to the eye had resulted in its removal, and that it arose out of and in the course of the applicant's employment, the doctor's evidence as to the cause of the inflammation being merely conjectural.

A workman got a cinder from a passing locomotive in his eye, which a fellow workman removed from the eye with a piece of cotton. Later a gonorrheal infection developed in the eye, blinding him. It was held that the evidence sustained the finding that the accident occurred by reason of and in the course of his employment. Canadian P. R. Co. v. Flore (1915) Rap. Jud. Quebec 24 B. R. 55, 24 D. L. R. 710.

A workman employed by a manufacturing company was working on a rear axle with another employee, when a piece of steel flew and struck him in the right eye. At once, after the accident, a fellow workman examined the eye, using for that purpose a match wrapped in a piece of cloth. A gonorrheal infection set in, and he lost the sight of the eye. It was held that the evidence warranted the finding that the loss of sight was attributable to an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. Cline v. Studebaker Corp. (1915) 189 Mich. 514, L.R.A.1916C, 1139, 155 N. W. 519.

In State ex rel. Adriatic Min. Co. v. District Ct. (1917) 137 Minn. 435, L.R.A.1917F, 1094, 163 N. W. 755, it was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the accident occurred in the course of his employment, where it appeared that a workman received an injury to his eye, caused by a flying particle of iron ore, which was removed by a fellow workman by means of a match and a handkerchief which had been in use for several days; that the eye was then washed with water from a trough used in common by the miners; and that gonorrheal infection soon set in, causing the loss of the eye, it also appearing that the workman was not previously afflicted with the disease.

While a miner was breaking up a large chunk of iron ore with a hammer, a particle of ore flew into his left eye, cutting through the cornea and embedding itself in the eyeball. A fellow workman removed the particle from the eye at the time, using in his efforts a match and handkerchief. The eye was immediately thereafter washed in water from a trough which was used daily by other miners for the purpose of washing their hands and faces. Thereafter a gonorrheal infection set in, and the workman lost his sight. It was held that the finding that the accidental injury arose out of and in the course of the employment was sustained by the evidence. Ibid.

An employee working as a fitter suffered an injury to his eye from hot sparks flying into it. A doctor who saw him a month afterwards said that his eye was then practically well. Later, his eye became worse, and he was seen from time to time by the doctor, who testified that the condition of his eye on those later occasions pointed to some constitutional disease. Another doctor, who examined him five months after the accident, testified that the condition of the eye at that time was consistent with the accident. The medical assessor who advised the county court judge was of the opinion that the injury from which the applicant was suffering was not the result of the accident. It was held that a finding that the incapacity from which the applicant was suffering was not caused by the accident was supported by the evidence. Tucker v. Manganese Bronze & Brass Co. (1921; C. A.) 14 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 38, [1921] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 175.

subsequently set in, with the result that he was incapacitated. The medical evidence was that the germ which caused the inflammation could only have entered the eye through an abrasion, and that it could not have entered with the dust, or have been rubbed into it by the man in clearing his eye. There was no evidence to show how and when the germ got into the eye. It was held that, even assuming that the abrasion was caused by the workman in trying to clear his eye, the evidence was not sufficient to show that the condition of his eye was due to an injury arising out of his employment. Bellamy v. James Humphries & Sons [1913; C. A.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 169, 6 B. W. C. C. 53.

A miner, while breaking coal with a sledge, received an injury on September 26, 1918, by a small particle of rock striking his left eye and lodging therein. He went to a doctor, who found the particle of rock in the outer coating of the eye. There was some inflammation of the eyelids, but none of the iris, and the particle of rock had not gone through the outer coating of the eye. He returned to his work on September 30, and worked continuously up to March, 1919. In February he consulted a specialist, who, upon examination, found that his sight was defective, that there was a defect in the vision of both eyes, and the pupils did not react alike. The vitreous or jelly-like substance in the posterior of the eyes, behind the lenses and pupils, was filled with floating foreign bodies which the doctor called "exudates." He had suffered an injury to his right eye, for which he received compensation. The doctor testified that the lens and iris of each eye were normal, and the defect was due to the floating exudates or foreign bodies, which were not caused by, and had no relation to, the accident for which compensation was claimed, that the accident was not such as to increase or aggravate the existing condition, and that the condition was due to syphilis, a pre-existing disease of many years' standing. The applicant testified that he did not know there was anything wrong with the vision of his left eye before the accident, but after the accident he could not see as well as he did before, and had to look closely at objects to see what they were. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain a finding that the affection of the eyes was due to the injury received in the employment, but, on the contrary, was conclusive that it was not caused by the injury. Perry County Coal Corp. v. Industrial Commission (1920) 294 Ill. 117, 128 N. E. 333.

In Keller v. Industrial Commission (1922) 302 Ill. 610, 135 N. E. 98, the court was of the opinion that even if the employee was hit upon the head by a heavy piece of coal, as he claimed, the finding of the commission that the complete loss of the sight of one eye and partial loss of the sight of the other were attributable to that injury was against the weight of evidence, and should be reversed, in view of the expert evidence that the condition of the eyes was due to locomotor ataxia, and the fact that the employee returned to work nine days after the injury, the defect in the sight not appearing for several weeks after the injury.

In Pinto v. Chelsea Fibre Mills (1921) 196 App. Div. 221, 186 N. Y. Supp. 748, the claimant who was employed by a fibre mills company, and was engaged frequently in handling hemp, complained to the nurse employed by his employers that he had a sore eye. The nurse testified that he stated that he did not know what was the matter with it. She put some drops in. He testified originally that the injury was caused by getting some dust from the hemp with which he was working in his eye, but later admitted that the first thought of dust in his eye as the cause of the trouble came to him after it was suggested by his doctor, weeks after the alleged accident. There was no evidence that the dust alleged to have lodged in the claimant's eye contained any germs, or was apt to cause any serious trouble to the eye. It was shown that he was suffering from an ulcer of the cornea, and had sustained 90 per cent loss of vision in that eye. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to sustain an award in the claimant's favor, there being a total lack of evidence that the dust either got in his eye, or that it carried disease germs which could cause an ulcer if it did get in the eye. In such cases the court said that the presumption in favor of claimants provided by the statute was unavailable, citing the reported case (ELDRIDGE v. ENDICOTT, J. & Co. ante, 1).

A workman, while assisting a fellow employee in chipping a casting in the regular course of his employment, was struck in the eye by a piece of the casting. Two doctors testified that there was inflammation perceptible after the accident; that he had a cataract on his left eye which reduced his vision in that eye approximately 70 per cent; that the cataract was in the same stage of development immediately after the accident, and some nine months later, and that in their opinion the accident had nothing to do with the trouble with the eye. The claimant testified that before the accident he could see all right, but did not state whether he referred to his left eye or to his vision generally. His right eye was not impaired in any way. One doctor, assuming that he was struck in the eye, that the eye became inflamed, and that because of the condition of the eye his vision was greatly impaired, testified that in his opinion the trouble was due to the accident. He gave no facts to justify his assumptions. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to sustain a finding that the diseased condition of the eye was attributable to the injury received in the course of employment, the court saying that the only possible foundation for the award was the testimony of the claimant and a doctor's conclusion from unjustified assumptions. Landau v. E. W. Bliss Co. (1921) 199 App. Div. 145, 191 N. Y. Supp. 454.

A teamster fell from his wagon and broke his ankle. Previous to the accident he was suffering from syphilis, which manifested itself a week later by a dimness of vision, which finally became almost total. The medical testimony was to the effect that, though the accident might have accelerated the disease, it was so far advanced that it was only a matter of a comparatively short time when he must have reached the condition he was in, though no accident had happened. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to support a finding that the disease was the result of an accident received during the course of the employment. Borgsted v. Shults Bread Co. (1917) 180 App. Div. 229, 167 N. Y. Supp. 647.

While a workman was engaged on a machine a small splinter of steel became lodged in his eye. In rubbing the eye it was infected with gonorrhea, from which he was suffering. It was held that the evidence did not permit an inference that the infection was a proximate consequence of the accident. McCoy v. Michigan Screw Co. (1914) 180 Mich. 454, L.R.A.1916A, 323, 147 N. W. 572, 5 N. C. C. A. 455.

So, it has been held that an award of compensation must be set aside, as having been made on insufficient evidence, where the commission found that while the employee, a plumber, was lying on his back to fix the hot-water cock of a wash basin, something fell into his eye, which caused acute pain, and impelled the rubbing of the eye, and that gonorrheal infection developed, resulting in the loss of the eye, and further found that the substance which fell into the eye might have been infected, or, "with the eye inflamed, it might have become infected by rubbing it with an infected cloth, or washing it with infected water, or in other ways," although it was found that the claimant had no gonorrheal infection except that which developed in his eye. Voelz v. Industrial Commission (1915) 161 Wis. 240, 152 N. W. 830.

A hot-water fitter met with an accident, while making a hole in a brick wall for fitting a hot-water cylinder, through a piece of brick flying into his left eye. The man did no more work, and the eye was examined, first, by a man at the works, who found nothing in it, then at home, by his mother and brother, and in the evening by a chemist. Two days later he was admitted into a hospital suffering from gonorrheal infection of the eye, as a result of which he lost the sight of it. The doctor who examined him at the hospital found no injury to the eye apart from the discharge due to the infection. The evidence was that the infection could take place without any wound in the eye, either from an infected finger or from an infected rag or cloth touching it. It was held that the evidence showed that the loss of the eye was not due to the original trifling injury by accident, aggravated by infection, but was due to the infection as an independent cause, and was therefore sufficient to support a finding that the accident was not attributable to the employment. Doolan v. Henry Hope & Sons (1918) 87 L. J. K. B. N. S. (Eng.) 671, (1918) W. C. & Ins. Rep. 121, 119 L. T. N. S. 14, 11 B. W. C. C. 93.

A finding by the commission that there were times when claimant could not wear glasses while engaged in the regular course of his employment, due to the nature of his employment (the commission having also found that the defective vision could be corrected to normal with glasses), was held in McNamara v. McHarg-Barton Co. (1922) 200 App. Div. 188, 192 N. Y. Supp. 743, to be unsupported by claimant's statement that it was very inconvenient for him to wear glasses, and—in reply to the question why he did not wear goggles when doing such work as occasioned his injury—that it was very dark in the boiler room, and he required all the light possible, and if he covered his eyes with goggles he could not see.

In Perkins v. Jackson Cushion Spring Co. (1919) 206 Mich. 98, 172 N. W. 374, the claimant's work consisted in putting strips in metal frames by the use of a pair of pliers. In this work a bone felon developed. The testimony showed that the strips were shorter than usual, and required the exertion of more strength to put them in place. There was no evidence of abrasion of the skin resulting in infection, but the infection developed between the bone and the covering of the bone. There was evidence that this might have resulted from a blow or from continued pressure. There was no evidence of a blow. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to justify a finding that the felon was due to an accident received in the course of the employment.

A carpenter, while engaged in his employment, was required to make frequent use of a screw driver, which he alleged resulted in a frog felon in the palm of his hand. He testified that he did not know definitely just what caused the pain or injury, but he believed it was caused by the constant use of the screw driver; that the pain was several days coming on; that at no time did he get a splinter in his hand, or any particle of grit, or anything that was ground into his hand from the screw driver, but he thought it was just from its continual use; that it bruised the flesh; that at times he fastened a pin in the jamb, and then would set his screw driver there and hit it with his hand; that his hand felt tender at the time, but that he had never had anything like this. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to establish that the felon was the result of bruising his hand by the continued use of the screw driver. Woodruff v. R. H. Howes Constr. Co. (1920) 228 N. Y. 276, 127 N. E. 270, reversing (1919) 189 App. Div. 395, 178 N. Y. Supp. 418.

u. Gas Inhalation.

An employee was engaged in wheeling lime from a kiln in a lime room of his employer. Lime dust was present and gases were generated, so that it was necessary to keep a pump in constant operation to draw off the gases from the room. While so engaged he became violently ill, suffering with pains in his chest and arms. He was taken home, and died about four hours later. An autopsy was performed, and two physicians testified that he died of carbon monoxide poisoning. Other physicians testified that the cause of death was bronchial pneumonia, in no way connected with gas poisoning. It was shown that at least two other employees had been previously affected by gas while working in the lime room. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to sustain a finding that the death was due to carbon monoxide poisoning suffered in the course of employment. Amalgamated Sugar Co. v. Industrial Commission (1920) 56 Utah, 80, 189 Pac. 69.

v. Gastralgia.

A workman alleged that he had strained himself while carrying a bar of iron. He continued to work for three weeks, after which he was examined by a doctor. The doctor was of opinion that the gastralgia, or pain in the stomach, from which the workman was suffering, was consistent with a strain such as he said he had suffered. The case was referred to specialists whose reports were not submitted to the court. The only evidence in support of the alleged accident was that of the applicant and his mate. The county judge was not satisfied with the way they gave their evidence. One Dunkley, who was present at the time of the alleged accident, and was stated to have heard the workman's complaint, was subpoenaed as one of the applicant's witnesses, but was not called by him, whereupon the solicitor for the employers asked the judge to call Dunkley, as he was a material witness. The judge assented without formal opposition from the workman's counsel. The judge did not question Dunkley, but the employer's solicitor did, and elicited from him that he had not heard any complaint at the time the alleged strain occurred. The judge found that the onus of proving the accident had not been discharged. The workman appealed on the ground that the judge had wrongly admitted the evidence of Dunkley, and had been influenced thereby, and that the judge was wrong in finding that there was no evidence of the accident. It was held that, apart from Dunkley's evidence, the workman had not discharged the onus of proving an accident. Trigg v. Vauxhall Motors (1914)

v. Heart disease.

A workman employed as a painter, while in the course of his work, fell from a ladder, sustaining a fracture of the pelvic bone. He died in two weeks from the rupture of the right ventricle of the heart. He was thirty-eight years old, and had been in good health prior to the accident. After falling from the ladder, he was taken to a hospital, and the injured hip was incased in a plaster cast. He remained in the hospital, confined to his bed, and was apparently making satisfactory progress toward recovery, until the 14th day of November, 1915, when he suddenly died. The ensuing autopsy disclosed, as the immediate cause of death, a small rupture of the right ventricle of the heart. The surgeon who performed the autopsy stated that the wall of the ventricle was unusually thin, but that in other respects the heart was in normal condition. He did not discover an embolus. He, as well as the attending physician, inclined to think that the facts did not indicate any causal connection between the injury and the subsequent heart rupture. On the other hand, a pathologist, who had made a microscopic examination of the heart, testified in effect that, while the wall of the ventricle was thin, it was not more so than in many cases of men in normal health; that, in the absence of any sudden or great exertion on the part of the deceased (of which there was no evidence), he would attribute the rupture to a sudden pressure of blood upon the wall of the ventricle, and that such pressure might well have been caused by the lodging of an embolus in an artery leading from the heart to the lungs. Such an embolus could have resulted from the pelvic fracture, and been carried from the point of its origin to the heart. He testified, further, that an embolus was easily lost or overlooked in the course of an autopsy, and that the failure to discover one did not necessarily indicate that it had not existed. It was held that there was evidence on which a finding that the heart trouble was caused by the accident could be based, as under the law absolute proof or mathematical demonstration was not required. Santa v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 175 Cal. 235, 165 Pac. 689.

A workman employed as a sweeper sustained an injury on October 29, 1919, by an automobile seat slipping off a truck and striking him on the right leg between the knee and ankle. A severe bruise resulted. He was taken to a hospital, where his wound was dressed, and afterwards to his home. On November 7 the wound became infected, and he was removed to a hospital, where he remained until November 18. He was then able to walk with the aid of others. His wife and daughters testified that on the second or third day after his return he again began to complain of pain and soreness, and this continued. The wound "looked worse, . . . more inflamed, . . . awful dark red," and began to discharge matter of a "whitish" color, streaked with blood. His condition grew worse until the morning of November 24, when he died. A short time before his death, he complained much of the pain in his leg, and said that it was "crawling up to his chest." A post-mortem was held. The doctor testified that he found a thrombus, or blood clot, at the mouth of the left coronary artery of the heart, which in his opinion was the cause of death, and that the injury in no way contributed to it. Another doctor, who was present, was of the same opinion. A third doctor was called as an expert by the applicants. In answer to a hypothetical question, fairly embodying the facts as testified to by the witnesses for applicants, he stated that in his opinion the "accident contributed to or resulted in the man's death." He testified that bacteria from the infection might have gotten into the artery and produced the condition revealed by the post-mortem. It was held that there was evidence sufficient to sustain a finding that death was attributable to an injury received in the course of the employment. The court said that, while the testimony of the surgeons might seem conclusive to them, "we may only set aside the award when the record contains no testimony to facts or theory amounting to legal evidence that death is attributable to the accident." Krueger v. Hayes Mfg. Co. (1921) 213 Mich. 218, 181 N. W. 1010.

A workman, who was employed on a "band press," a machine used to press copper bands around shells, slipped on a T-rail extending about an inch above the level of the floor, as he took a shell and started towards the press. He fell and hit his breast against the lever that operated the press, an iron rod with a steel handle, and was injured. After the injury there was found a mark over his heart about 5 inches long, and his attending physician testified that the fall brought on a condition of the heart known as "pericarditis," which caused the death. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to show an injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the decedent's employment, which proximately caused the death. Bucyrus Co. v. Townsend (1917) 65 Ind. App. 687, 117 N. E. 656.

The finding of the commission awarding compensation was held to be warranted where the evidence, apparently in harmony with the medical testimony, was to the effect that the accident was a sufficient producing cause of the acute pericarditis, and that the bruising of the chest from the accident was sufficient to cause a traumatic injury to the membrane surrounding the heart, causing the ultimate death. LaFleur v. Wood (1917) 178 App. Div. 397, 164 N. Y. Supp. 910.

An employee of an automobile company was directed to go up on a gondola car to put keys in the trucks he had been helping to load. He went to obey the order, and a few minutes later was found on the ground in a half-reclining position, resting one arm near the foot of the ladder running up on the side of the car. When he was assisted to his feet he said that he was hurt. He walked to his home, and was soon visited by a doctor, who testified he found him suffering much pain and in a condition of shock, and gave it as his opinion that the shock proceeded from an injury. Two physicians gave it as their opinion that he died from acute dilatation of the heart, and that this could be, and was usually, produced by a fall, or by overexertion, or by jumping. The workman was a man fifty-one years of age, in good health, with no known tendency to heart trouble. He had been working in the usual way on the day of the accident. It was held that the evidence justified an award in favor of the claimant, the court saying: "We are not of the opinion that we should say, as a matter of law, that there is no testimony to support the award. If it be known that a person is on an elevated object, and soon after he is found lying on the ground at the foot of the ladder which leads to the elevation, in a half-reclining position, complaining of being hurt, it would not be an unnatural inference that in his attempt to return he had fallen to the ground." Shaw v. Packard Motor Car Co. (1921) 214 Mich. 660, 183 N. W. 767.

A workman engaged in lifting a heavy weight in the course of his employment strained himself. He complained of a pain, and asked that someone else be substituted in his place to do the rest of the lifting. On the following day he went to a physician, who diagnosed his trouble as heart difficulty, and prescribed for him accordingly until he died about ten days later. His wife testified that prior to the accident he had never before complained of illness. It was held that the evidence favored the presumption that the claim was within the law created by § 21 of the New York Workmen's Compensation Statute, and that there was no substantial evidence to overcome this presumption, and therefore an award in favor of the claimant was sustained. Gibbons v. Marx & Rawolle (1917) 181 App. Div. 142, 168 N. Y. Supp. 412.

A structural iron worker, while engaged in the duties of his position, was injured by being struck on the forehead with an air hammer which he was using. At the time of the accident he was a vigorous, well-nourished man, and had never complained of being sick, or of any trouble with his heart. Immediately after receiving the blow he threw his hands over his face, and walked around for a few minutes, and then returned to his work. The blow was of sufficient force to produce a discolored spot about an inch in diameter, and three or four other smaller places around the nose and beneath the eyebrows, where the skin was broken. He left his work at noon, and complained that he was getting "awfully sick," and that his head was "hurting fit to kill." A little later he went home and died in about half an hour. An autopsy was performed, which showed no apparent injury to the skull or brain. The heart was removed, and it was found that the tissue on the posterior side of the right auricle had degenerated to such an extent that it was but slightly thicker than paper, and was ruptured. The direct and immediate cause of death was the rupture of the heart. Four or five physicians testified. Two of them, in answer to the hypothetical questions, testified that in their opinion the rupture of the heart which caused death was a probable result of the shock produced by the blow on the head. Others testified that the blow did not cause the rupture, and that the blow had nothing to do with the rupture. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the death was attributable to an injury received in the course of the employment. Mansfield Engineering Co. v. Winkle (1921) — Ind. App. —, 133 N. E. 390.

A workman was employed as a coal miner. During the course of his work he was at times required, with the help of others, to push a car from one room in the mine to another. After having assisted on one occasion in pushing a car which required unusual physical effort, he complained of a pain in his side and was compelled to lie down. He was removed to the office of the company, and died about three hours later. An autopsy showed that the aorta had ruptured at a point where it was unnaturally thin, indicating a diseased condition, and the medical testimony was to the effect that, when such a condition existed, a rupture of the aorta might occur from any exertion, such as laughing or coughing, and that from the appearance of the aorta it looked as though it might have been caused by a strain or exertion of some kind. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the death of the workman was attributable to his work. Indian Creek Coal & Min. Co. v. Calvert (1918) 68 Ind. App. 474, 119 N. E. 519, 120 N. E. 709.

A workman employed as a repair man in and about a colliery, while engaged with other workmen in taking a buggy or small car up a breast in his employer's mine, received a sprained back. This was followed by cardiac collapse, from which he died in about three weeks. The medical testimony was to the effect that a cardiac collapse could be the result of a strain, and the attending physician said that he knew of no other cause in this case. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the death of the employee was attributable to his employment. Tracey v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. (1921) 270 Pa. 65, 112 Atl. 740.

A workman was employed by a mining company in looking after its line of pipe, used for the purpose of conveying silt from the surface into its mine. His duties were to keep the line in repair, and in order to enable him to examine it underground he carried an open lamp. One morning his lifeless body was found inside the mine, a short distance from this pipe line, and his lighted lamp about 2 feet away from him. His clothing was burning and he had severe burns on his body. He was in a kneeling position, on his hands, and apparently had been vomiting. The medical testimony was to the effect that his death was due to a rupture of the aorta, a large blood vessel leading from the heart. The workman was afflicted with a syphilitic condition in which he might have lived four or five years, or his death might have occurred at any time, but which rendered him more susceptible to a rupture of the aorta than he otherwise would have been. It was held that there was evidence to sustain a finding that the workman came to his death through an extra effort in vomiting, while engaged in discharging his duties as an employee. Clark v. Lehigh Valley Coal Co. (1919) 264 Pa. 529, 107 Atl. 858.

A miner working in a pit was called on to render assistance to an injured fellow workman, and, having fetched a stretcher, helped to place the injured man on it and to carry him a distance of over half a mile through the pit workings. After the party had been brought up to the top of the shaft the workman started, as one of the stretcher bearers, to go to the ambulance, but as he was seen to be looking very white and ill, he was relieved of the duty, and shortly afterwards he collapsed and died. The medical evidence showed that he was suffering from heart disease in an advanced stage, in which sudden death might be caused by any unusual exertion. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to support a finding that the workman's death was hastened by the extra and unusual exertion of carrying a heavy man an unusual distance, and therefore that it was due to accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. Treasure v. Cardiff Colliers [1920; C. A.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 18, 13 B. W. C. C. 28.

A workman was descending the side of a ship by a rope ladder. The ladder twisted suddenly, he gave a cry, fell into the water, and was dead when picked up. The medical evidence was that death was due to heart failure, and not to drowning, and that the heart was in such a state that any slight exertion might have caused its failure. It was held that there was evidence to support the finding of the county court judge that death was due to "accident arising out of and in the course of the employment." Trod- den v. J. McLennard & Sons (1911) 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 190.

A miner, with other employees, on going down into a mine to engage in their usual work, found the place at which they were to work so full of smoke that they could not remain with comfort or safety, and for that reason returned to the top of the mine. Immediately after the miner came out of the mine, he walked a short distance to a stairway, sat down on one of the steps, and then fell over. On being carried into the office he was found to be dead. On examination at an autopsy held by the coroner, it was found that he had been afflicted with a serious chronic heart disease. The evidence showed that the smoke which caused the employees to leave the mine had been produced by firing explosives early that morning for the purpose of loosening the coal, so that it could be more easily and more rapidly mined, and sufficient time had not elapsed for the air to become pure again before the men went down to work. Where air is impregnated with smoke of this kind, it has a bad effect on persons who breathe it, and if inhaled too long will prove fatal. Several others were made sick by inhaling the smoke. Two physicians who attended the autopsy testified that in their opinion the man's death did not result from inhaling the impure air in the mine, but from chronic heart disease. There was no direct evidence that the smoke-laden air hastened the death, but the court held that it was not necessary to establish that fact, where other proven facts would warrant such an inference, and sustained an award in favor of the claimant. The court said: "It was the province of the industrial board to draw any reasonable inference from such facts. It evidently drew the inference that the same elements in the air of the mine which caused other workmen to become weak, dizzy, and blind, to have rapid pulsations, headache, and shortness of breath, to become sick and vomit, so affected the decedent that death followed, because his diseased heart was unable to withstand the added burden placed on it by inhaling the smoke-laden air while in the mine, and in making an effort to escape from its evil effects. With such an inference in support of the finding in question, it is fully sustained by the evidence. We are unable to say that it is not a reasonable inference, and therefore we have no right to disregard it, although we might consider a contrary inference equally as reasonable." Utilities Coal Co. v. Herr (1921) — Ind. App. —, 132 N. E. 262.

A woman with a weak heart was employed in dragging carpets over a table. She testified that while so working she felt something give, but thought it would pass away. She continued to work until it was time for lunch. She started to eat her lunch, but could not eat any, and went to work again; then she felt something else give way. Other witnesses testified that the woman had claimed that she "had an awful pain under her heart." The arbitration committee found that the work the woman was doing aggravated her weak heart so as to incapacitate her for work. It was held that there was evidence to justify this finding. Madden's Case (1916) 222 Mass. 487, L.R.A.1916D, 1000, 111 N. E. 379.

A workman was employed in loading heavy bags onto trucks, and then pushing the loaded trucks onto a railway. The work was heavy, and three men were employed on it so that one man might rest while the other two worked, except that all three pushed a truck. The workman had been working all morning, and in the afternoon he had just joined with the other two men in pushing a truck, when he fell, and died soon afterwards. The medical evidence was that the workman was suffering from fatty degeneration of the heart, but that the disease was not so far advanced that he would have died without being subjected to some strain. It was held that there was evidence to support the finding of the county court judge that the man died of a strain arising "out of and in the course of" his employment. Doughton v. Hickman [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 143, 6 B. W. C. C. 77.

Where the evidence adduced is equally consistent with the fact that heart failure was not the result of an accident, as with the fact that it was, and there is no evidence of any strain, it will not be inferred that it was the result of an accident arising in the course of employment. Kerr v. Ritchie (1913) S. C. 613, 50 Scot. L. R. 434, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 297, 6 B. W. C. C. 419.

A miner was injured by being caught between two coal cars, bruising his body in the region of the lower left ribs. He was fifty years old, and before the accident had worked on a farm, and for four or five months prior to the accident had worked in this coal mine. He had always been able to do such work, and testified that he had never had any kind of heart trouble or internal trouble before his injury; that at the time of the accident he did not think he was hurt, and went back to his work, but could not get his breath, and was sent home in a buggy; that a doctor bandaged him, and he had been under the care of that doctor and another since his injury; that his heart ached, his head felt like it was going to burst, and his heart felt filled up and heavy. The doctor who treated applicant at the time of the injury and bandaged him, and also treated him at different times up to the hearing, testified that he was suffering from myocarditis, an organic disease of the heart caused by infection, and consisting of degeneration of the heart muscles; that the disease is never the result of an outside injury or force applied to the body; that he had examined the applicant thoroughly since the injury, and he was in a bad condition, weak and emaciated, but there were no results remaining from the injury which could possibly cause myocarditis; and that he had a temporary disability, only, from the injury. The other doctor who had treated the applicant testified that when he saw him after the accident he had received an injury of the left lower ribs, which, from the nature of the injury, appeared to be a light blow; that he had been strapped for the injury, and was having considerable trouble with his heart, and abnormal respiration, and that the squeezing he had could have aggravated the condition that was already there, but the heart disease was present before the time of the injury. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to sustain a finding that the condition of the applicant was due to the injury, the court saying that, while compensation might be awarded where an injury had aggravated or intensified an existing disease, there was no evidence tending to show that such was the case. Springfield Dist. Coal Min. Co. v. Industrial Commission (1921) 300 Ill. 28, 132 N. E. 752.

An employee was engaged in his ordinary work as a surface laborer for a mining company, consisting, on the day of his injury, of unloading a car of ties on a coal trestle, when he collapsed and fell a short distance, receiving superficial scratches or bruises on his face. He died shortly of heart failure. Prior to the alleged injury he had been confined to his home for some months, and a part of that time to his bed, suffering from organic heart trouble, described by physicians as being a leakage of the valves of the heart. The testimony of the physicians was to the effect that, in the condition the workman was in, death might have come to him while lying quiet, even while taking a breath. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain a finding that the death was attributable to an injury received in the course of the employment. Johnson v. Mary Charlotte Min. Co. (1917) 199 Mich. 218, 165 N. W. 650.

A workman, while engaged in the duties of his employment, sustained injuries consisting of a dislocated shoulder and contusions. The dislocation was immediately reduced, and he remained under the care and treatment of a physician for a month. He never returned to work. About two months after his injury he fell on the street and was assisted to his home, where he died the same day without medical attendance. The death certificate filed in the department of health recited that the chief and determining cause of death was "chronic cardiac valvular disease." There was no evidence that the workman had heart disease at the time of his accident. There was no evidence, other than the death certificate, that he died of heart disease. The physician who treated the workman after his accident testified that he examined his heart twice during the time he was treating him, and found no heart trouble. When the death certificate was called to his attention he testified that he did not think that the injury had anything to do with his death. The widow testified that he had never had heart trouble, or been sick before the injury. The physician who signed the death certificate never saw the workman during his life. He was not present at his death, nor for three hours thereafter. No autopsy was performed. It was held that a finding that death was caused by heart disease which was aggravated by the injury was not warranted by the evidence. Nestor v. Pabst Brewing Co. (1920) 191 App. Div. 312, 181 N. Y. Supp. 477. On a second hearing of this case the additional evidence of a medical expert was given. He testified that, in his opinion, based on the facts disclosed by the record, eliminating the death certificate, the injury was a contributing cause. It was again held that the evidence was insufficient to sustain an award in favor of the claimant. (1921) 195 App. Div. 434, 186 N. Y. Supp. 828.

A farm laborer, apparently in good health, died suddenly while engaged, in the course of his ordinary work, in lifting baskets of corn to feed a bruising machine. It was held that there was no evidence to sustain a finding that the workman died from heart failure, induced by the strain of repeated stooping and lifting the baskets of corn. Kerr v. Ritchie [1913] S. C. 613, 50 Scot. L. R. 434, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 297, 6 B. W. C. C. 419.

An employee engaged in baling scrap copper was found lying on the floor with a completed bale, also on the floor, about 2 feet from him. He was still breathing, and died within half an hour of heart disease. There was no evidence tending to prove any accidental injury. There was no mark on his person, and nothing from which it could be inferred that an accident had occurred, the claimant relying solely on the fact that the heavy work which the workman was doing caused or hastened his death. It was held that a finding denying compensation on the ground of insufficiency of evidence was justified. Jakub v. Industrial Commission (1919) 288 Ill. 87, 123 N. E. 263.

A workman was employed as a machinist by a shipbuilding company. While engaged with fellow workmen in repairing a gear, he fell and was found by the fellow workmen lying on the floor. When a doctor arrived he was found to be dead. The medical evidence was to the effect that he died of heart disease. The temperature of the room in which he was working was from 75 to 78 degrees, the room was ventilated by two portholes, and his physician testified that the temperature was not excessive, and would not have produced death from heart disease. The work he was doing when he fell was lifting, with the aid of two others, a metal cover weighing about 100 pounds. There was no evidence that there was anything specially heavy about the work, or that he made any special effort, or suffered a strain. There was no evidence of a slip, and there was evidence that there was nothing present to cause a slip. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a finding that the death was due to an injury received in the course of the employment. Guthrie v. Detroit Shipbuilding Co. (1918) 200 Mich. 355, 167 N. W. 37.

A workman suffering from a diseased heart had to leave work, owing to shortness of breath and faintness caused by failure of his heart. The county court judge inferred, from a consideration of his condition before and after the day when he left work, that he must have suffered from a strain at his work, and that this arose out of the employment. It was held that there was no evidence to support the inference. Beaumont v. Under- ground Electric R. Co. (1912) 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 247.

A workman collapsed at work, and died the same day from angina pectoris. His heart had long been in a bad condition, and angina pectoris, according to the medical evidence, might have been brought on by slight exertion, or by other causes. The county court judge found that the angina had been brought on by exertion at work, that this exertion was an accident, and that the accident arose out of the employment. It was held (without deciding whether the occurrence was an accident) that the burden had not been discharged of proving that the death arose out of the employment, the evidence being equally consistent with various inferences as to the cause. Hawkins v. Powells Tillery Steam Coal Co. [1911] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 988, 80 L. J. K. B. N. S. 769, 104 L. T. N. S. 365, 27 Times L. R. 282, 55 Sol. Jo. 329, 4 B. W. C. C. 178.

In arbitration proceedings to recover compensation, the arbitrator found that the claimant, while, in the course of the employment, lifting a derailed hutch, felt a sharp pain near the heart, followed by palpitation and shortage of breath, and that on being examined the claimant was found to be suffering from advanced disease of the heart, which was of long standing, was in its nature progressive, and bound to manifest itself sooner or later. He thereupon held that it was not proved that the lifting of the hutch accelerated the disease. It was held that the arbiter was entitled to find that the claimant had not proved that he had sustained an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. Spence v. William Baird & Co. [1912] S. C. 343, 49 Scot. L. R. 279, [1912] W. C. Rep. 18, 5 B. W. C. C. 542.

x. Heat stroke.

An employee received a personal injury from sunstroke while working in a gravel or sand pit, in the usual course of his employment. The day of his injury was one of the hottest of the summer. The pit had high banks, which attracted the extreme heat and shut out the wind except from the south. The nature of his work required him to remain at it steadily. While he had the same right to leave his employment as any employee had when sickness overtook him, he had no prior warning of the attack of sunstroke, was taken unawares, and was overcome thereby. The heat in the gravel pit was greater than the heat to which the ordinary worker was exposed on the day of the injury. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the disability of the workman was due to his employment. McCarthy's Case (1919) 232 Mass. 557, 123 N. E. 87.

A workman was engaged in shoveling coal in the regular course of his employment. The day was unusually hot, as had been the three preceding days. During the morning he felt the effects of the heat, and at 11 o'clock in the forenoon he collapsed as a result of the heat. At all times after the collapse he had a very high temperature, and on the same day he died of sunstroke, or thermic fever. The employment did not expose the workman in a substantially greater degree to heat and the effects of the sun than others in the same employment, but his exposure was far greater than the exposure of the community generally. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that the injury and death were attributable to his employment. Ahern v. Spier (1918) 93 Conn. 151, 105 Atl. 340. See to the same effect, Cunningham v. Donovan (1919) 93 Conn. 313, 105 Atl. 622.

An engineer, employed in the engine room of a ship sailing in the tropics, collapsed from heat stroke, and subsequently died. The temperature of the engine room was 114 degrees Fahrenheit. There was evidence that the engineer was physically unfitted to withstand the normal heat of a tropical climate. It was held that the evidence warranted a finding that the death resulted from an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. Maskery v. Lancashire

Shipping Co. [1914; C. A.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 290, 7 B. W. C. C. 428.

A workman was employed as an engineer at a pumping station. He was fifty-seven years old, was about 5 feet, 10 inches, tall, and weighed about 200 pounds. On July 30 it was very hot, the thermometer registering over 100 degrees, as it had for several days before. He went to work Sunday morning, and was seen at work in the engine room about 12 o'clock, standing in front of the compressor, which he was wiping with some waste. Soon after 1 o'clock his wife came to the building to bring him his lunch, and found him unconscious on a bench in the room. He was taken home in an ambulance, and died in a few minutes after the arrival of a physician, who had been summoned, and who testified that he died from heat stroke. There was evidence that the temperature in the pumping station was considerably higher than that outside. It was held that a finding that the man's death was due to his employment was sustained by the evidence. Joliet v. Industrial Commission (1920) 291 Ill. 555, 126 N. E. 618.

A workman was engaged in unloading lumber from a box car. The temperature was 90 degrees and the humidity was 82. When called to work in the morning by a fellow employee, he complained that he was not feeling well, that he had been up all the night before vomiting. After going to work he again complained of being sick, and had to rest. He wished to leave the work, but was persuaded to remain until nearly noon. At 6 o'clock that evening he was found lying dead among the lumber piles. The coroner's inquisition contained the statement that he came to his death by "heat insolation." The employer testified that the deceased had complained to him of being sick, and he had told him to rest up; that probably the heat had gotten him a little. It was held that, while the evidence was chiefly made up of hearsay statements and declarations, they were received without objection, and could not then be objected to, and that it was sufficient to sustain an award in

A teamster in the employ of a coal company suffered an attack of sunstroke while engaged in his duties of delivering coal. There was no evidence to show that he was, while engaged in delivering coal, peculiarly exposed to the danger of sunstroke by reason of the nature of his work. It was held that a finding that the claimant had not satisfied the burden of proving that the heat prostration was occasioned by, or casually related to, a personal injury which arose out of the employment, was warranted by the evidence, the court saying that the hazard of injury from sunstroke would not seem to have been greater or different from that to which persons in general, in that locality, who worked in the open, were exposed. Dougherty's Case (1921) 238 Mass. 456, 16 A.L.R. 1036, 131 N. E. 167.

A driver of a brewery wagon engaged in the delivery of beer was overcome by heat. The day was excessively hot. During the forenoon he had delivered ninety-one half barrels of beer. About 3 o'clock in the afternoon, while he was driving the wagon, he stopped the horses, alighted from the wagon, and walked around apparently suffering from the heat. In about ten minutes he dropped dead. He was accompanied by an assistant, who presumably exerted himself as much as the driver and who testified that he was not specially affected by the heat, except that it caused him to perspire. There was a large umbrella on the wagon that protected him from the direct rays of the sun. It was held that the evidence warranted a finding that the driver was not, by reason of his employment, subjected to a special and increased hazard not common to the public generally, and the inference that the heat prostration which caused his death did not arise out of his employment. Campbell v. Clausen-Flanagan Brewery (1918) 183 App. Div. 499, 171 N. Y. Supp. 522.

A fireman on board ship in the Red sea died from the effects of the heat.

He had complained of the heat for four or five days before his death. He complained of being sick from the heat on the day before and the day of his death, and was given medicine. After taking the medicine on the day of his death, he worked for a few hours, with occasional intervals for rest and refreshment, when he collapsed and died. The certificate of death signed by the master and chief engineer gave the cause of death as "heat stroke." The conditions were not abnormal for the Red sea. There was no evidence that the fireman was delicate. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to show that he died from an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. Pyper v. Manchester Liners [1916] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 691, 85 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1459, [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 301, 115 L. T. N. S. 406, 60 Sol. Jo. 706, 32 Times L. R. 723, 9 B. W. C. C. 580.

y. Hemorrhage.

A fireman, while firing on a switch engine, fell therefrom and death resulted. On an autopsy the physicians found a portion of the brain soft, and that a hemorrhage apparently had emanated from that portion of the brain, and it was found that the workman died from hemorrhage of the brain and fracture of the skull, but it was uncertain whether the hemorrhage was caused by the fracture. One physician then present testified that this strain on the brain was caused by a ruptured blood vessel; that in his judgment the fall could not have produced that condition; that the cause of the condition was syphilis—that the scars on the other parts of the workman's body indicated that condition; that the fall would aggravate such a condition and hasten results; and that the exercise of shoveling would cause blood pressure, and might cause a ruptured blood vessel. It was held that the evidence justified a finding that the injury resulted from an accident arising out of the employment. Peoria R. Terminal Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1917) 279 Ill. 352, 116 N. E. 651, 15 N. C. C. A. 632.

A workman was assisting in cutting a large piece of granite, using a 20-pound hammer. The blows were required to be struck from the side, necessitating the striker's assuming a crouching position. The day was very cold. He struck about 130 blows in an hour and a quarter with the heavy hammer, after which he was considerably exhausted and perspired freely. After lunch he resumed the work of striking for about half an hour with a 15-pound hammer. After this, while engaged in manipulating an overhead traveler, he fell over a pile of stone, his head striking a piece of granite, cutting a large gash over his right eye, and died a few minutes thereafter. It was found that the cause of death was cerebral hemorrhage, due to a ruptured blood vessel, and that he came to his death as the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. The evidence was held to be sufficient to justify this finding and to support an award. State ex rel. Simmers v. District Ct. (1917) 137 Minn. 318, 163 N. W. 667, 14 N. C. C. A. 527.

A workman's employment required him to break rock in a quarry with a 16-pound sledge, and load the rock into a car, which was hard work. At noon he was in apparently good health and spirits, and ate all of the lunch which his wife brought to the quarry for him. In the afternoon, while at his working place, and shortly after he was seen beating a large rock with his sledge, he suffered a pulmonary hemorrhage, from which he died before medical aid could reach him. He had been working in the quarry for several months, and before that had worked for three years in the sacking department of a cement plant, an exceedingly dusty place. The medical testimony was to the effect that working in the dusty sacking department, and the heavy work of breaking the rock, might cause a hemorrhage, and would have a tendency to cause it. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the death was due to an injury received in the course of the employment. Gilliland v. Ash Grove Lime & P.

A workman employed as a mason, while rolling a wheelbarrow loaded with tools along an alley from one place of work to another, was suddenly stricken with severe pain and paralysis of the lower limbs, and collapsed. The loaded wheelbarrow weighed about 130 pounds. The alley on which he was rolling it was rough and full of holes, and for a part of the distance there was a steep grade. His physician, who reached him within a few minutes, testified that he had sustained a hemorrhage or rupture of the spinal cord, and that in his opinion it came from the exertion at the time. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the cause of the rupture of the blood vessel and its fatal results were the muscular strain and exertion employed by him in propelling the loaded wheelbarrow, and an award in the claimant's favor, based thereon. State ex rel. Puhlmann v. District Ct. (1917) 137 Minn. 30, 162 N. W. 678.

An employee was engaged in getting sand out of a sand pit. His particular work at the time he was injured was helping to shove a flat car, which work was proven to be strenuous. The day was excessively hot, and the radiation of heat from the surrounding sand and gravel intensified it. No breeze was stirring. While performing this work the employee suffered a cerebral hemorrhage, from which he died. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the death was attributable to the employment. Murray v. H. P. Cummings Constr. Co. (1921) 197 App. Div. 903, 188 N. Y. Supp. 193, affirmed without opinion in (1921) 232 N. Y. 507, 134 N. E. 549.

A workman, while engaged in his employer's colliery in loading coal, complained of receiving a strain or hurt in his stomach. Three days later he died. He was an unusually healthy man, never having complained of stomach trouble or other sickness, and worked regularly. He immediately made known to his fellow workmen that he had received an injury in the abdomen while engaged at his work, and on reaching home complained of pain in his stomach, informed his wife that he was "lifting something in the mines and strained himself," retired to bed, and remained there until his death three days later, in the meantime "suffering with copious hemorrhages in the stomach and bowels." The medical testimony showed that the hemorrhages could have been caused by the rupture of a blood vessel, the result of a strain. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that his death was attributable to his employment. Zukowsky v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. (1921) 270 Pa. 118, 113 Atl. 62.

At the time of receiving his injury the claimant's husband, with two others, was engaged in rolling a log approximately 28 feet in length and 16 inches in diameter. They were using cant hooks to turn the timber, when the hook used by one of the workmen slipped, throwing the log back, and causing it, claimant asserted, to jar or strike her husband, inflicting the injury from which he subsequently died. To establish this contention the evidence of two persons working with the husband was that the timber, a V-shaped stick, required considerable effort to roll, and that the cant hook of one of the workmen slipped, allowing the log to roll back, "jarring" or knocking the hook from the husband's hand. This happened practically at quitting time, and upon his arrival home he was faint and weak, and was undressed and put to bed by members of his family. A doctor was called, who found him passing blood and suffering from a "hemorrhage from the kidneys, most likely, or from the bladder," which condition, the doctor said, probably resulted from a jar of the body or a strain. An examination by the doctor disclosed "a tenderness and immobility. He was sore all across the lumbar region . . . and particularly over the bladder." He was sent to the hospital on the 16th of July, and died on the 18th. Other physicians called by defendant testified that a jar to the person, such as indicated above, might rupture a blood vessel and produce the condition from which he suffered. It was held that the evidence warranted a finding that the death resulted from an accidental injury, suffered in the course of the employment. Kiercok v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. (1921) 270 Pa. 17, 112 Atl. 746.

An employee was engaged in loading a car with grain. The grain was in bags containing 100 pounds each, which were piled on each other in the car, two workmen lifting and placing the bags. While lifting a bag onto the pile the employee was noticed to lurch a little, and the same thing was noticed when he helped swing a second bag up. A few moments later, when he started to lift a third bag, he fell across the bag and could not lift it. He was assisted into the store-room, where he became unconscious, and was then removed to a hospital and died there a few hours later of cerebral hemorrhage. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to justify a finding that the hemorrhage was attributable to the work in which the workman was engaged. Patrick v. J. B. Ham Co. (1921) 119 Me. 510, 13 A.L.R. 427, 111 Atl. 912.

An employee of a construction company, while working in the cellar of a building, collapsed and fell. No one saw him fall, but immediately thereafter he was observed by his coemployees, who went to his assistance and found him in an unconscious condition, trembling and frothing at the mouth. They threw water in his face, and shortly thereafter he revived and was taken to a hospital, where he died the following morning. A post-mortem examination disclosed that his death was due to a blood clot and pressure on the brain. Holding that the evidence was insufficient to support a finding that his death was attributable to an injury in the course of his employment, the court said: "At the time he collapsed he was working on a dirt floor, and there is nothing to indicate that his fall was due to anything connected with his employment; on the contrary, all of the evidence shows that it was due to an injury which he had previously sustained, or disease with which he had been afflicted. One of the persons with whom he was working at or immediately prior to the time he collapsed testified that he stood within a few feet of him, and while he did not see him fall, he did immediately thereafter see him lying on the floor; that he went to his assistance, and there was nothing to indicate the cause of his fall; that there were no obstructions upon the floor, no pillars or posts near where he fell, or anything to show that the cause of his fall was other than a collapse. The witness was corroborated by another, to the effect that he saw the deceased immediately after he fell; that he was then lying upon his back, frothing at the mouth, and trembling; that there was nothing to indicate he had tripped or fallen by reason of anything upon the floor, and there were no marks upon his face or head which showed in any way that he had been injured, except a slight scratch upon his cheek. When he reached the hospital he was immediately put to bed, a careful examination made of his person, and the only evidence of an external injury which could be discovered was an abrasion over his forehead about as big as a quarter of a dollar. There was no evidence of a fracture or concussion of any kind. After his death an autopsy was performed, and this disclosed a subdural hemorrhage, which, according to the physician making the autopsy, had existed for some time prior to his collapse; that there was no evidence whatever of traumatism or concussion received at that time, or that his death was in any way caused by an injury then received. Under such circumstances I do not see how an award could be made. If so, it had for its basis a mere guess or conjecture." Hansen v. Turner Constr. Co. (1918) 224 N. Y. 331, 120 N. E. 693, reversing (1918) 185 App. Div. 901, 171 N. Y. Supp. 1087.

A foreman in a coal yard had some trouble with a teamster over the kind of coal the teamster was loading. During the altercation the teamster threatened the foreman with a heavy piece of timber, but did not actually strike him. Soon after the foreman was seen to fall. He was assisted to the office and later carried to his home. The medical testimony showed that the man had had a hemorrhage of the brain and a paralytic stroke; that that condition could have been produced by a quarrel or fight, but it was impossible to say whether it was caused by the altercation between the men, as it might have come from a variety of causes. It might come while a man was asleep, or after he had eaten heartily. That it was impossible to determine the cause of the hemorrhage, but, from the circumstances of the case, the quarrel was probably the exciting cause, though this was admittedly a matter of conjecture. The court held that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain an award in favor of the claimant. Ideal Fuel Co. v. Industrial Commission (1921) 298 Ill. 463, 131 N. E. 649.

A workman employed in handling a scraper on a railroad embankment became sick while at work, and died in the course of a few days. It appeared at the autopsy that he had sustained a rupture of the veins in the intestines, causing internal hemorrhage. It was not shown that he sustained any blow or strain on the day when he became sick. It was held that the burden of showing an accidental injury arising in the course of the employment was not sustained. Englebreton v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1915) 170 Cal. 798, 151 Pac. 421, 10 N. C. C. A. 545.

On January 25, 1917, a workman, during the course of his employment, fell and struck on his head, and was unconscious for a few minutes. Two or three days afterward he resumed his duties and performed his work as usual for a week or more, when he was discharged. During this period he appeared to be in his normal condition, except that an impediment in his speech seemed to be more pronounced than theretofore. On February 19 he entered a hospital, where he died on March 3. The doctor who made an autopsy testified that death resulted from a hemorrhage on the brain of traumatic origin, and that a microscopical examination disclosed "repair cells," which showed that the original injury had been received several weeks previously. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the death resulted from the injury. State ex rel. London & L. Indemnity Co. v. District Ct. (1918) 139 Minn. 409, 166 N. W. 772.

A fireman on board ship was seen frequently drinking water while in the stokehole. Soon afterwards he was found to be very ill; later he became unconscious and died. The medical evidence as to the cause of death was conflicting. The county court judge came to the conclusion, there being medical evidence to that effect, that the cause of death was cerebral hemorrhage, caused by the heat and drinking of excessive quantities of water, and that the fireman had sustained a "personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment." On appeal, the finding was sustained. Johnson v. The Torrington (1909) 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.). 68.

As to hemorrhage resulting in paralysis, see infra, II. 11.

s. Hernia.

A workman who up to the time of his injury had been in good health was engaged in work which involved lifting heavy weights. He suddenly complained of severe internal pain, left his work and took to his bed, and died in a week from internal strangulated hernia. The medical evidence was to the effect that this could have been caused either by natural causes or by a heavy strain at his work. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to warrant a finding that the physical condition and resultant death of the workman arose out of and in the course of his employment. Lancaster v. Blackwell Colliery Co. (1919; H. L.) 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. (Eng.) 609, [1920] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 165, 122 L. T. N. S. 162, 12 B. W. C. C. 400, 64 Sol. Jo. 115, reversing (1918; C. A.) 88 L. J. K. B. N. S. 104, [1918] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 345, 11 B. W. C. C. 190, 120 L. T. N. S. 3.

A workman employed in lifting heavy objects was taken sick two days after he had lifted a heavy iron pipe. There was no proof of any antecedent infirmity on his part. A medical examination disclosed hernia, and the opinion of the physician was that the hernia was caused by a recent strain. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to justify a finding that the hernia was the result of an accident in the course of his employment. Poccardi v. Public Service Commission (1915) 75 W. Va. 542, L.R.A. 1916A, 299, 84 S. E. 242, 8 N. C. C. A. 1065.

A workman had been affected with hernia for about three years, but apparently it was not of such a nature as to inconvenience him, or to interfere with his work. On the morning of the accident he went to his work in his usual good health. During the course of his work he was required to lift a bale of wire weighing 150 pounds to a height of 4 feet, when he suddenly became sick and unable to work. On examination it was found that there was a protrusion of an intestine into the existing hernial sac, or aperture, necessitating an immediate operation. His physician testified that, where there was an opening or hernial sac, pressure was liable to cause a protrusion, and that in his opinion the lifting of the weight caused the pressure resulting in the protrusion. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the injury was attributable to his work. Puritan Bed Spring Co. v. Wolfe (1918) 68 Ind. App. 330, 120 N. E. 417.

A workman employed to paint gas engines was ruptured by the extra strain caused by a 600-pound engine, which he was moving, sticking to the floor. It was held that the evidence supported a finding that he suffered an accidental injury arising out of and in the course of his employment. Robbins v. Original Gas Engine Co. (1916) 191 Mich. 122, 157 N. W. 437.

A workman, while pushing or pulling a truck loaded with castings, complained of a sudden pain in his back. He reported to his foreman, telling him he had hurt his back and could not work. A fellow workman, who was helping claimant with the truck, testified that it dropped into a hole and gave the claimant a sudden jerk. The claimant consulted a physician, who took him to a drug store and bought him a belt. The employer reported that claimant was involved in an accident, the nature of his injury being a rupture, "lifting casting." It was held that there was sufficient evidence to sustain a finding that the hernia was due to an injury received in the course of the employment. Schanning v. Standard Casting Co. (1918) 203 Mich. 612, 169 N. W. 879.

A workman was employed in work on automobile bodies which required frequent lifting of them. During a storm a window in the room where he was working was put down and became swollen so that it stuck. After the storm the claimant raised the window, and it required considerable extra exertion. He testified that after lifting the window he felt a pain in the neighborhood of the right groin, and on examination found a lump about the size of an egg. When he reached home a physician was called, who found him suffering with hernia. The medical testimony was to the effect that the lifting of automobile bodies and the putting up of the window caused the hernia. It was held that there was evidence to support a finding that the claimant's trouble was due to a distinct and unusual exertion during the course of his employment. Bell v. Hayes-Ionia Co. (1916) 192 Mich. 90, 158 N. W. 179.

A stoker suffering from rupture, and wearing a truss, suffered a strangulation of the hernia while engaged in performing his duties of stoking. These duties involved great abdominal strain. It was held that his death was due to an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. Scales v. West Norfolk Farmers' Manure & Chemical Co. [1913; C. A.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 165, 6 B. W. C. C. 188.

A workman, who had been ruptured, and wore a truss, strained himself by accident while at work for his employers. Next day it was found that the bowel had come down, and he was operated on and the hernia reduced. Two days later the bowel came down again. Two days afterwards he was again operated on for strangulated hernia, and died from exhaustion following the operation. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to support a finding that the death was the result of the accident. Jones v. Wrexham & A. Collieries [1918] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 48, 10 B. W. C. C. 607.

A workman employed as a carpenter sustained an injury which he claimed resulted in and produced a hernia. It was conceded that the hernia appeared suddenly, and immediately following the injury, and that the injury was accompanied by pain. But it was contended that the evidence was not sufficient to show that the hernia complained of did not exist in any degree prior to the injury, as required by the Texas statute. The claimant testified that about seven years prior to the injury, while working on a building, he had received an injury which resulted in a hernia on his right side. That thereafter he wore a truss, and was wearing it at the time of the injury complained of, but that the old hernia was not giving him any trouble except the inconvenience of wearing a truss. His attending physician testified that he found the claimant suffering from two separate and distinct hernias, an old one and a new one; that there were two separate and distinct openings, and in reality two hernias; that the new hernia was about half an inch above the old one, which was well; that an operation was performed for the new hernia, and that the old hernia did not contribute to the new hernia's existence. The physician who performed the operation testified that what he found he would call two distinct sacs; that he did not know whether to call it two separate and distinct hernias, or not; that it was just one hernia with two sacs or openings; and that if the claimant had not had a hernia prior to the time he claimed to have sustained a new hernia, the work he was then engaged in would not have produced the hernia for which he sought to recover. It was held there was substantial evidence to support a finding that the hernia complained of did not exist in any degree prior to the injury. United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Ross (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 221 S. W. 639.

A workman accidentally ruptured himself in the course of his employment, and was obliged to undergo an operation for hernia. In the course of the operation he was discovered to be suffering from another hernia of long standing, and both hernias were operated on at the same time. He subsequently died, the cause of death being found to be heart weakness and degeneracy "set up by the strain of the accident." The employers maintained in defense to the claim for compensation that, death being due to an operation, part of which was rendered necessary by the accident, the operation was a novus actus intervening to break the chain of causation between the accident and the death. It was held that on the facts stated there was evidence to justify the arbitrator in finding that death was the result of the accident the workman had sustained in the course of his employment. Thomson v. Mutter [1913] S. C. 619, 50 Scot. L. Rep. 447, [1913] 1 Scot. L. T. 213, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 241, 6 B. W. C. C. 424.

A brewer's assistant was lifting a heavy cask standing on a shelf 5 feet from the ground, when he felt a severe internal pain and became faint and sick. Afterwards he found that he had ruptured himself. Twenty-two years before he had had a rupture in the same place, for which he wore a truss for many years, but during the last four or five years he had left it off, having found that he could do his work without it. The county court judge held that although there was "injury by accident," it did not arise "out of the employment," but was the result of a gradual weakening, and not of any unusual strain. It was held that, "accident" having been found, the evidence proved that it arose "out of the employment." Brown v. Kemp [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 595, 6 B. W. C. C. 725.

A workman was employed in a school to carry and throw into furnaces sticks of cordwood. On the day of his injury, his wife saw him go from his house to the school building in his usual good health. Later in the morning she saw him come out of that building and return to their house. As he came out, she noticed that he walked as if suffering pain, and held his hand against his body. It was found that he was suffering from a fresh rupture, or hernia. By his physician's advice, he went to a hospital to undergo an operation to cure the hernia. Medical evidence showed that hernia was an injury very likely to result from such work. It was held that a finding that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment would not be disturbed. Eddles v. School Dist. (1912) 22 Manitoba L. R. 240, 2 D. L. R. 696, 21 West. L. R. 214.

A workman, who was employed in lifting weights in a sawmill, went to his work about 6 A. M. He returned home about three hours later, and was seen by his wife at 10 A. M., lying on his bed and vomiting. He was also seen with his hand on his stomach and vomiting blood in a place close to his work, but not part of the place where he was working. He died nine days later of a strangulated hernia. No one was produced who saw the deceased at work, and the foreman of the sawmill, who was in court during the hearing, was not examined by either side. It was held that, while the facts afforded evidence from which the county court judge could have drawn the inference that the accident (if any) arose out of and in the course of the employment, there must be a new trial, because the judge had allowed his mind to be influenced by inadmissible evidence. Shea v. Wilson [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 197, 50 Ir. L. T. 73, 9 B. W. C. C. 633.

In Veneroni v. Bausch & L. Optical Co. (1920) 192 App. Div. 937, 181 N. Y. Supp. 957, affirmed in (1920) 229 N. Y. 628, 129 N. E. 935, the court, without setting out the evidence, held that it was sufficient to show that a hernia was attributed to the employment.

A workman claimed to have received an injury while engaged in his duties, which caused an inguinal hernia. He testified that he was engaged in repairing certain electric wires extending along or over the top of a high board fence. For that purpose he climbed on the fence, which act was accomplished by reaching his arms up and over the fence and throwing his leg over the plank at the top. As he made that movement he felt a sharp pain in his right groin, but went on with his work. He had never experienced such a pain before, nor had he ever before developed a hernia, and did not at the time realize the nature of his hurt. This incident occurred on September 14, 1916. He did not report the matter to the defendant or consult a physician, until October 2, 1916, when he called upon a doctor, who discovered a small hernia in the groin, and advised the use of a truss. He procured a truss, and continued work as before, until February 3, 1917, when he was discharged. He said that after the alleged hurt, and before he applied the truss, he suffered frequent pains at that point, compelling him sometimes to suspend work. His physician testified that a common immediate cause of such a hernia was a "strain from exertion or something of that sort;" that a man "might continue at work with a traumatic hernia until after several days had gone by." It was not, he said, an unusual thing for a man to suffer hernia and "continue at work for a period of several days, and put up with the pain. This was true of enough cases to justify the statement." It was held that a finding that the hernia did not result from an injury arising out of the employment would be sustained, as the evidence was sufficiently vague and uncertain to bring the case within the rule which makes the findings of the commission final on questions of fact. The court set out the general rules as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence applicable to cases of this kind, as follows: "It is not true, as a matter of law, that, to justify a finding of compensable injury by hernia or other bodily misfortune, the claimant must be corroborated, or that the claimant broke down and was compelled to cease work, or that he reported to his employer immediately, or was compelled to seek medical assistance. Such circumstances are, of course, admissible in testimony, and may be considered with other facts and circumstances in arriving at the truth as to the alleged fact of injury, and of its nature and extent; but the absence of any one or more, or even of all, of these so-called tests, is not necessarily conclusive against the claimant. Where there is no statute requirement of corroboration, it is not within the province of any court to lay down an iron-clad rule that a party seeking the enforcement of a legal right will be denied a remedy unless he produces corroboration of his claim. It ought to go without saying that it is still possible for a claimant of compensation to be an honest man, and that his testimony may be so candid and so inherently probable as to command the confidence of a fair-minded court or juror, even though he is unable to produce any other witness to corroborate him. To turn such a party out of court for no better reason than his inability to offer corroboration would be a perversion of the forms of legal justice. Still less is it permissible to say that the claimant in such case must, as a condition precedent to a recovery, show that his alleged injury was followed by an immediate breakdown and cessation of work. To so hold is in effect to ingraft a judicial amendment upon the compensation statute. No court is so letter-perfect in human anatomy, or so accomplished in surgical or medical lore, that it can say that every case of traumatic hernia produces immediate prostration. On the contrary, notwithstanding the learning of the books and the dogmatic declarations of expert witnesses, it is a matter of common knowledge that thousands of men suffer from inguinal hernia, and that many of them are able to point to the time and place where it developed, and the physical strain or exertion which occasioned it, and yet were never prostrated by it. It is doubtless true that in very many cases the lesion takes place from the gradual enlargement of the inguinal rings, and is not traceable to any accident, or unnatural strain or exertion; and that much difficulty exists in determining whether, in a given case, the hernia, if one is found, is of a compensable character. This difficulty justifies the arbitration committee and the commissioner in closely scrutinizing the testimony and satisfying themselves as nearly as possible as to the origin of the alleged injury, in order that they may do equal and exact justice between the parties; but the rule applicable is the same as in other cases, and requires only a preponderance of evidence." Buncle v. Sioux City Stockyards Co. (1921) — Iowa, —, 185 N. W. 139.

A fireman met with an accident to his knee while working on board a ship. About ten days later he was found to be suffering from a rupture in the groin, which had ultimately to be operated on. The medical evidence was that the rupture was an old one and must have been in existence before the date of the accident. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding in favor of the employers, and that the workman was properly denied compensation. Clarkson v. Charente S. S. Co. [1913; C. A.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 422, 6 B. W. C. 540.

A workman in a mine alleged that he met with an accident on March 20, 1913, while lifting a tram in the course of his employment, with the result that he sustained a rupture. He was subsequently incapacitated and had to be operated on. There was a conflict of medical evidence as to whether the rupture was new, or of old standing at the date of the alleged accident. It appeared that on the day of the alleged accident the workman made his way out of the mine and walked to his home a mile away. The county judge held that the hernia was of old standing, and that the incapacity arose from the old hernia, and not from anything that occurred on March 20, 1913, and made his award in favor of the employers. It was held that there was evidence to support this finding. Legge v. Nixon's Nav. Co. [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 306, 7 B. W. C. 521.

A workman was employed as a cylinder feeder by a firm of printers. His work required him to lift a bundle of paper weighing from 40 to 60 pounds from the floor to his shoulder, and carry it up two or three flights of steps to his press. While doing this work he felt a pain which indicated to his physician, upon examination, that he had sustained a rupture. There was no blow or unusual exertion, nothing out of the ordinary, to suggest to the employee that anything that he then did caused the pain. He thought it was due to a disordered stomach, and took a physic. No medical evidence was given before the commission as to the nature or cause of hernia, and no attempt was made to prove that the lifting in this case could have produced the rupture which later developed. It was held that the evidence did not warrant a finding that the hernia was due to an injury received in the course of his employment, the court saying that a rupture cannot be held to have been caused by injury arising out of and in the course of the employment, in the absence of any evidence that there was a strain on the part affected, and that the work of the employee caused the rupture. Alpert v. Powers (1918) 223 N. Y. 97, 119 N. E. 229.

A laborer while engaged in the performance of his duties, which at the time consisted in pushing a pipe about 14 feet long, complained of a pain in his right side. He stopped work for about ten minutes, and then continued his employment until quitting time, about twenty minutes longer. On the following day a physician diagnosed his injury as right inguinal hernia. There was no evidence to show whether or not the hernia had existed before the accident, nor in what part of his side the pain complained of was located. There was no visible injury. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to show that the hernia was attributable to an injury sustained in the course of the employment. The court said: "There is no testimony whatever tending to show that there was any connection between this 'right inguinal hernia' and the 'severe pain in the right side' of the claimant; no evidence that a hernia could be produced by anything which was shown to have occurred on the 11th day of March, 1919. We know judicially that hernia is a disease arising out of natural causes, as well as from accident (Alpert v. Powers (N. Y.) supra), and the Workmen's Compensation Law does not insure against disease, except where the disease or infection 'naturally and unavoidably' results from an injury (Richardson v. Greenberg (1919) 188 App. Div. 249, 176 N. Y. Supp. 651. It does not follow that because a man has a pain in his side while doing his ordinary work, without slipping, falling, or other mishap, and a physician finds an inguinal hernia the next day, that the hernia resulted from accidental injuries, even though the physician adds to his declaration, in parentheses, the word 'traumatic.' This word, however much abused in matters relating to insurance, contemplates some external violence, some wounding or bruising of the body, and no one pretends that anything of the kind occurred in this case. The claimant himself merely says that he was doing his usual work, making no suggestion of anything happening, except that he felt a 'severe pain in the right side,' such as all persons experience, no doubt, at some time in their lives, and the next day a 'right inguinal hernia' is discovered, and this simple pain in the side is translated into an accident, within the meaning of a statute designed to protect against the extraordinary risks of certain designated employments. Alpert v. Powers (1917) 181 App. Div. 902, 167 N. Y. Supp. 385. There is not even a suggestion that this hernia had not existed, to the knowledge of the claimant, prior to this alleged injury. It is not an uncommon thing for men with hernia to work at heavy labor and to suffer at times from exertion, and there is not a particle of testimony from which it may be legitimately inferred that this was not the case with the claimant. No connection whatever is shown between the performance of the labors of the claimant and the hernia for which this award has been made; no identity of time or of place, and nothing which brings the case within any of the provisions of the statute." Cavalier v. Chevrolet Motor Co. (1919) 189 App. Div. 412, 178 N. Y. Supp. 489.

In Hager v. Griffin Mfg. Co. (1920) 193 App. Div. 820, 184 N. Y. Supp. 750, the claimant was employed as an elevator operator. He was shown to be suffering from right inguinal hernia. He filed a claim for compensation, alleging that while lifting a sliding door from the elevator leading into the street, he felt a sting on the right side. He testified that he did not know exactly what was the cause of his rupture. He could not say positively that it was caused by lifting the elevator door, but that was the only cause to which he could attribute it. There was no evidence of any heavy lifting other than that involved in his everyday work of operating the elevator and lifting the doors, and there was no medical or other evidence to show that the alleged lifting of the elevator doors could produce hernia. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant the conclusion that an injury happened to him in the course of his employment.

A workman was employed as an engineer in the capacity of an "engine tamer," it being his duty to take locomotives which had been overhauled and repaired, and break them in before they were put into regular service. This was done by running the engine back and forth in the yard limits. The fireman testified that in handling one engine they ran it back and forth along a 2-mile track about twenty-five times; that in throwing the reverse lever it worked hard, and on one occasion the workman requested him to assist him in throwing it; that it required considerable exertion for the two of them to throw the lever; that the workman made no complaint of being hurt that day, and that the next day they handled another engine, and the next time he saw the workman was two days later, when the latter complained of not feeling well and stated that he was going home. The workman died following an operation for strangulated or incarcerated hernia. It was held that, excluding certain testimony improperly admitted, there was nothing on which to base the conclusion that death was caused by an accidental injury arising out of and in the course of his employment. The court held that the burden rested on the administratrix to prove that the injury was so received, and that it would not be inferred that the injury had been so received from the mere fact that the workman, in his employment, was engaged in work which caused him to undergo a severe physical strain. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1916) 274 Ill. 336, 113 N. E. 629.

A claimant was shown to be suffering from hernia. He testified that while engaged in his work of hauling hides he felt a strain. A fellow workman testified that, while working with claimant in hauling hides, he stated that he had gotten hurt—that he had gotten a strain. The attending physician did not testify, but in his report to the state industrial commission stated that the symptoms from which the man was suffering were due entirely to his injury, and that no previous sickness, injury, or disease contributed to his disability. A second physician testified that he believed the hernia to be one of long standing. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to sustain an award in favor of the claimant, the court saying: "It ought to show that the conclusion of the commission had for its foundation something more substantial than a guess as to the cause and from that evolve the effect. Evidence should be and is required so that the court can trace the cause through to the effect before compensation is awarded. This standard, if correct, is not met by the statement of the physician, in his report, that claimant's hernia came from the injury, without any facts to show how he reached the con-

A workman employed as a millwright's helper was engaged with two others in working the handle of a jack up and down in order to raise a stack. He complained of a pain in the region of the groin, and was sick at his stomach. He went home and about three days later was operated on for simple hernia. Of the three men working the jack the claimant was the tallest. There was no medical evidence, and no evidence of any unusual happening was given, or that the condition prevailing at the time would be likely or could produce the condition of which the claimant complained, except the fact that he was taller than his fellow workers. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to sustain an award in favor of the claimant. Noble v. Mathieson Alkali Co. (1921) 196 App. Div. 245, 186 N. Y. Supp. 752.

The finding of the industrial board that inguinal hernia did not result from a fall and the striking of the right groin upon the point of a chair runner was sustained in Gardiner v. Cochran Chair Co. (1922) — Ind. App. —, 134 N. E. 873, under the rule that findings of the board have the same force as the finding of the court or the verdict of a jury, and are not to be set aside if there is any evidence on which they can rest, there being expert testimony which, though contradicted, was to the effect that such a blow could not have caused the condition.

A workman was engaged at the moment of his injury, a rupture, in his usual and ordinary employment, in the usual and ordinary way. In the course of his employment it was his duty to lift an iron bar about 3 feet long, and weighing about 90 pounds, once in about every fifteen minutes, ninety or one hundred times a day. It was held that the evidence exclusively showed that he had not suffered an accident or received an injury arising out of or in the course of his employment. Kutschmar v. Briggs Mfg.

A workman claimed to have been injured by a crowbar, with which he was working, slipping and striking him in the left groin. He continued to work for about two days and then reported his injury and was sent to a doctor. At the time of his injury he was engaged in helping to unload a car with a group of eight or ten other employees. He said nothing to any of them of his injury, and it was in evidence that no one saw it happen, or saw anything to indicate that an accident had happened. The medical evidence showed an extensive suppuration and breaking down of the tissues. An operation for hernia was performed both on the right side and left. The suppuration was so persistent that the doctors found it impossible to heal the surgical wounds. The doctors refused to say that the condition of the applicant was due to the alleged injury, though one testified that he could not find any other cause, but that the only evidence he had of an injury was the patient's statement. It was held that a finding that the disease was not caused by an injury arising in the course of the employment was justified by the evidence. Miller v. Gardner (1921) 190 Iowa, 700, 180 N. W. 742.

A workman sustained a strain to his back and a contusion of the hip in a fall from a ladder in the course of his employment as a steam fitter. He was treated at a hospital, and later entered into an agreement with his employer for the payment of compensation. He resumed his employment, making several changes in employers. About two and a half years after the accident he petitioned for compensation on the ground that he had received a hernia at the time of the accident. The claimant testified that about the time of the accident he noticed a small swelling, which was afterwards determined to be hernia. The hospital records made no suggestion of hernia, and there was no evidence to show that he did not have it before the accident, or that it was not caused by his work for other employers subsequent to the accident. The expert called by the commission testified that, from reading the hospital record and considering the testimony of the claimant, the hernia was, in his opinion, attributable to the injury. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to sustain an award. McCarthy v. Globe Automatic Sprinkler Co. (1921) 196 App. Div. 619, 188 N. Y. Supp. 118.

An employee, helping to operate an automatic screw machine, claimed to have slipped and received an injury which resulted in inguinal hernia. There was no evidence that he suffered any pain immediately after the injury, and he continued his work for two weeks thereafter. It was held that the commission was justified in taking judicial notice that inguinal hernia rarely results from accident; that it comes from inherited or acquired weakness and develops gradually. It was accordingly held that, in the absence of evidence that the accident was such as could produce hernia, that the hernia appeared immediately after the accident, and that it was followed by pain immediately disabling the applicant, the commission was justified in denying the petition for compensation on the ground of insufficiency of evidence. Meade v. Wisconsin Motor Mfg. Co. (1918) 168 Wis. 250, 169 N. W. 619.

A workman suffered an accident, during the course of his employment, that resulted in epigastric or ventral hernia. Prior to the accident he was suffering from inguinal hernia; that is, hernia of the groin. When the operation for epigastric hernia was about to be performed, the workman employed the physician to operate, also, for the inguinal hernia at the same time. He died from the postoperative shock. The inguinal hernia was not serious, and an operation therefor was not imperative. It was held that his death was not shown by the evidence to be due to the operation for the epigastric hernia suffered in the course of his work, and inasmuch as there was no evidence to show that the accident affected the inguinal hernia, there could be no recovery. Dulac v. Procter & B. Co. (1921) — Me. —, 114 Atl. 293.

A workman suffering from hernia was employed as an underground hauler in a colliery, to regulate the supply of empty trains at or near the pit bottom. After hauling the allotted quantity of trains from one heading, occupying about an hour in so doing, he led his horse into another heading to do similar work there. Shortly afterwards he was heard to call out, complaining of being very ill and that he had a lump coming in his groin. He died of strangulation of a right scrotal hernia of the ordinary inguinal type. On appeal, it was held that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the finding of the county court judge that the strangulation was the result of some act of exertion which the workman underwent while he was at work lifting a train, or some other act. Parry v. Ocean Coal Co. (1912) 106 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 713, [1912] W. C. Rep. 212, 5 B. W. C. C. 421.

A workman had to go in the course of his employment, from a powder magazine to his employer's office, 200 yards away down a steep path. At the magazine his clothes were clean and he was apparently in good health, but he arrived at the office covered with mud and in great pain. He was seen that afternoon by a doctor, who found him to be suffering from shock and complaining of pain in the abdomen. At the time the doctor examined the seat of an old rupture and found nothing wrong with it. That night the workman was sick two or three times, and next day the doctor found him to be suffering from strangulated hernia, and he died after being operated on in the hospital. Both the hospital doctor and the doctor who attended the man said that the vomiting might have caused the hernia to protrude so as to cause strangulation. It was held that the county court judge was justified in holding that it has not been proved that the injury which resulted in the death of the workman was caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. Marshall v.

Sheppard [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 477, 6 B. W. C. C. 571.

By the Colorado act it is provided as follows: "A workman in order to be entitled to compensation for hernia must clearly prove: (1) That the hernia is of recent origin, (2) that its appearance was accompanied by pain, (3) that it was immediately preceded by some accidental strain suffered in the course of the employment, and (4) that it did not exist prior to the date of the alleged injury." Applying this provision, it has been held that the following evidence was insufficient to meet any of the requirements of the act, and an award based thereon was reversed: A carpenter, while engaged in the duties of his employment, suffered a hernia. He testified that in 1909 he had a double hernia; that he could not tell how it occurred, but that it came on him while he was engaged in the lightest kind of work; that he suffered no pain and lost no work on account of it; that he was operated on, and thereafter wore a truss. As to the appearance of the hernia being accompanied by pain, he testified that all at once he felt a pain, and that when he started to plane it would hurt; that he felt the pain about 3 o'clock, but the hernia must have occurred either an hour before or an hour afterwards. As to the appearance of the hernia being preceded by some accidental strain, he testified that he felt the pain while he was turning one of the doors in a vice; that he was doing no heavier work than usual; that he did not slip or fall, and that nothing unusual happened, and that he could not say that he had strained himself immediately preceding the injury. This was the only evidence aside from the report of the examining physician, which was to the effect that it was probable that the abdominal wall was weakened by more or less previous coughing, the claimant being afflicted with tuberculosis, and that with this weakness the hernia came on as result of planing. McPhee & M. Co. v. Industrial Commission (1919) 67 Colo. 86, 185 Pac. 268.

aa. Hodgkin's disease.

An employee died from what is known as Hodgkin's disease. He had followed the occupation of a tinner and plumber for more than twenty years, and was employed in that capacity when taken ill. The physician he first consulted treated him for the gripe, and later for Bright's disease. A second physician testified that on examination he found ulcerated spots on the septum of the nose. That in his opinion the ulcerations were caused by inhaling the fumes of hydrochloric acid used by the deceased in soldering operations, and that the Hodgkin's disease resulted from these ulcerations. It was shown that hydrochloric acid was constantly used by tanners in their soldering operations, to clean the metal, and they frequently inhaled fumes from it. It was conceded that these fumes were sterile, containing no disease germs, and, so far as the evidence discloses, no deleterious effects result to the tanners from inhaling them. The deceased had used this acid in his work for more than twenty years, and, so far as appears, never claimed to have suffered any injury or inconvenience from the fumes. The inhalation which was claimed to have caused the ulcerations in question occurred more than a month before the discovery of the sores. The doctor testified that he was unable to say how long those sores had existed, and that they might have developed within two or three days after the injury or irritation which caused them. He stated that they might have been caused by inhaling dust or dirt, or in many other ways. He also stated that in his opinion they might have been, and in this case probably were, caused by inhaling strong fumes of hydrochloric acid which burned the membrane, but admitted that he had never known of such a case, although he had known of many instances in which such fumes had been inhaled. He also stated that he did not know the origin of the disease, or what caused it, and that it was the only case of that disease which he had ever found or treated in his practice. Other physicians testified that the causes for that disease had not yet been discovered. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to sustain a finding that the disease was attributable to the employment, the court saying that the doctor's "statement that in his opinion Mr. Hoerneman became afflicted with Hodgkin's disease because of the ulcerations of the mucous membrane of his nose, when taken in connection with the doctor's further statement that he does not know how that disease originates or what causes it, can be considered only as a mere guess." State ex rel. Johnson Hardware Co. v. District Ct. (1920) 145 Minn. 444, 177 N. W. 644.

bb. Hydrophobia.

An employee was engaged as a delivery man by the owner of a meat and grocery store, and for his work he was given the use of an automobile. It was customary for him, when he was unable to make all the deliveries of the day, to bring with him to his home such undelivered packages, and deliver them the following morning while on his way to work. On a certain morning, while on his way from his place of residence to the garage to get the automobile, and while making delivery of meat for his employer which was undelivered the day before, he was attacked and bitten in his hand by a dog. He later developed hydrophobia, caused by the bite of the dog, and which resulted in his death. It was held that the hydrophobia was attributable to an injury which arose out of the employment, entitling the claimant to an award. Chandler v. Industrial Commission (1919) 55 Utah, 218, 8 A.L.R. 930, 184 Pac. 1020.

cc. Influenza.

A hospital steward, while engaged in the duties of his employment, was taken with influenza and died. The evidence showed that an epidemic of the disease was raging in the city at the time, that the disease is highly infectious, and was so general that one out of every ten in the city contracted it, and that every member of the community was exposed to it to a more or less extent. On the other hand, the evidence showed that the incubation period of the disease is from one to four days; that the steward, in the course of his duties during the five days preceding his being taken ill, had had to handle, and had been exposed to, at least twelve developed cases of influenza; that, so far as known, he was not exposed to any cases except in the course of his employment; that he lived only half a block from the hospital where he was employed, and during the two weeks preceding his illness had been working very hard, and had gone directly from his home to his work, and from his work to his home, and had not been out; that his exposure because of his work was far greater than that of the average person; and that, among the nurses in the hospitals of the city, a class exposed in much the same degree as the steward, the proportion who contracted the disease ran from 50 to 85 per cent, as against 10 per cent for the community in general. The preponderance of the medical testimony also was to the effect that he contracted the disease as a result of his peculiar exposure to it, incidental to his employment. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to sustain an award in favor of the claimant. The court said: "It, of course, cannot be said that from these facts it is certain that Slattery contracted his sickness because of his employment. But certainty is not required. It is not even required that the award be, in our judgment, in accord with the preponderance of the evidence, in order that we be not at liberty to annul it. We cannot disturb the award unless we can say that a reasonable man could not reach the conclusion which the commission did. This we cannot say in the present case. If there had been no epidemic in San Francisco at the time, and it appeared that Slattery, as hospital steward, had been exposed directly to a considerable number of influenza patients, and was not known to have been exposed otherwise, and had come down with the disease within the period of incubation after his exposure, the conclusion that the disease was due to his exposure in the course of his work could hardly be questioned. But these are the actual facts, with the single exception that an epidemic was raging. To the extent of the severity of this epidemic the strength of the conclusion is weakened. It may well be that if the epidemic were so severe that the proportion of the general public who were attacked was anything like as great as the proportion of those exposed as was Slattery, the question of whether he was attacked because of the exposure incident to his employment, or because of the exposure general to the public, would be so much a matter of conjecture and speculation as not to warrant a definite conclusion as the basis of an award. But the actual fact is that, of persons exposed as was Slattery, the proportion of those attacked was from five to eight times as great as the proportion of those not so exposed. This ratio is so great that it cannot be said that the commission was not justified in concluding from it, in connection with the other facts, that Slattery's illness was due to the peculiar exposure of his employment. Its conclusion is the more justified by the fact that it coincides with the conclusions of most of the physicians who testified. Their opinions upon a point of this character are entitled to consideration, since it is a part of their vocation to observe diseases and how they spread, and to draw conclusions from their observations." San Francisco v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1920) 183 Cal. 273, 191 Pac. 26.

A similar ruling, based largely on the decision in the above case, was made in Engels Copper Min. Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1920) 183 Cal. 714, 11 A.L.R. 785, 192 Pac. 845. It was there held that an employee of a mining company, who, during an epidemic of influenza, devoted most of his time to caring for employees of the company who had contracted the disease, and himself contracted it, was properly awarded compensation for an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. The point was also made in this case that the nursing of his coemployees was no part of the duty of the claimant, but that he had voluntarily assumed it. There was evidence, however, that he did so at the request and direction of the company's superintendent, and this was held to be sufficient to take his services out of the class of purely voluntary services, and place them within the scope of his employment. The court criticized the case of Martin v. Manchester Corp. (Eng.) set out infra, in II. rr, wherein it was held that an employee of a scarlet fever hospital particularly exposed to the disease, and who was attacked by it, could not be said to have acquired it through the exposure incidental to his employment.

dd. Insanity.

A workman received an injury in the course of and arising out of his employment, through a splash of molten lead into his eye September 17, 1913. He was treated at a hospital until October 13, 1913, when he threw himself from a window and was fatally injured. There was evidence tending to show that, although for a time after the injury the deceased was in his normal temperament, which was hopeful and joyous, he then became silent and moody, and was depressed, and suffered from certain kinds of hallucinations. He did not appear affectionate, as he always theretofore had been, toward his wife and young children. Two witnesses testified that when he jumped from the window he had a wild and vacant stare in his eyes. The medical testimony was to the effect that probably there was developed from the accident a mental disturbance, accompanied by delusions and hallucinations, and that as a result he committed suicide. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to justify a finding that the insanity was incurred as a result of the accident received in the course of the employment, the court saying that, although the finding in this respect was supported by a rather slender thread of evidence, it was not unsupported, and therefore must stand. Sponatski's Case (1915) 220 Mass. 526, L.R.A. 1916A, 333, 108 N. E. 466, 8 N. C. C. A. 1025.

An insurance collector received an injury consisting of a fractured skull and a laceration of the brain, caused by bone fragments which had been driven into it, after which time he was not always rational. There was no direct evidence of how the accident occurred. He was seen by two men to collect money from another, and left the house where a collection was made with these two men, one of whom was explaining his inability to pay a premium which he owed. In a few minutes the collector returned to the house, injured, was unable to give an account of what had taken place, became unconscious, and was taken to a hospital. The two men with whom he left the house disappeared, and were never heard of again. The court held that the disappearance and flight of the two men, who coupled with the other facts, were sufficient to warrant an inference that they had committed an assault and battery on the collector, which resulted in his injury, and that his irrational condition was attributable to his employment. Empire Health & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Purcell (1921) — Ind. App. —, 132 N. E. 664.

In Kingan & Co. v. Ossam (1918) — Ind. App. —, 121 N. E. 289, the court, without setting out the evidence, held it to be sufficient to sustain a finding that the insanity or hysterical nervousness of the injured workman was attributable to his employment.

A man working as a miner was injured by a heavy bar falling on his hand. Immediately following the accident he was depressed, and kept getting worse; was always talking about it; he did not work and he did not sleep for weeks. Later he attempted to work, but could not do it, complaining in the same manner. There was no history of insanity in his family. The medical evidence showed that, immediately on the happening of the accident, he was mentally very perturbed, suffering great pain, and that his mental perturbation never cleared up, but got worse. A specialist testified that the man was suffering from insanity; that, the depression beginning at once, the melancholia followed, and then, following a progressive course, culminated in insanity. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to support a finding that the depression, melancholia, and subsequent insanity were occasioned by the shock of the accident happening during the course of his employment, and not by his mind preying on the consequences of the accident; and that this was true, although there was no discoverable structural injury to the brain itself to the effect of which the insanity might have been directly attributable. The test as to whether the insanity was the result of an accident happening in the course of the employment was said by the court to be the fact that it resulted from the injury, causing depression which might culminate in insanity. In other words, it must have resulted directly from the injury, and not indirectly in consequence of a state of mind brought about by the consequences of the injury, developing, as in some cases, some time afterwards, when the consequences of the accident began to prey on the mind. Marriott v. Maltby Main Colliery Co. [1921; C. A.] W. N. (Eng.) 7, 90 L. J. K. B. N. S. 349, 124 L. T. N. S. 489, 13 B. W. C. C. 353, [1921] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 97.

In Grime v. Fletcher [1915] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 734, 31 Times L. R. 158, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 847, 8 B. W. C. C. 69, [1915] W. N. 43, 59 Sol. Jo. 233, [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 250, 112 L. T. N. S. 840, it appeared that a workman was injured by a splinter of metal getting into his eye. He went on with his work, although he was attended by his doctor for fourteen days. Then suddenly the specialist told him that he might lose his eye; he went back to work the next morning, and shot himself. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to support a finding that insanity, during which the man committed suicide, was the result of an accident received during his employment. The court, in Marriott v. Maltby Main Colliery Co. (Eng.) supra, distinguishes this case on the ground that the symptoms of insanity did not immediately follow the accident itself, but appeared some time later, when the consequences of the accident became fully known to him and began to prey on his mind.

Similarly, in Withers v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. [1916] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 772, (1916) W. C. & Ins. Rep. 317, 85 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1673, 115 L. T. N. S. 503, 32 Times L. R. 685, 61 Sol. Jo. 8, 9 B. W. C. C. 616, it was held that the evidence was not sufficient to support a finding that insanity, leading to suicide, was the result of an accident to his thumb incurred by an employee in the course of his employment, where it appeared that, some time after the accident, the workman, believing that the injury to his thumb would forever prevent him from returning to his work, committed suicide.

Likewise, it has been held that a finding that a workman committed suicide while insane as the result of an injury, where his body was found in a canal, and there was no evidence to show how he came to be in the canal, and there had been no symptoms of a suicidal tendency, although he had become depressed, and irritable, and restless as a result of the injury, was not supported by the evidence. Southall v. Cheshire County News Co. (1912) 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 251.

On February 28, 1912, a workman in the course of his employment received a severe scalp wound, which incapacitated him from work. The workman, at some time not later than September, 1914, became insane. There was no proof that the insanity was due to the accident, nor, on the other hand, was there any proof of a new cause intervening to account for the insanity. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to prove that the insanity was due to the accident, the burden of proving which was on the workman, and therefore that an award in his favor could not be sustained. Brownlee v. Coltness Iron Co. [1917] S. C. 409, 54 Scot. L. R. 311, [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 235, 10 B. W. C. C. 462.

cc. Kidney disease.

A girl was employed as a sales-woman in the hardware department of a store. She received, during the course of her employment, an injury to her back and side in the region of the left kidney, producing a small flow of blood in passing urine. After examination a physician testified, that she was suffering from a tipped uterus, and that her right kidney was dropped, which diagnosis was confirmed by a subsequent operation. Two physicians testified that her condition was not in their opinion, due to the injury. A third physician testified that the accident might have weakened or bruised her kidney, and the insertion later by one of the attending physicians of a pessary might have carried infection to the injured kidney. The surgeon who performed the operation testified that, if the alleged injury resulted in a hemorrhage of the kidney, this condition might have remained dormant and eventually have developed the condition of the kidney which he found on the operation. The surgeon's testimony and the statement of the claimant as to the flow of blood were the only evidence tending to show that the disease was produced by the accident. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to support an award in favor of the claimant. Kade v. Greenhut Co. (1920) 193 App. Div. 862, 185 N. Y. Supp. 9.

ff. Lead poisoning.

A person who had worked as a printer for fifteen years became ill from lead poisoning. There was no evidence that lead fumes or dust are given off by type, or that the handling of type is liable to cause lead poisoning. It was held that there was no evidence to show that the lead poisoning was contracted in the employment. Doherty's Case (1915) 222 Mass. 98, 109 N. E. 887.

In Johnson's Case (1914) 217 Mass. 388, 104 N. E. 735, 4 N. C. C. A. 843, it was held that, where the physical incapacity of a lead grinder had been found by the industrial accident board to have been caused by the gradual absorption of poison into his system, there was no reasonable conclusion other than that such injury arose out of and in the course of his employment.

gg. Locomotor ataxia.

A longshoreman, in attempting to remove a skid from a ship to the wharf, slipped and fell into the river landing on some wooden piling, and injured his head and spine. The injury was immediately followed by paralysis of the arms and legs, which was succeeded by, as if it had developed into, what the physicians diagnosed as locomotor ataxia. Before the accident he was apparently in ordinarily sound health, attending to his daily occupations and working regularly. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the disease was incurred in the course of his employment, whether it was dormant in his system prior to the accident or not. Behan v. John B. Honor Co. (1917) 143 La. 348, L.R.A.1918F, 862, 78 So. 589.

hh. Mastoiditis.

An award in favor of a woman of compensation for mastoiditis, claimed to have been caused by infection through a vaccination wound, was set aside where the only evidence that it was received in the course of her employment was that the infection occurred while she was employed by the defendant. Krout v. J. L. Hudson Co. (1918) 200 Mich. 287, L.R.A.1918F, 860, 166 N. W. 848, wherein it was said: "Assuming, then, as found by the board, that the mastoiditis was caused by the invasion of the germs through the vaccination wound (though the testimony contained in the record seems strongly to discredit this theory), there is still an absolute lack of evidence tending to show that the germ secured lodgment in claimant's arm in the course of her employment. In this respect, the case is distinguishable from Blaess v. Dolph (1917) 195 Mich. 137, 161 N. W. 885, and Dove v. Alpena Hide & Leather Co. (1917) 198 Mich. 132, 164 N. W. 253. See also Chandler v. Great Western R. Co. [1912] W. C. Rep. (Eng.) 169, 106 L. T. N. S. 479, 5 B. W. C. C. 254; Bellamy v. J. Humphries & Sons (1913) 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 53. It seems quite clear to us that claimant has failed to show any connection between her employment in the store of respondent and the infection following vaccination. There was nothing in her employment which made her more susceptible to the reception of the germ infection than if she were walking upon the street, or attending a theater or church. In other words, the risk of infection was such, and such only, as that to which the general public is exposed."

ii. Nephritis.

There were about two big wagon-loads of steaming pulp in the basement room where a workman was required to work, which had run out of a broken iron pipe. His foreman directed him to remove it by flushing it out into the sewer with water, to do which he was required to use a hose through which hot water from the exhaust of the engine was forced. His working place became very hot in consequence of the pulp and water, and he perspired profusely. On his way home for dinner he became chilled, and acute nephritis developed. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the condition of the claimant followed directly from the enforced exposure to which he had been subjected in his work. United Paper-board Co. v. Lewis (1917) 65 Ind. App. 356, 117 N. E. 276.

jj. Neurasthenia.

On September 11, 1911, a workman met with an accident in the course of his employment. His employers paid him compensation for three weeks, when he returned to work and continued at work for five weeks, when he was discharged. Thereafter, until March 13, 1913, when he first made his claim for compensation, he was attended at intervals by doctors, and was for three months in a hospital. He was admittedly unfit for work. The finding of the county court judge that he was suffering from neurasthenia, the result of the accident, was held to be warranted by the evidence. Morris v. Turford & Southward [1913; C. A.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 502, 6 B. W. C. C. 606.

kk. Osteomyelitis.

While engaged in the duties of his employment, which consisted of loading and unloading barrels of meat, a workman received an injury to his leg by the falling of a barrel of meat weighing 500 pounds. He returned to his home after the last half day he worked, lame, complained of his leg hurting him, said he was sick, and went to bed. Nine days later he was taken to the Cook County Hospital. The surgeon who treated him there testified that he had an abscess on the left thigh, which contained pus. The doctor opened it and drained the pus. He testified that the abscess was the result of an injury to the leg. After it was drained, the patient got better, but later osteomyelitis developed, necessitating an operation on the bone which weakened the bone. When the operation was performed, January 15, 1915, he was pale, anemic, had lost flesh, and could hardly walk. His general physical condition, due to infection, was run down and weakened, and his vitality and powers of resistance lowered. The attending physician ordered him kept in bed, but subsequently an intern in the hospital permitted him to get out of bed. He fell and broke the bone at the place where it was diseased, which caused a severe hemorrhage. Afterwards, on September 6, 1915, another operation was performed, and a few hours later he died. The doctor testified the death resulted from osteomyelitis, lowered resistance from long illness, hemorrhage, and shock. Over the contention that the evidence showed that the death resulted from the fall in the hospital, which intervened between the accident received where he was employed and the death, it was held that a finding that death resulted from the injury was warranted by the proof. G. H. Hammond Co. v. Industrial Commission (1919) 288 Ill. 262, 123 N. E. 384.

A workman was engaged in moving rails in a colliery, and on April 18, while dragging a rail along, he backed into a prop, with the result that the rail struck him a blow on the inside of the thigh. He went on working until May 29, when he suffered so much pain in the thigh that he had to stop work. His panel doctor treated him for contused tissue. He grew worse, and on June 10 a consulting doctor was called in, who diagnosed the case as osteomyelitis and septicemia, and operated at once, but the man died that night. It was held that there was evidence on which the county court judge was justified in finding, as he did, that the workman met his death as the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. Mills v. Dinnington Main Coal Co. [1917] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 11, 116 L. T. N. S. 181, 86 L. J. K. B. N. S. 231, 61 Sol. Jo. 202, 10 B. W. C. C. 153.

The finding of the board that an employee's death from osteomyelitis resulted from stepping on an upholstery tack, while at work a few days before, was held in Calderara v. P. Nathan & Co. (1922) 200 App. Div. 298, 192 N. Y. Supp. 737, to be justified by evidence that he arrived at his work without limping, and later in the day was noticed by a coemployee pulling a tack from the sole of his left shoe, and was observed to limp thereafter, and the third day thereafter complained to his parents that he had a pain in his foot and had injured himself, and was examined by a physician, who discovered a small punctured wound in the left foot, about the spot indicated by the coemployee, which in the opinion of the physician had a causal relation to the osteomyelitis.

U. Paralysis.

An employee of a piano company suffered a cerebral hemorrhage resulting in paralysis, while helping to carry a piano up a steep stairway. He and another employee were the only experienced men engaged in carrying the piano up the stairs. This work was usually done by four or five experienced men. The only assistance the two had was that of a woman and an inexperienced man, who was said to be very weak. When the last step was reached the applicant testified that he felt something give way in his head. He immediately became ill, and a doctor was summoned, who testified that he found a rupture of a blood vessel in the brain, which resulted in paralysis of the left side. The applicant at the time of the accident was suffering from arteriosclerosis. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the condition of the applicant was attributable to an injury received in the course of his employment. St. Clair v. A. H. Meyer Music House (1920) 211 Mich. 285, 178 N. W. 705.

An employee who was engaged in making bouillon from beef, by boiling and other processes, suffered a cerebral hemorrhage and resultant paralysis of one side. The weather was hot and a high degree of heat was required. At the time of the injury an extra amount of bouillon was being made, necessitating more than the ordinary exertion on the part of the claimant. The medical testimony was to the effect that the probable cause of the paralysis was a cerebral hemorrhage caused by the heat and overexertion, together with a diseased condition of his arteries known as arteriosclerosis, of some years' standing. It was held that there was sufficient testimony on which the accident board could base a finding that the disease was attributable to the employment. La Veck v. Parke, D. & Co. (1916) 190 Mich. 604, L.R.A.1916D, 1277, 157 N. W. 72.

A workman, while engaged in the course of his employment in moving a weight, had an attack of cerebral hemorrhage as the result of the exertion he was using. The work was being performed in the usual manner. Four days later a second attack supervened, which caused permanent paralysis. At the time of the first attack his arteries were in a degenerate condition, rendering the recurrence of an attack likely. It was held that the workman's final disablement was caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. M'Innes v. Duns-muir [1908] S. C. 1021, 45 Scot. L. R. 804, 16 Scot. L. T. 214.

The plaintiff testified that, while engaged in mining coal, a mine prop struck him on the side of the head, midway between the center of the top of his head and the top of his ear, and knocked him 15 feet away; that the top of his head was affected and his skull fractured; that he was taken to the hospital, where pieces of his skull and "bruised blood were taken out;" that the injury caused all his strength to leave him; that he could not use his right hand or his right leg; and that the right side of his body was paralyzed, and he could scarcely walk. His evidence was supported by that of three physicians to the same effect. It was held that the evidence amply sustained the finding that he was injured while in the course of his employment. Frey v. Kerens-Donne-wald Coal Co. (1915) 271 Ill. 121, 110 N. E. 824.

A workman put to do heavy work was found half an hour later to be suffering from some injury which necessitated ambulance aid and removal to his home. He stated that he had fallen and hurt himself. He returned to work two weeks later, but complained of pain. Five and a half months later he had to go to a hospital, where he remained until he died six months after. The death was due to paralysis from the fracture of one of the lumbar vertebræ. This, according to the medical evidence, might have happened when he first complained of pain. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to warrant a finding that his death was due to an injury arising out of the employment. Hewitt v. Stanley Bros. [1913; C. A.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 495, 109 L. T. N. S. 384, 6 B. W. C. C. 501.

A workman while employed at defendant's colliery breaking rock, his usual work, was noticed by his fellow workmen to cease work, rest on the frame of the coal chute, and move his hand and leg up and down; that at the time his body was shaking, and he would have fallen to the floor except for the support given him by others. He was sent to his home in an ambulance, and at once attended by a physician, who found him unconscious, and paralyzed on the right side, the result of cerebral apoplexy. Other medical testimony, additional to that of the doctor first called, was to the effect that claimant was afflicted with an enlarged heart and also arteriosclerosis, which caused his arteries to degenerate and become weakened. They, however, did not say the apoplexy from which he was suffering was brought on by the work in which he was engaged. It was held that the evidence was sufficient on which to base a finding that the injury was attributable to his employment. Lesko v. Lehigh Valley Coal Co. (1921) 270 Pa. 15, 112 Atl. 768.

Paralysis may be found to be the result of an injury, where the substance of the testimony of a number of physicians who examined the plaintiff was that his condition was or might have been the result of the injury, although physicians testifying for the defendant stated that his condition was the result of a progressive arteriosclerosis, and could not have been the result of his injury. Manning v. Pomerene (1917) 101 Neb. 127, 162 N. W. 492.

An employee claimed to have been struck and knocked down by the opening of a swinging door as he approached it, which caused paralysis on one side of his body. No marks of physical injury appeared, and his eyeglasses, which were unprotected by rims, were still intact on his nose after the occurrence. The medical testimony showed that he was suffering before the accident from diabetes and arteriosclerosis, and that in this condition the man was liable to have a stroke any day; that it would require a severe blow to cause traumatic apoplexy; and that, in the absence of marks indicating a blow of some violence, the stroke suffered by the applicant could not reasonably be attributed to the accident assigned. This evidence was held to be insufficient to warrant a finding that the applicant's physical condition was caused by an injury received during the course of his employment. Fink v. Sheldon Axle & Spring Co. (1921) 270 Pa. 476, 113 Atl. 666, wherein it was said: "Both the courts and the administrative authorities have, very properly, been most liberal in construing the Workmen's Compensation Law, holding that claims thereunder need not be made out with the same exactness of proof required in suits at common law. It must be understood, however, that, when in cases of this class expert testimony is relied on to show the connection between an alleged cause and a certain result, it is not enough for the doctors to say simply that the ailment in question might have resulted from the assigned cause, or that the one could have brought about the other; they must go further, and testify, at least, that, taking into consideration all the attending data, it is their professional opinion the result in question most probably came from the cause alleged. Here the strongest expert evidence to sustain the claim is that Fink's paralysis 'could be due to a blow on the head; ' and, as just indicated, this is not enough to justify or support a finding that the blow, or jar, testified to in this case, caused the paralysis which afflicts plaintiff."

mm. Paresis.

The claimant suffered a fractured wrist while engaged in the duties of his employment. About a week thereafter he began to act queerly, and about three months thereafter went to a hospital, where he afterward remained, suffering from paresis. At the time of the injury he had a syphilitic infection. It was testified that paresis is due to syphilis, and that any injury, whether a fractured wrist or otherwise, in a syphilitic person, might be an activating factor in the development of paresis. It was held that a finding that the disease was due to an injury received in the course of the employment, which accelerated an already diseased condition, resulting in paresis, was warranted by the evidence. Finkeloay v. Henry Heide (1920) 193 App. Div. 338, 183 N. Y. Supp. 912, affirmed without opinion in (1921) 230 N. Y. 598, 130 N. E. 909.

nn. Peritonitis.

A coal heaver while engaged in coaling a ship was struck in the stomach. He suffered great pain and left his work. Four days afterwards an operation was performed, and it was 20 A.L.R.—5.

found that he was suffering from perforation of the bowel, and also from appendicitis of long standing. A post-mortem examination revealed a second perforation which had not existed more than twelve hours, and the cause of the death was certified as peritonitis, caused by the second perforation. It was held that the evidence warranted a finding that the death resulted from the injury in the course of the employment, in the sense that the accident gradually produced perforation of the bowel, and so accelerated his death. Woods v. Wilson, Sons & Co. (1915; H. L.) 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. (Eng.) 1067, [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 285, 8 B. W. C. C. 288, 113 L. T. N. S. 243, [1915] W. N. 109, 31 Times L. R. 273, 59 Sol. Jo. 348.

A workman suffered a double hernia while engaged in the duties of his employment. Within a few days he was operated on by two surgeons, one of whom removed the appendix, in addition to operating for the hernia. He was taken to his home where he remained for two weeks, when he was returned to the hospital and died in a short time of peritonitis. An autopsy was performed. One of the surgeons who was present at the autopsy testified that the two operative wounds were free from infection, had fully healed, and were clean wounds. He also testified that the body of the deceased was full of abscesses all over the abdominal cavity. The other surgeon testified that when the deceased left the hospital there had been no steady rise of temperature, no rapid pulse, or distension of the abdomen; that all these indications of peritonitis would have appeared in seventy-two hours, if the operation had been the cause. In his opinion the peritonitis came from the bursting of pus sacs, the presence of which in the abdomen was due to disconnected causes. That the operation for the removal of the appendix had been performed at the request of the deceased. It was held that, even if the evidence justified a finding that the peritonitis was caused by the operation for the removal of the appendix, it was not sufficient to show that that operation was necessitated by the injury causing the hernia, and hence was not sufficient to sustain a finding that the peritonitis was due to an injury arising in the course of the employment. Hoffman v. Pierce-Arrow Motor Car Co. (1920) 193 App. Div. 123, 183 N. Y. Supp. 766.

eo. Phlebitis.

A workman was injured in an accident by the breaking of his left leg. The fracture was reduced and union obtained, and he continued in his employment as a structural iron worker, without suffering any pain or inconvenience. About eight years after the accident to his left leg, he suffered an accident to his right leg, arising out of and in the course of his employment. As a consequence his right leg was amputated twice. An infective process followed the second operation, and for a time he was in a critical condition. When the stump of the right leg was sufficiently healed so that it was practical for the injured man to get into a chair, it was found that the left leg could not be lifted or used without having it lifted by another. An examination revealed a marked phlebitis in the left leg. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to warrant a finding that the phlebitis in the left leg was attributable to the injury to the right leg. Saddlemire v. American Bridge Co. (1920) 94 Conn. 618, 110 Atl. 63.

pp. Pneumonia.

A workman was engaged in stacking boxes of paint in stacks of four or five boxes. While so engaged he ruptured a blood vessel in his lungs, and subsequently died of traumatic pneumonia. The medical testimony was to the effect that the pneumonia was caused by the rupture of the blood vessel. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to show that his death was due to an injury received in the course of his employment. Southwestern Surety Ins. Co. v. Owens (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 198 S. W. 66.

A workman, while engaged in his duties, fell from a ladder and sustained severe bruises, his body being discolored in places. He suffered much pain, headache, and restlessness, and shortly afterwards developed pleurisy and pneumonia, from which he died. The medical testimony was to the effect that the injuries received in the fall were likely to result in pleurisy and pneumonia. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the death was due to the injuries received in his work. A. Breslauer Co. v. Industrial Commission (1918) 167 Wis. 202, 167 N. W. 256.

An employee, while engaged in the duties of his service, received a cut in the foot with an ax. Immediately after the injury he was taken to a bunk house located near the place of the accident, where he received first aid. The wound bled somewhat profusely, leaving him in a weakened and fainting condition. After the wound was dressed he was placed in bed, but, complaining of the cold, he was taken to a stove in the bunk house, where a hot fire was burning. The accident happened at about 10 o'clock in the morning, and later in the day, possibly about the middle of the afternoon, he desired to be taken to his home, some 12 miles distant. An automobile was called, which could not approach the camp nearer than about 1 mile, and this distance he was compelled to walk. The weather was cold and otherwise inclement at the time, and he was exposed to it until he arrived at his home at about 7 o'clock in the evening. Shortly thereafter his wound was again dressed. At this time he again complained of being cold, and on the same evening had a chill. Two days later he developed a case of lobar pneumonia, and died from its effects. The medical testimony was to the effect that, although the ax wound of itself would not have caused pneumonia, the resultant weakened condition rendered the deceased much more susceptible to the disease than he otherwise would have been, and that it was not beyond probability that he acquired pneumonia from the exposure to the weather because of his weakened condition, and there was some evidence that it was highly probable that he did so. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the injury was the proximate cause of the death. Anderson v. Industrial Ins. Commission (1921) — Wash. —, 199 Pac. 747.

A carpenter engaged at his work was struck by a piece of wood flying from a circular saw. He subsequently died of pneumonia. His employer reported the accident as an injury to his hand. His widow testified that when he came home his hand was injured and he complained of a pain in his chest. A fellow workman testified that he heard the piece of wood fly from the saw, and on looking up saw the injured man holding his hand to his side as if hurt. The physician who attended him testified that his hand was injured, and that he found an injury to the chest as if from a blow; that in his opinion the pneumonia was caused by the blow in the chest. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to justify a finding that the pneumonia was attributable to an injury received in the course of the employment. Hanna v. Michigan Steel Castings Co. (1918) 204 Mich. 139, 170 N. W. 6.

A workman was employed as a helper to machinists. While in the act of bending over to pick up some blocks of wood lying near a moving belt, the belt broke and struck him in the face, and some of the testimony showed that he was knocked down. He was helped out into the air by his coworkers, and after a short time he returned to his work. He worked a few days following the accident, when he gave up and went home, and his wife called the family physician. The physician found him suffering from traumatic pleurisy of his right side. As a result of the pleurisy he developed pneumonia, and later typhoid fever, and as a result of both maladies died. The medical testimony was in conflict, but there was evidence that pneumonia often developed from traumatic pleurisy. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the pneumonia was attributable to an injury received in the course of the employment. Vogele v. Detroit Lumber Co. (1917) 196 Mich. 516, 162 N. W. 975.

An employee received a blow in his chest while engaged in his regular duties. When he straightened up he swore, but said little, if anything, of his injury that day. His work was not active, and much of the time he remained seated. The next day he complained of sickness and of the injury, and was sent for first aid. He ate no lunch, and went to his home and to bed. Two days later a physician was called, who pronounced it pneumonia. A consultation of physicians was held. He died of pneumonia four days after the injury. The testimony was conflicting as to whether the pneumonia was on the same side as the injury. Two physicians testified that in their opinion the injury was the inciting cause of the pneumonia; others testified to the contrary. The employer claimed that influenza was the cause of the death, and it was shown that an epidemic of influenza had broken out in a military camp about 1½ miles distant, but there was no evidence definitely tracing the pneumonia to the influenza. It was held that the evidence warranted a finding that the disease was caused by the injury received in the course of the employment. Delso v. Crucible Steel Co. (1921) 195 App. Div. 288, 187 N. Y. Supp. 66.

A workman, while at work for his employer as helper and driver at a brewery, fell on a cement floor, striking the back of his head and cutting a large gash. The wound was dressed by a physician and he was taken home, and a few days later erysipelas developed, followed by an attack of pneumonia, from which he died. About two months previously he had suffered a slight attack of pneumonia which had cleared up in about two weeks, and he had returned to work. The medical evidence was to the effect that the erysipelas was the result of an infection through the wound, and that pneumonia followed, with that as one of the producing causes. It was held that the evidence warranted a finding that the death was due to an injury received in the course of the employment. Wanda v. Jamestown

A workman employed as a driver of a lumber sleigh complained of an injury to his left side, caused by lifting the sleigh when the runners stuck. On the day of the accident he notified his employers of the nature of the injury. He also told a fellow employee at the time, and on going home complained of having hurt his side while lifting the sleigh. He was unable to lift a weight with his left arm, and bathed his side with liniment. The accident occurred on Wednesday, and after several attempts to work he ceased entirely on the following Monday, and on Tuesday called in his physician. The doctor testified that he found him suffering from tenderness of the lower part of the left lung. He continued to grow worse, and finally died of pneumonia. The medical testimony was that such an injury as he claimed to have suffered might cause pneumonia, and one physician testified that in his opinion the pneumonia was caused by the injury. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the death was attributable to his employment. Folts v. Robertson (1919) 188 App. Div. 359, 177 N. Y. Supp. 34.

A workman received an injury to his arm during the course of his employment. The medical testimony was to the effect that, on examination of the arm about four months after the injury, it was found that the wound from the injury had not healed, there being at the time an open sore on the arm, which became infected with erysipelas, which spread over the neck to the side of the face and finally developed into pneumonia, from which he died. The doctor testified further that in his opinion the primary cause of the erysipelas was the unhealed portion of the injury, and that it was rather common for pneumonia to follow such infection. The court held that the evidence fully sustained a finding that the man died as a result of the injury received. Ft. Wayne Rolling Mill Corp. v. Buanno (1919) 69 Ind. App. 464, 122 N. E. 362.

superintendent of an amusement resort, an employee organized a fire brigade to protect the property of his employer. He was also a member of the local fire department and received a nominal sum for his services, and was subject to a fine for failure to answer a call to a fire. A fire broke out in a building 40 feet from the property of his employer. He responded with the fire-fighting apparatus of his employer, and when that gave out assisted the local company with their apparatus. The inhalation of damp smoke and drenching with water resulted in lobar pneumonia, from which he later died. It was held that the death was due to an injury received in the course of the employment. McPhee's Case (1915) 222 Mass. 1, 109 N. E. 633, 10 N. C. C. A. 257.

A workman received an injury to his ankle on September 26, 1916, while engaged in the duties of his employment, and was taken to a hospital, where an operation was performed on October 14, and a bone called the astragalus removed. About four weeks later he was removed to his home. His doctor's and hospital bills were paid by his employer, whose physician continued to treat him until December 14, after which time he was treated by his family physician. The wound from the operation healed, and he was able to move about the house on crutches, and go out of doors when the weather was pleasant. His foot was kept in a cast for some time, and an ulcer developed on the ball of his foot; also a pimple on the outer side of the leg formed, from which a small amount of pus was discharged, and a short time before his death a large abscess appeared on the back of his neck. On the afternoon of March 2 he went with a friend for an automobile ride, and was out from about 3 o'clock to about 6:30. The temperature was from 30 to 31 degrees. When he returned home he ate his dinner, after which he went to a drug store near by to get some medicine for his injured foot. Later he retired to bed, and at 7:30 o'clock next morning ate breakfast in bed, consisting of coffee and a roll. He made no complaint of feeling ill. At 9 o'clock he called his wife to his bed, and said he wanted to spit. His wife assisted him to rise up, when his head fell over on her shoulder, and she discovered he was dead. A post-mortem was made by the coroner's physician, who testified that he found the right lung congested and hypostatic pneumonia in the left lung, and gave it as his opinion that he died of pneumonia associated with injuries to the foot. It was held there was competent evidence to support the claim that the death resulted from an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. Bergstrom v. Industrial Commission (1918) 286 Ill. 29, 121 N. E. 195.

A workman was engaged with others in "putting up a set of timbers at the face of the buggy gangway" in one of the mines of his employer, and while placing in position a stick of lumber 6 feet long and 12 inches in thickness, known as a collar, he was "squeezed" or "bumped" by the collar. He immediately complained to his fellow workman of the injury, and of pain in his side, left the mine, and went to his home. His wife testified that upon examination of his body on his return home she found a "streak of red, a red mark turning to a black." The family physician described the mark as "being on the right side, about the ninth or tenth rib, and was a slight abrasion like a scratch, a discoloration in an area of about 2 or 3 inches in diameter." Another doctor said he found "a discoloration of the skin. It was ragged like, but was not in any way scarred or circumscribed. It had an outline like the map of Europe." During his illness four doctors were called from time to time. The family doctor was of the opinion that the injury caused traumatic pleurisy, which later developed into pneumonia. All the physicians agreed that death was the result of pneumonia, which followed either traumatic pleurisy or influenza, the latter being prevalent at the time. None, however, testified that the development of traumatic pneumonia from an injury such as was indicated by the mark on the body of the workman was improbable or impossible. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the death of the workman was due to an injury received in the course of his employment. Dumbluskey v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. (1921) 270 Pa. 22, 112 Atl. 745.

A lineman, while engaged in the course of his employment, came in contact with a wire heavily charged with electricity, which caused him to fall from a pole on which he was working, to the street, a distance of 28 feet. On striking the ground his knees "doubled up" and came violently in contact with his chest, causing considerable pain during the day, and indicating the fracture of one or more ribs. Whether or not his ribs were broken the physician who made an examination was unable to determine. The pain in the chest continued, making breathing difficult. After three days he returned to his place of employment, but on account of the constant severe pain in his chest did not engage in his usual work, and later was obliged to return home and again call a physician, who then diagnosed his trouble as lobar pneumonia, from which he died ten days after the accident. It was held that the death was due to an injury received in the course of the employment. In answer to the contention that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding, in that there was no evidence to show that the deceased was not exposed or subject to other conditions from which the disease might have been contracted, the court said: "The findings of the referee clearly show the injury to the chest resulted in continuous pain from the time of the accident until the trouble was diagnosed by the physician as lobar pneumonia, and we find nothing in the record to justify the inference that, between the time of receiving the injury and the development of the disease, there were other causes from which pneumonia might have been contracted. That the physician failed to discover a fractured rib does not detract from the weight to be given the undisputed fact that a blow on the chest was received, followed by continuous pain, resulting a week later in the disease which finally caused death. The nature of the injury and its resultant effects, followed so closely by the development of the disease, constitute sufficient evidence to support the conclusion of the referee and the court below, particularly as a consideration of the record indicates ample expert medical testimony upon which the referee based his conclusion that the injury to the chest was the proximate cause of the disease which terminated in the death of the claimant's husband. Murdock v. New York News Bureau (1919) 263 Pa. 502, 106 Atl. 788.

A night watchman went to his work at the usual time, and the next morning was found at his place of work in a state of collapse. He developed pneumonia and peritonitis, and after a few days died. When he went on duty he was in good health, and was left by his fellow workman in a mirthful mood. When discovered in the morning he said that he had been hurt. On the body of the deceased there was a mark, or marks, which turned black and blood poisoning set in. There was some medical testimony that the symptoms were more consistent with traumatic pneumonia than with illness otherwise caused. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that his death was attributable to his employment. Mailman's Case (1918) 118 Me. 172, 106 Atl. 606.

A workman was employed by a moving and storage company. His duties consisted largely in the moving of pianos. On May 4, about 4:30 in the afternoon, he was engaged in moving a piano with the assistance of two other men. Upon his return home that evening he complained to his wife of severe pain in his back. On the next day, May 5, he told an employee that he thought he had injured himself in moving a piano the day before. He also made a similar complaint when he subsequently consulted a physician. He continued to work at his customary employment until noon of May 13, when he was obliged to give up work. A physician was called and found that he was suffering with severe pain in the right side, extending down through the abdomen to the leg. On May 16, on the advice of his attending physician, he was sent to a hospital, where he died on May 20. About a week after his death the body was exhumed and a post-mortem held. This disclosed a narrowing in one place of the intestines; the lungs showed solidification, due to pneumonia. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that the death was attributable to an injury arising out of his employment. Wolford v. Geisel Moving & Storage Co. (1919) 262 Pa. 454, 105 Atl. 831.

A finding of the commission that death from pneumonia was the result of severe burns received by deceased several months before was affirmed in Ballou's Case (1922) — Me. —, 116 Atl. 591, upon evidence that, from the time of the fire to the date of his death, deceased gradually lost weight and strength and developed a cough which continued with increasing intensity until his death, and the testimony of a physician that the injury from the burns must have had something to do with the condition of the lungs.

A miner, because of the breaking down of a pump, was compelled to stand knee-deep in cold water while waiting for a cage. He contracted a chill, and five days later was found to be suffering from pneumonia of which he subsequently died. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the death was the result of an injury arising out of his employment. Alloa Coal Co. v. Drylie [1913; Ct. Sess.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 213, [1913] S. C. 549, 50 Scot. L. R. 350, 1 Scot. L. T. 167, 6 B. W. C. C. 398, 4 N. C. C. A. 899.

Owing to an accident in the shaft of the pit where a miner was working, he and his fellow workers were ordered to ascend to the surface by the shaft of another pit, this being the downcast shaft for the air current which ventilated the mine. They were left waiting at a mid-landing for an hour and a half until the men who usually ascended by this shaft had been raised, and were exposed to a cold down draft. As a result of this exposure the miner caught a chill, which brought on pneumonia from which he died. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to show an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment. Coyle v. Watson [1915; H. L.] A. C. (Eng.) 1, 83 L. J. P. C. N. S. 307, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 228, 111 L. T. N. S. 347, [1914] W. N. 195, 30 Times L. R. 501, 58 Sol. Jo. 533, [1914] S. C. 44, 51 Scot. L. R. 492, 7 B. W. C. C. 259, reversing [1913] S. C. 593, 50 Scot. L. R. 415, 6 B. W. C. C. 416.

Two workmen were lifting a drill weighing 1½ hundredweight, when the drill slipped. One of the men on getting back to his home told his wife that he had a pain in his side. Two days later the wife called the doctor. The doctor treated the pain in the man's side as being due to a strain. Five weeks later the man died from bronchial pneumonia, and the doctor then expressed the opinion that the man had strained his liver, and that the injury had extended ultimately to the lungs. The widow further gave evidence that during the time that the man was ill he was visited by his employer, who asked him what was the matter, and the man said he had strained himself lifting the drill, whereupon the employer gave him a sum of money "to go on with," and told him the sum that his compensation would amount to. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to support a finding that the pneumonia was due to an injury which occurred in the course of the employment. Chantler v. Bromley [1921; C. A.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 171, 14 B. W. C. C. 14.

Where it was admitted that an accident occurred in the course of employment, it was held that it was sufficiently proven that pneumonia following was caused thereby, by evidence, in addition to the testimony of expert doctors, tending to show discoloration on parts of the body, pain and suffering, headache, and restlessness, indicating that the trauma caused by the fall was likely to result in pneumonia. A. Breslauer Co. v.

A man working in the hold of a ship was seen to climb out, apparently in great pain. He went home, and a doctor who saw him found injuries to his ribs. Pneumonia supervened, and he died in a few days. The pneumonia was due to the rib injuries. It was held that there was evidence to support the inference that the accident arose out of the employment. Losh v. Richard Evans & Co. (1902) 19 Times L. R. (Eng.) 142; 51 Week. Rep. 243, 5 W. C. C. 17.

A healthy and steady workman was employed to pick up cotton waste on the deck of a ship. At 1 P. M. he was sent to work in No. 6 hold; at 3 P. M. he climbed up the ladder of the hold, apparently in great pain, and was sent home. He was medically attended, and marks were found on his ribs; three days later he developed pneumonia, attributed by the doctor to the injury to his sides, of which he died. It was held that there was evidence that the workman had died from "personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment." Lovelady v. Berrie (1909) 2 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 62.

An undertaker's workman had, as a part of his work, to lift coffins into vans. He went to work one day well, and returned home with bruises and a swollen leg. He died within a week of pneumonia supervening on pleurisy, caused by these injuries. The recorder found that the accident causing the injuries arose out of the employment. It was held that there was evidence to support the finding. Re Workmen's Compensation Act [1911] 2 Ir. R. 301, 45 Ir. L. T. 82, 4 B. W. C. C. 482.

A teamster, required in the course of his work to handle heavy boxes, quit before the end of the day, complaining of a pain in his back. The next day he was found to have bruises on his back and side. He later died from traumatic pneumonia. It was held that a finding that he had sustained an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment was justified. Armour & Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1916) 273 Ill. 590, 113 N. E. 138.

On or about March 18, 1917, a stevedore ruptured himself by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. On April 2 he was operated on in a hospital, and a radical cure of the rupture was effected. He came out of the hospital cured, but in a weak condition, on April 14, but got worse, and was sent to an infirmary on September 22, where he died on December 12 of pulmonary pneumonia. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to show that his death from pneumonia was attributable to his employment. Kemp v. Clyde Shipping Co. [1918] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 258, 87 L. J. K. B. N. S. 861, 119 L. T. N. S. 131, 11 B. W. C. C. 109.

An engine driver who had to take out an early train was, on a morning in March which was bitterly cold and snowy, called late by a fellow workman, and hurried to his engine insufficiently clad, and without his usual food; on the same or the following day, as to which there was a conflict of evidence, while engaged in his employment, he collapsed, and subsequently died of pneumonia. It was held that his death was not the result of an accident arising out of his employment, but that, even assuming that it was such an accident, the evidence was not sufficient to show that it arose in the course of his employment, as his going out insufficiently clothed and without food happened at his own home, and before his employment had begun. Dennis v. Midland R. Co. [1921; H. L.] W. N. (Eng.) 160, 65 Sol. Jo. 511, 37 Times L. R. 623, 90 L. J. P. C. N. S. 144, 125 L. T. N. S. 545, 14 B. W. C. C. 71.

A driver for a firm of teamsters had suffered an injury some four or five years previously, which caused an impairment of his memory. While in charge of one of his employer's teams he suffered a lapse of memory and, in attempting to get the horses to the stable, lost his way and wandered from his wagon into a swamp, and suffered exposure during the night which caused him to contract pneumonia, from which he died. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to show that the disease arose out of his employment, as there was nothing in the employment of driving a wagon which made it likely that the employee would alight from his wagon and wander to, and fall into, a swamp, and lie there all night. Milliken's Case (1914) 216 Mass. 293, L.R.A.1916A, 337, 103 N. E. 898, 4 N. C. C. A. 512.

A brusher went to the bottom of the pit shaft to be taken to the surface just at the time of the beginning of the daily statutory shaft inspection, of which he knew. The inspection took an hour that morning, instead of the usual half hour, owing to the breakdown of the bell wire, and during that time the workman stood about in a strong current of cold air. He contracted a chill, and died of pneumonia. It was held that the evidence supported the finding by the arbitrator that the deceased had not been injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. Lyons v. Woodilee Coal & Coke Co. (1917) 117 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 65, 86 L. J. P. C. N. S. 137, [1917] W. N. 151, 61 Sol. Jo. 490, affirming [1916] S. C. 719, 53 Scot. L. R. 538, 9 B. W. C. C. 655.

A workman died of pneumonia. His dependents contended that the pneumonia resulted from lowered vitality caused by an accident to him, arising out of and in the course of his employment. The medical referee reported that pneumonia could not have been caused by the alleged accident, the only evidence of which consisted of several inconsistent statements made by the workman to various persons on the day after the accident, which were admitted in evidence without any objection being taken. It was held that there was no evidence that there was any accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. Langley v. Reeve (1900) 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 175.

qq. Rheumatism.

A mine brusher was directed to bail out of the pit the water which had accumulated owing to the breakdown of the pump. This necessitated his standing immersed in water up to his chest for eight hours. Thereafter he was incapacitated for work for several days by rheumatism, owing to the extreme and exceptional exposure to cold and damp which his work of bailing had entailed. On these facts, the arbitrator held that there was evidence that the workman was incapacitated by an injury caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. And, on appeal, it was held that there was evidence on which the arbitrator could so find. Glasgow Coal Co. v. Welsh [1916] 2 A. C. (Eng.) 1, 10 B. R. C. 308, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 161, 114 L. T. N. S. 809, [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 79, 85 L. J. P. C. N. S. 130, 32 Times L. R. 359, 60 Sol. Jo. 336, 9 B. W. C. C. 371, [1916] W. N. 109, affirming [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 463, [1915] S. C. 1020, [1915] 2 Scot. L. T. 123, 52 Scot. L. R. 798.

A workman was employed as a fireman. His employer had recently removed its plant, and some of the employees, according to custom, worked in the evening after regular hours, getting the new plant into shape. One evening, after he had finished his work on a defective valve, he went to a room where a fellow workman was working, who had not finished, and helped him to finish this work. While helping the fellow workman, he pinched his finger, causing a blister to form. Blood poisoning set in, and later inflammatory rheumatism, and he finally died. The employer reported the accident, and entered into an agreement for compensation. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the death was caused by an injury received in the course of the employment. Perdew v. Nufer Cedar Co. (1918) 201 Mich. 520, 167 N. W. 868.

A workman injured his foot by slipping when coming down a telephone pole, falling about 7 feet, and hitting his foot on a brick. He testified that when he went home his foot was swollen and pained him, and he thought he had sprained it. He developed rheumatism, which was located in the knee, shoulder, and several different joints, as well as in the foot. His attending physician testified that he could not say whether the condition of the applicant was due to the injury or not. Two other physicians expressed the same opinion, and a third testified positively that the applicant's condition was due wholly to rheumatism with which the injury had nothing to do. It was held that there was evidence to justify a finding that the disease was not attributable to the employment. Jackson v. Iowa Teleph. Co. (1920) 190 Iowa, 1394, 179 N. W. 849.

rr. Scarlet fever.

A porter in a scarlet fever hospital had an attack of influenza and returned to his work on March 22. On April 1 he was, in the course of his duty, in the scarlet fever wards, and he also cleaned the mortuary for the first time after his return. About three or four hours afterwards he was sick, and for the next three days he was very unwell. On April 5 he was found to be suffering from scarlet fever. As a result of his illness his heart was affected and he suffered from nephritis, and at the date of the application he was totally incapacitated for work. He could not say that there had been in the mortuary, shortly before the day he cleaned it, any bodies of persons who had died from scarlet fever, but he said that it was very likely there had been. It was held that the evidence did not show that there was an accident arising in the course of the employment. Martin v. Manchester (1912) 106 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 741, 76 J. P. 259, 10 L. G. R. 996, 28 Times L. R. 344, [1912] W. C. Rep. 289.

ss. Sciatica.

A pilot was employed to take a ketch out of the harbor on a rough night with a high wind. Having piloted the ketch out of the harbor, and having been paid, the applicant attempted to get into his own boat, which was being towed astern of the ketch, for the purpose of going ashore. He jumped into the boat, alighting somewhere near the bows, with the result that they went under water, and he got wet to his thighs. He was pulled up on board the ketch again, and later rowed ashore. Subsequently he suffered from sciatica. The county court judge found that the applicant's boat filled with water by accident, that he got wet by accident when he first jumped into the boat to go ashore, that the sciatica was the result of this accident, and that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment. On appeal, it was held that there was sufficient evidence on which the county court judge could find as he did. Barbeary v. Chugg [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 174, 112 L. T. N. S. 797, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 504, 31 Times L. R. 153, 8 B. W. C. C. 37.

An employee of a smelting company, while tending a furnace, was affected by smoke and gas from the furnace, and became dizzy and vomited. After lying down for a short time he walked home with the aid of a fellow workman. He complained of a pain in his stomach and in the calf of his right leg. He was treated by several physicians. One, connected with the dispensary of a hospital to which he went, testified that he showed symptoms of lead poisoning, for which he treated him; also, that he had sciatic neuritis, which could come from local infection and could also come from lead; that he had pyorrhea, and might have been suffering from a pus infection; that the fact that the sciatica did not respond to the treatment for lead poisoning impelled him to doubt that poisoning might be a contributing cause of the sciatica. Other physicians testified that they found no traces of lead poisoning, but did find symptoms of several diseases, and were of the opinion that the sciatica was not due to lead poisoning, but to the other ailments from which the man was suffering. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain a finding that the diseased condition of the man was attributable to his work. St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Industrial Commission (1921) 298 Ill. 272, 131 N. E. 617.

tt. Sleeping sickness.

In Donovan v. Alliance Electric Co. (1920) 191 App. Div. 303, 181 N. Y. Supp. 823, the claimant, in the course of his employment, hit his head against a desk. He worked regularly thereafter for about three weeks, when he developed encephalitis, commonly known as sleeping sickness. At one stage of the disease the physicians thought the symptoms indicated a fractured skull, but subsequent developments caused them to change their opinion. No physician testified that in his opinion the injury caused the sickness. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain a finding that the disease was attributable to the employment. The court said: "It cannot be that a tentative diagnosis in a partially developed case subject to future developments, and which is changed by the later history of the case, has any probative force. At most, a statement of a witness out of court inconsistent with his testimony discredits the witness, but is never received as evidence of the fact contained in such inconsistent statement. No physician in this case has ever testified to a fractured skull, and no physician connects the present disease with the blow to the head. The commission, in its effort to make such connection, has based its finding on the erroneous hypothesis of a fractured skull, of which there is no evidence." After resubmission to the commission, an award was again made in favor of the claimant. The medical testimony on the second hearing was to the effect that the sleeping sickness was not the result of trauma, but of infection, and the fact that the claimant developed sleeping sickness following the bump on his head was merely a coincidence. The award was again reversed, with directions to the commission to award the claimant for the bump on the head, but not for the sleeping sickness. (1921) 195 App. Div. 678, 186 N. Y. Supp. 818.

uu. Spondylitis deformans.

A laborer was injured through the falling of a platform over which he was wheeling a truck loaded with boxes filled with goods, in the course of his employment. About fifteen months after an award had been made by the commission in his favor, he filed a second petition, alleging that the injury had caused to develop an inflammatory condition of some of the lumbar vertebræ, known as spondylitis deformans. The evidence showed that the claimant was a man in excellent health before the injury, and that the disease in question was very apt to be caused by a weakened condition of certain portions of the body, such as was caused by the injury. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the disease had its inception in the course of his employment. Squire-Dingee Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1917) 281 Ill. 359, 117 N. E. 1031.

vv. Tetanus.

A workman was employed in a machine shop as an operator of a drill press. While engaged in such work on December 19, 1919, he stepped on a steel shaving, which entered his foot near the little toe. He did not appear greatly concerned about it, and worked until December 25. On that day he became ill. From that time he rapidly grew worse, and died on December 29 of tetanus. It was shown that the deceased had, on December 1, scratched or punctured his foot by coming in contact with an old nail while doing some work in his cellar, and that the injury caused by the steel shaving was in the same place as the nail injury. The medical witnesses testified that he died of acute tetanus, and that acute tetanus usually developed in six or seven days after the injury, and not longer than nine days; that the nail injury might have developed chronic tetanus, but that deceased died of acute tetanus. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to justify a finding that the tetanus was caused by the injury from the steel shaving, received in the course of the employment. Bresee v. Clark Equipment Co. (1921) 214 Mich. 235, 183 N. W. 19.

On the morning of August 14 a collier started to his work in his employer's coal mine, having made no complaint to anyone, nor did anyone see him walking as if there was anything the matter with his feet. Later on he came out of the stall where he had been working, and complained to the head man that his feet hurt him. The head man found on the floor in the stall a piece of rock weighing about 3 or 4 pounds, which had fallen from the roof during the working hours. On August 19 a doctor examined the foot and found a small wound about half an inch in length, of a kind that might have been caused, in the doctor's opinion, by a piece of stone falling on it. A scratch or nearly healed scar on the sole of the foot was also discovered. On August 25 the workman was found to be suffering from tetanus, from which he died the next day. It was held that a finding that the injury was caused by an accident in the course of the employment was sustained by the evidence. Stapleton v. Dinnington Main Coal Co. (1912) 107 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 247, [1912] W. C. Rep. 376, 5 B. W. C. C. 602.

A carpenter, while engaged in the duties of his employment, stuck a nail in his foot. He had it treated from time to time by a doctor, but he finally developed tetanus from which he died. The doctor testified that in his opinion the disease was attributable to the accident. The evidence was held to be sufficient to sustain an award in favor of the claimant. Snyder v. Industrial Commission (1921) 297 Ill. 175, 130 N. E. 369.

Where a gardener was injured while at work in the garden by a nail passing through his boot and piercing the large toe, and died from tetanus which subsequently set in, it was held that the evidence, as shown together with testimony that persons working in stables and gardens were peculiarly subject to contract the disease of tetanus in suffering from any wound or cut, was sufficient to prove that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment, although it was not shown that he might not have contracted the disease elsewhere. Walker v. Mullins (1908) 42 Ir. L. T. 168, 1 B. W. C. C. 211.

vv. Tuberculosis.

While the claimant was working for his employer operating a crane, one of the timbers broke, and to save himself from injury he jumped into the river, a distance of some 10 feet, the water coming up to his knees. He waded to the shore and contracted a heavy cold and pleurisy, which developed into pulmonary tuberculosis. It was held that the evidence sustained the finding that his condition was the result of an accidental injury arising out of and in the course of his employment. Rist v. Larkin (1916) 171 App. Div. 71, 156 N. Y. Supp. 875.

An employee, while engaged as a car washer in a garage, was crushed between two cars, injuring his abdomen and chest. He later developed tuberculosis from which he died. The medical evidence was in conflict, being to the effect, on the one hand, that the injury in no way contributed to the disease, and, on the other hand, that it might have. An expert called by the commission testified that in his opinion the injury was an activating agency, and contributed to, or quickened the progress of, an otherwise dormant tubercular condition. It was held that the evidence, though weak, was sufficient to sustain an award in favor of the claimant, particularly in view of the aid given by the statutory presumption that claims come within the provisions of the act. McGoey v. Turin Garage & Supply Co. (1921) 195 App. Div. 436, 186 N. Y. Supp. 697.

A workman employed as a mason fell from a ladder a distance of 18 or 20 feet, striking his side on a pipe or box, and strained his left side, back, and ankle. The physician who attended him testified that some of his short ribs were fractured and loosened. He did some work after the accident, but did not recover to any extent his strength or previous health, and in about one year developed tuberculosis of the right lung, from which he died. Doctors on both sides agreed that for a period of time after the injury the several examinations did not disclose tuberculosis, and that there was an absence of any symptoms denoting the active presence of that disease. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that a latent tubercular condition was lighted up by the injury, so as to cause death from pulmonary tuberculosis. The court said: "The evidence here for claimant is not uncorroborated hearsay evidence; it was the evidence of the physician who knew deceased before the accident, and treated him almost continuously after the accident until his death. Immediately, or within three days after the accident, his lungs were examined, and soon thereafter his blood pressure was taken, and both found practically normal; he was a strong man doing the hard work of a mason, and never sick or ailing; this physician treated claimant for some years before her husband was injured, and he knew. His evidence was as positive as any that can be given by a physician of internal conditions, and is such evidence as is relied upon generally in the vicissitudes of everyday life." Van Gordon v. Hires Condensed Milk Co. (1920) 193 App. Div. 601, 184 N. Y. Supp. 402.

A workman, during the course of his employment, suffered an injury consisting of a blow on the head. Twenty-three days thereafter he died from tuberculosis of the brain. One doctor testified that he found a distinct tuberculosis of the base of the brain. All the medical testimony was to the effect that a trauma of the kind which the employee had received could excite a dormant tubercular condition into activity, and accelerate death. There was no evidence to the contrary, but there was evidence that there were no traumatic indications at the time of death, more than three weeks after the trauma. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to justify a finding that the blow on the head was the inducing cause of the active manifestation of an otherwise dormant disease. Schlenker v. Garford Motor Truck Co. (1918) 183 App. Div. 166, 170 N. Y. Supp. 439.

An employee, while engaged in lifting a box weighing some 30 or 40 pounds, fell against a vise located on his workbench, striking his neck just above his collar bone. About the time of the accident, but whether before or after the evidence did not show, he had a slight hemorrhage or spitting of blood. He remained away from work for three weeks. On his return he only worked for a few days, when he stopped for good, and about nine months thereafter died of tuberculosis. The medical testimony was to the effect that the man was suffering from tuberculosis at the time of his injury; that such an injury might accelerate the disease. It was held that a finding that his death was attributable to the injury received in the course of his employment was supported by the evidence. Van Keuren v. Dwight Divine & Sons (1917) 179 App. Div. 509, 165 N. Y. Supp. 1049, affirmed without opinion in (1918) 222 N. Y. 648, 119 N. E. 1083.

An employee was injured by an explosion which enveloped him with steam and gas, and struck him with debris, injuring his head, hip, and side. He was confined to his bed for a month. He was apparently a healthy man up to the time of his injury, but the physician testified that there was evidence of chronic disease, and the examination, his cough, and the history show tuberculosis of the lungs. He was never well after the accident, and the physician testified that the history would indicate that his trouble was the result of his injury. It was held that the evidence was ample to sustain a finding that the injury resulted in a weakened vitality and resistance, and that the latent tuberculosis was aggravated and accelerated into active tuberculosis, from which he died. Republic Iron & Steel Co. v. Markiewicz (1921) — Ind. App. —, 129 N. E. 710.

A workman, while driving his employer's wagon in the course of his duties, was thrown against the hub of a wheel, and thence to the ground, through the striking of his wagon by an automobile. His ribs, chest, and back were injured, and he developed tuberculosis, from which he later died. There was evidence that at the time of the accident he was suffering from pulmonary tuberculosis, and that the injury, while not causing the disease, hastened its progress or excited it to a fatal termination. This was held to be sufficient to warrant a finding in favor of the claimant. Glenon's Case (1920) 236 Mass. 542, 128 N. E. 942.

A night watchman, while engaged in the performance of his duties, fell over a pile of scrap iron and injured his knee. The knee became so painful that he was taken to a hospital, where he remained for about three months. He thereafter returned to work as a night watchman, and was so employed for about three months, when his knee again became painful, and he was taken to the hospital. Tuberculosis of the bone set in, which necessitated the amputation of his leg. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to justify a finding that the disability was the result of the accident, and the fact that the applicant was predisposed to tuberculosis of the bones did not affect his right to recover. Wabash R. Co. v. Industrial Commission (1918) 286 Ill. 194, 121 N. E. 569.

A carpenter, while working pursuant to his employment, received a severe injury to the lower part of his back, as the result of a fall, which disabled him at that time for a period of nineteen days, and he was then paid compensation for five days; soon thereafter he tried to work at his trade as a carpenter, but was unable to continue because of the effects of his injury; about a month subsequent to his injury he went to Chicago to visit and rest, and remained there for more than a month; subsequently he went to Albany, where he worked for a news company as a caller until May 10, 1916, when he became severely ill and returned home, but was unable to secure any permanent improvement in his health; he was injured across the small of the back, and complained of his back, side, and kidneys. He was taken to a hospital where he received treatment, and on his return home was confined to his bed until his death in July, 1917. The medical testimony was that he died from tuberculosis following nephritis, and that the injury to his back and kidneys was such as might, and probably did, cause nephritis, which so weakened him that he either became susceptible to tuberculosis, or the disease theretofore latent in his system was aggravated and accelerated, and eventually caused his death. This evidence was held to be sufficient to sustain a finding that the death was attributable to the injury received in the course of his employment. Retmier v. Cruse (1918) 67 Ind. App. 192, 119 N. E. 32.

A workman fractured his ankle in August, 1918, in an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. In May, 1920, he died of tuberculosis. His attending physician testified that the tuberculosis was the result of the accident of 1918. There was no other evidence. It was held that a finding in favor of the complainant was justified by the evidence. In answer to the contention that the physician was inexperienced, and his deductions so unscientific that no weight should be given his opinion, the court said: "The doctor is a general practitioner, and not a specialist; but he has been engaged in practice for eleven years. He treated Mr. Gray for about a year and a half. He made some examinations of the injured ankle, having an X-ray photograph taken to facilitate the examination. He treated the fracture, and his treatment is not criticized. According to his testimony, he discovered that the bones were not uniting, made an incision, found the ankle joint destroyed, and amputated the leg. In January, 1919, the symptoms of the patient suggested to the mind of the doctor a tubercular condition of the bones. Considerably later, he had an analysis of the sputum made at the state laboratory. The doctor was subjected to a searching cross-examination. His testimony was shaken, but not destroyed; weakened, but not annihilated; torpedoed, but not sunk." Gray v. St. Croix Paper Co. (1921) — Me. —, 113 Atl. 32.

A workman, while engaged in the duties of his employment, suffered a fracture of the ribs. From the date of his injury he became broken down in his general health, and went into a steady decline, gradually growing weaker until the date of his death about ten months later. The medical testimony was in sharp conflict, there being evidence on the one hand that he died of tuberculosis contracted as a result of his injury, and on the other hand, evidence that his death was not attributable to an injury, but was due to heart disease as a result of rheumatism. It was established that before his injury he was a man in full health and vigor. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to warrant a finding that the death was attributable to the injury received in the course of employment. Lundy v. George Brown & Co. (1919) 93 N. J. L. 107, 106 Atl. 362, affirmed in (1919) 93 N. J. L. 469, 108 Atl. 252.

A workman, while in his master's employment, suffered in July a serious accident, which affected his brain and general health, and he died in the following December. A post-mortem examination showed that he died from acute tuberculosis, which had been latent for some time, but there was medical evidence that the disease might have been accelerated or aggravated by his lowered state of vitality, due to the accident. It was held that there was sufficient evidence on which the county court judge could properly find that the death resulted from the accident, which set up the disease from which the workman died. Beare v. Garrod [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 438, 85 L. J. K. B. N. S. 717, 113 L. T. N. S. 673, 8 B. W. C. C. 474, 10 N. C. C. A. 756.

It has been held that the death of an employee, who, prior to his injury, was shown to be a seemingly strong and healthy man, and who was burned on his hands and face by an explosion of gas, and subsequently complained of pains in his throat and chest, and was in a run-down condition, and died about four months after his injury, of miliary tuberculosis, may be found to have been proximately caused by the gas explosion. There was expert testimony to the effect that the inhalation of the gas fumes would furnish an opportunity, if the infection of the disease existed in a latent condition at the time, for the latent condition to be kindled into an active condition; and that if the infection was not existent, the inhalation of gas would bring about the destruction of air cells in the lungs, and would lower his vitality, and make the person more susceptible to such infection; and that the usual time for the course of miliary tuberculosis was from four to six weeks, but that it might continue for three or four months. Heileman Brewing Co. v. Industrial Commission (1915) 161 Wis. 46, 152 N. W. 446.

In McCarthy's Case (1918) 231 Mass. 259, 120 N. E. 852, the court, without stating specifically of what the evidence consisted, held that it was sufficient to sustain a finding that tuberculosis, of which the workman died, was attributable to an injury received in the course of his employment.

A miner had his back crushed by a fall of coal. He received compensation for six months, when he returned to the light work of painting wagons. He did this work regularly for eighteen months, when he was taken ill with tuberculosis of the lungs, and died of this disease just over two years after the accident. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to show that the disease was contracted in the course of his employment. Comery v. New Hucknall Colliery Co. (1919; C. A.) 88 L. J. K. B. N. S. (Eng.) 462, [1919] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 63, 12 B. W. C. C. 1, 120 L. T. N. S. 456.

An employee was engaged as the driver of a milk wagon. His wife testified that on coming home one morning he acted in a silly manner, so that she thought someone had doped him. He was irrational on that day, and could give no account of how he was injured. She testified that the next day he was rational, and told her that he had slipped on the ice in the wagon, and fallen and hurt the back of his head. He was not able to make any intelligent communication at any time subsequent to the day following the accident. After that he lapsed into semiconsciousness, and grew worse until his death, about two weeks later. His attending physician testified that on the day that he was conscious he stated that something had happened to him; that he thought he fell; that he had hurt himself, but that he did not know when, where, or how. With another physician, he examined him thoroughly, the examination being absolutely negative, aside from a slight abrasion on one of his legs, which could not have contributed to his condition in any way. An autopsy showed that the chief and determining cause of death was tubercular meningitis, and the contributing cause chronic pulmonary tuberculosis. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to sustain an award in favor of the claimant, the court saying: "The autopsy discloses an adequate cause of the death, with no evidence whatever of any injury which could have contributed to the death. It thus appears not only that there is no evidence of probative force to support the conclusion that the death resulted from an accident, but that it affirmatively appears that the death was due to disease which is not shown to have had any relation whatever to any alleged accident. The presumptions declared in § 21 of the act do not help the claimant; they do not relate to the fundamental question of the happening of the accident, which is in the nature of a jurisdictional fact, to be supported by direct or circumstantial evidence; and the presumptions do not prevail over 'substantial evidence to the contrary.' Workmen's Compensation Law, § 21. If any authority is needed for this proposition, it is to be found in Carroll v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. (1916) 218 N. Y. 435, 113 N. E. 506, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 540, and we are clearly of the opinion that hearsay testimony, unsupported by facts and circumstances to justify a reasonable inference, is not sufficient to establish the primary fact of an 'accidental personal injury sustained by the employee arising out of and in the course of his employment.' Workmen's Compensation Law, § 10. The jurisdiction of the state industrial commission to make an award depends upon the happening of an accident under the conditions named in the statute, and this requires evidence of probative force. Hearsay testimony is competent in explanation or corroboration, no doubt, but it must itself be corroborated by relevant facts, or it cannot be made the basis of an award under the statute here considered." McHale v. Sheffield Farms Co. (1920) 193 App. Div. 541, 184 N. Y. Supp. 576.

In Albaugh-Dover Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1917) 278 Ill. 179, 115 N. E. 834, the workman whose death was the subject of inquiry, and another, were wheeling a load of castings in a box on a truck down an inclined runway, the other man being at the upper end, holding the handles of the truck, and the workman in front of it, holding it back. The other man slipped and fell, and the truck ran against the workman and pushed him over and swung him around against a door. The box hit him on the left side, between the navel and the hip, and a little lower than the direct line. In reply to the question of the straw boss as to whether he got hurt, he replied that he did not, but got a strain as though they had put an electric wire on him, or an electric shock, and continued to work. Later he developed a suppurating sinus in the region of the epididymis, which was remote from the point of injury, and died of miliary tuberculosis of the lung. The medical evidence was unanimous that a tubercular condition resulting from a blow would develop at the point of the blow as the seat of the condition, and could not develop from a strain. It was held that the evidence failed to sustain a finding that the workman met with an accident arising out of the employment.

A workman, fifty-one years of age, died from the effects of an operation upon a malignant tumor of the kidneys. About sixteen months before his death he met with a severe accident in his employment, a heavy strut falling on his back near the region of the kidneys. After this accident he was away ill for about four months, when he returned to work for about seven months. He then went into a hospital, when the tumor was discovered and excised. He ultimately died from the effect of the operation. The medical evidence was that the tumor might have been congenital, or might have been caused by a blow, or might have been made malignant by a blow, or by other causes. There was no evidence of any other cause except the accident. There was evidence that, before the accident, the deceased was a strong healthy man, having no trouble with his kidneys, and that after the accident he was never able to do his work as he did before the accident. The county judge found that the accident caused the tumor (which then existed in a quiet condition) to become malignant, and that the death, therefore, resulted from injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. It was held that there was evidence to justify the finding of the county court judge. Lewis v. Port of London Authority [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 299, 7 B. W. C. C. 577, 58 Sol. Jo. 686.

yy. Typhoid fever.

A workman whose duty it was to clean pumps used in connection with sewage discharge, contracted typhoid fever. It was proved that he might, while handling the sewage, have come in contact with typhoid germs, but there was no evidence that he had done so. It was held that the evidence did not establish that the accident arose in the course of his employment. Finlay v. Tullamore Union [1914] 2 Ir. R. 233, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 222.

zz. Uremia.

A collier suffering from Bright's disease told a mate that he had hurt himself, and the mate saw marks of a tub, which the deceased had been filling, having come off the rails, though the tub was then on the rails. He went home, and died in a short time of uremia, as the post-mortem proved. It was held that an award in favor of the employers, on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to show that the man's death was attributable to his employment, was proper. Ashley v. Lilleshall Co. (1911) 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 85.

aaa. Miscellaneous.

A workman in a lumber camp was required to board and lodge in the quarters supplied by his employer, during the logging season. The employer furnished bunks, where he and the other men slept. The bedding furnished was very old and in poor condition, the straw sticking through the ticks. The claimant slept in a lower bunk. While lying in his bunk with a fellow workman, a piece of straw dropped from the bunk above him and lodged in his throat. He made an effort to remove the straw, calling the attention of his fellow workman to his condition, but was unable to dislodge it. Infection set in, which resulted in disability. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to show that the disability of the claimant was due to an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment. Holt Lumber Co. v. Industrial Commission (1919) 168 Wis. 381, 170 N. W. 366.

A workman, while employed as a watchman or gatekeeper on a highway, suffered an accidental injury to his foot, which became infected. As the infection progressed he grew weaker and became delirious, after which vomiting set in with an extension of the abdomen, and his bowels would not move, and in three days he died. The attending physician testified that in his opinion the immediate cause of death was obstruction of the bowels, the infected condition of the foot being a contributing cause. It was held that a finding that death was caused by an accident received in the course of the employment was sustained by the evidence. Doherty v. Grasse Isle Twp. (1919) 205 Mich. 592, 172 N. W. 596.

A workman suffered a broken leg while engaged in the duties of his employment. Twelve days later he died. It was contended by the employer that the death was caused by cerebral embolism; that is, that the man had had a bad case of arteriosclerosis, and that part of the lining of the artery became detached and formed a clot, that lodged in and plugged an artery in the brain. The claimant contended that the man died of pulmonary embo-lism—the plugging up of an artery in a lung by a blood clot which came from the site of the fracture. There were an equal number of doctors who testified on each side. It was held that it could not be said that there was not sufficient evidence to sustain a finding that death was due to the injury. Klage v. Bunsen Coal Co. (1915) 201 Ill. App. 58.

An employee, while engaged in the duties of his employment, attempted to open a door, when the knob came off and he fell backwards to the ground. The fall rendered him unconscious for a time, and when he regained consciousness he had to be assisted to his feet. He was taken home and did not resume work for six days, when, after working for about a week, he was compelled to cease all work because of total disability which continued until his death. About a year previous he had fallen, and had ceased work for sixteen weeks because of sickness. Prior to the accident he had been in reasonably good health, though there was conflicting evidence as to whether he was afflicted with syphilis at the time of the accident. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to show that death was due to an injury received in the course of the employment. Indianapolis Abattoir Co. v. Coleman (1917) 65 Ind. App. 369, 117 N. E. 502.

A workman was injured while engaged in his regular duties, by inhaling gases and fumes from molten brass, and later died. He was suffering from a disease at the time of the accident. The court, without setting out the evidence in detail, held it to be sufficient to show that the immediate cause of death was the inhalation of the noxious gas, and that if it accelerated a pre-existing latent disease so as to cause death, the injury must be regarded as the cause of the death. General American Tank Car Corp. v. Weirick (1921) — Ind. App. —, 133 N. E. 391.

A workman was employed in helping to unload boxes of steel from a car. A box slipped and fell on his toe. When he arrived home he was limping, and when he undressed it was found that his toes were red and bruised, and that there was a redness on his leg about 4 or 5 inches above the knee. He complained more about the leg than he did about the toe. The workman who was with him at the time of the accident testified that, while trying to raise the box of steel high enough to permit the placing of a 2-inch roller under it, it slipped and grated the toe. The medical testimony was to the effect that the condition of the injured workman's leg resulted in thrombosis, or stoppage of the saphenous vein in the thigh by a blood clot, finally resulting in death; that the injury to the toe in no way contributed to it. It was held that, after excluding certain inadmissible hearsay evidence, tending to show that the injury was to the leg as well as the toe, the evidence remaining was not sufficient to sustain a finding that death was due to an injury received in the course of the employment. Ginsberg v. Burroughs Adding Mach. Co. (1918) 204 Mich. 130, 170 N. W. 15.

A carpenter during the course of his duties was required, at intervals, to assist in repairing a tank in which a preparation of chemicals was placed. The chemicals were not of a dangerous nature, and there was no risk of suffocation or poisoning from their use, or contact with them. Prior to the day of his sickness the workman had been in good health. On that day he was found sitting on a box, and complained of feeling ill. A physician was sent for, and when he arrived found the man in a semiconscious state, frothing at the mouth and stiffening up on one side. He was sent to a hospital, and soon after died. Several physicians who attended or saw him testified that they were unable to state the cause of death. It was held, over the contention that the evidence showed the death to be due to poisoning from fumes of chemicals used at the place of work, that a finding that the cause of death was doubtful, being wholly a matter of conjecture, was warranted by the evidence. Murphy's Case (1918) 230 Mass. 99, 119 N. E. 657.

A workman was employed as a driver in a coal mine. On leaving home in the morning he was apparently in good condition and sound health. At noon, when he came to eat dinner, he was limping. He continued to work for about two hours, when he quit and went home. He was limping when he reached home, and his leg was swollen. Several days later he was taken to a hospital, and an operation was performed on the leg halfway between the knee and hip, disclosing a diseased condition of the periosteum. The infection spread through the body, resulting in death about a month after the operation. There were no eyewitnesses of any accident, and statements made by the workman to others that he was hurt by a falling rock were excluded as hearsay. There was no evidence of any fall of rock in the mine. The medical testimony was to the effect that the condition of the workman was caused by an injury, or from either hereditary or acquired syphilis, but that they were unable to determine which. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the burden on the claimant of proving that the diseased condition was attributable to an injury arising in the course of the employment. Mayeur v. J. R. Crowe Coal & Min. Co. (1920) 106 Kan. 123, 186 Pac. 1035.

A pin setter employed at a bowling alley was hit on the thigh by a flying pin which broke the thigh bone. He was taken to a hospital, and when discharged the bone was not entirely healed. About seven months later he went to another hospital, where he died in about two weeks. Two physicians testified that they could not say what was the cause of death, and one, who had taken an X-ray of the injured leg, testified that he did not think that death was due to the fracture. The claimant, the mother of the workman, testified that when she saw him at the hospital the day before his death, he had a large cut on his head about 4 inches long; that the nurse told her he fell when he tried to get up during the night. It was held that there was no evidence to warrant a finding that the deceased died as a result of the injury he had sustained to his leg. Perry v. Woodward Bowling Alley (1917) 196 Mich. 742, 163 N. W. 52.

In October a workman sustained a fracture of the skull. After two months' hospital treatment he was discharged. Two days later he was taken with headache and vomiting, and later died. There was testimony that these symptoms might have been caused by pressure on the brain from the fracture, or might have resulted from other causes. No physician expressed an opinion that death resulted from the fracture. It was held that a finding that the death was the result of an accident received in the employment was not sustained by the proof. Reimers v. Proctor Pub. Co. (1914) 85 N. J. L. 441, 89 Atl. 931, 4 N. C. G. A. 733. M. B.

v.

JAMES PANORAS.

(— R. I. —, 116 Atl. 417.)

Principal and agent — liability of agent for trespass.

1. A trespasser cannot relieve himself from liability by showing that a third person directed, ordered, or authorized him to do the illegal act complained of.

Trial — when verdict directed.

2. A verdict should not be directed for defendant if on any reasonable view of the evidence the plaintiff could recover.

[See 26 R. C. L. 1077.]

Evidence — materiality.

3. In an action for conversion of a machine a question is immaterial as to the purpose of putting a store in the name of witness, where it resulted from foreclosure of a mortgage which did not include the machine.

Replevin — by lessor — effect.

4. The bringing of an action of replevin by the lessor of a machine against a third person who has taken possession of it is an election to recover possession discharged from the lease.

Trespass — right of lessor to maintain.

5. The lessor of a machine who has reasserted title to it may maintain trespass de bonis against a third person who wrongfully takes it away.

Appeal — conclusiveness of verdict.

6. A verdict supported by sufficient evidence and approved by the trial judge will not be disturbed on appeal.

[See 2 R. C. L. 193 et seq.; 1 R. C. L. Supp. 433.]

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Providence and Bristol Counties (Sumner, J.) made during the trial of an action brought to recover the value of a pop-corn machine, which resulted in a verdict for plaintiff and the denial of a new trial. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Hugo A. Clason, for defendant:

An action of trespass de bonis asportatis cannot be maintained by an owner of personalty who had neither actual or constructive possession nor right to immediate possession, the personalty not having been destroyed.

Messrs. Cooney & Cooney, for plaintiff:

Defendant cannot relieve himself from liability by showing that a third person directed, ordered, or authorized him to do the illegal act complained of.

Sweeney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trespass de bonis asportatis to recover the value of a pop-corn machine. After the trial in the superior court the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $627.87. The defendant's motion for a new trial was denied, and he has duly prosecuted his exceptions to this court.

It appears from the record that the writ was issued August 14, 1918, and was duly filed in court, with a declaration containing two counts, one alleging trespass de bonis, and the other trover and conversion of a pop-corn machine. The defendant filed a plea of the general issue, and a special plea stating that when he committed the alleged trespass it was by leave and license of the plaintiff first given and granted. The plaintiff filed a replication denying the averments of this special plea.

During the trial of the case and after the defendant had introduced the testimony of one witness, he was given permission by the court to withdraw his special plea of leave and license, against the objection of the plaintiff, and the trial proceeded under the plea of the general issue.

At the close of the testimony the defendant made a motion for the direction of a verdict in his favor on the ground that the plaintiff did not have possession of the machine at the time of the trespass. The court denied this motion, and its denial is the defendant's first exception.

The testimony of the plaintiff tended to prove that he was the owner of the machine, with the right of immediate possession; that he had constructive possession of it while it was in the actual possession of his brother; and that against said brother's protest the defendant took possession of the machine and sent it to Agnes Semonian. The testimony for the defendant tended to prove that the plaintiff had sold the machine to said Agnes Semonian, and that the defendant, while acting as her agent and with the help of the plaintiff's said brother, sent the machine to her. Upon this conflicting evidence it would have been error for the court to have directed a verdict for the defendant, for it is settled that a verdict should not be directed for the defendant if, on any reasonable view of the testimony, the plaintiff can recover (Baynes v. Billings, 30 R. I. 53, 73 Atl. 625; Reddington v. Getchell, 40 R. I. 463, 101 Atl. 123); especially in this case, where the burden of proof was on the defendant to justify the taking (Collier v. Jenks, 19 R. I. 493, 34 Atl. 998; Shibley v. Gendron, 25 R. I. 519, 57 Atl. 304). The defendant's exception to the denial of his motion for the direction of a verdict is overruled.

Another exception claimed by the defendant is to the exclusion of his question, "What was the purpose of putting the store in your name?" asked of his witness Agnes Semonian. It appeared in evidence that the witness was the purchaser of her husband's store at a mortgagee's sale of the same, and that the pop-corn machine was neither mortgaged nor included in the sale. This being so, the question excluded was immaterial and irrelevant, and the exception is not tenable.

The defendant claims two exceptions to that portion of the charge relating to the legal effect of the lease of the machine by the plaintiff to his brother, wherein the trial justice said: "The lessee doesn't come in here and dispute the title; someone else does. And, where there is a taking of this kind, a case could have been brought either by the lessor—that is, by Melkon—or by his brother. Of course, both of them had a property in it. One had a general property, as it is called; one had a special property; and as long as those two don't disagree, it is proper for the lessor to bring this suit for him."

The defendant claims that it was error for the court to charge that the action could have been brought either by the lessor or the lessee. This claim of error is based upon the assumption that the lessee was in possession of the machine under a lease for a definite term when it was taken, August 7, 1917, by the defendant and sent to Agnes Semonian. This assumption is not justified by the evidence, for, although it appeared that the plaintiff had leased the machine to his brother, Baghdasar, February 21, 1917, for a definite term, it also appeared that in the following April the defendant took possession of it when he foreclosed the mortgage which he held upon Baghdasar's store. The lease required the lessee to take good care of the machine and not to underlet it, and gave the lessor the right to take possession of the same for breach of any condition. Soon after the defendant took the machine from the lessee, the plaintiff brought an action of replevin against the defendant to recover possession of it, and April 21, 1917, the defendant signed an affidavit in which he stated that he made no claim to the machine, and that the plaintiff might take judgment for it against him.

The bringing of the action of replevin by the plaintiff was an election on his part to recover possession of the machine discharged from the lease as well as from any claim of the defendant. Baghdasar Semonian never had possession of it as lessee after this time. He appeared as a witness for the plaintiff and made no claim to the machine under the lease. The machine was left in the store of Agnes Semonian from April 27 until the following August, when it was taken therefrom by the defendant soon after he foreclosed his mortgage upon her store. She claimed that during the time the machine was in her store it belonged to her.

The vital question is whether the plaintiff (the former lessor) can maintain the action. As this court is of the opinion that he is entitled to maintain the action, that portion of the charge which was to the effect that the former lessee could also maintain the action was not prejudicial to the defendant, and the defendant's exceptions thereto are overruled.

The defendant claims that he should not be held liable as a trespasser for taking the machine because he acted only as agent for Agnes Semonian. This claim is unavailing, because a trespasser cannot relieve himself from liability by showing that a third person directed, ordered, or authorized him to do the illegal act complained of. Donahue v. Shippee, 15 R. I. 453, 8 Atl. 541; 26 R. C. L. 962.

The defense to this action was that on April 27, 1917, the plaintiff gave Agnes Semonian a bill of sale of the machine. The defendant and two witnesses testified to this effect, and the plaintiff denied that he had sold her the machine. This issue was submitted to the jury, under proper instructions, and their verdict in favor of the plaintiff has been approved by the trial justice.

Replevin—by lessor—effect.

Trespass—right of lessor to maintain.

Principal and agent—liability of agent for trespass.

As there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict, and it does not appear that the trial justice was in error in approving it, under the established rule it will not be disturbed by this court.

All of the defendant's exceptions are overruled, and the case is remitted to the Superior Court, with direction to enter judgment for the plaintiff upon the verdict.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following Per Curiam response was handed down May 26, 1922 (— R. I. —, 117 Atl. 235);

After the opinion of this court was filed April 3, 1922, the defendant, by leave of court, filed a motion for reargument. This motion has been considered and, as it does not contain any matter which was not fully considered and passed upon by the court before delivering its opinion, the motion for reargument is denied and dismissed.

NOTE.

Personal liability of a servant or agent to a third person for injuries caused by the performance or nonperformance of his duties to his employer is the subject of an extended annotation following E. H. EMERY & Co. v. AMERICAN REFRIGERATOR TRANSIT Co. post, 97. Specifically, as to the servant's or agent's liability to a third person for trespass, see subdivision III. b, of that note.

AMERICAN REFRIGERATOR TRANSIT COMPANY, Appt.

CHICAGO, BURLINGTON, & QUINCY RAILROAD COMPANY, Garnishee, Appt.

(— Iowa, —, 184 N. W. 750.)

Principal and agent — liability of agent to third person for misfeasance.

1. A refrigerator company which contracts with a railroad company to supervise the loading of fruit into cars and ice the cars so as to preserve the fruit is liable to the shipper for negligent performance of its undertaking to such an extent that the fruit is injured in transit.

Appeal — interference with verdict — jury question.

2. The supreme court will not interfere with a verdict supported by sufficient evidence upon an issue proper for the jury to determine.

Evidence — transcript of evidence taken at former trial.

3. Evidence taken at a trial of an action against a railroad company and a refrigerator company for injury to a shipment of fruit, which was dismissed without prejudice to the merits as between plaintiff and the refrigerator company, after holding the railroad company not liable, is admissible in a subsequent action against the refrigerator company for the same cause, under a statute providing that any transcript of the official reporter, when material and competent, shall be admissible in evidence at any retrial of the case or proceeding in which the same was taken.

— deposition taken for former trial.

4. A deposition taken for and used at the first trial of a cause may be read in evidence upon a second trial.

[See 8 R. C. L. 1140.]

APPEALS by defendant and garnishee from a judgment of the District Court for Wapello County (Anderson, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages sustained in the shipment of fruit, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Faville, J.:

Action at law to recover damages claimed to have been sustained in the shipment of nineteen carloads of peaches. Judgment was rendered in behalf of the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals. The garnishee also appeals, and the plaintiff files a cross-appeal, conditioned on a reversal on defendant's appeal.

Messrs. Brammer, SeEVERS, & Hurlburt, for appellant Transit Company:

Plaintiff's misfeasance theory is not tenable in the absence of an existing duty to it. This is particularly true in the absence of active negligence or trespass. It does not appear that there was any breach of the duty owing to defendant's principal, the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company.

Faville, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee is a copartnership engaged in conducting a wholesale fruit business in the city of Ottumwa. The appellant is a corporation engaged in owning and operating certain refrigerator cars, which said cars are transported on various lines of railway throughout the country. The Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway Company is a corporation operating a line of railway in the state of Texas and other states.

In the year 1912 the appellee entered into a contract with one Gidcumb, a fruit grower at Chatterton, Texas, to purchase from the said Gidcumb his entire output of peaches. The Gidcumb orchard is situated on the lines of the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway, about a mile from a station known as "Orchard Park." The record discloses that early in June, 1912, the appellee wrote to officers of the appellant regarding the securing of equipment for the transportation of fruit, and received a reply that appellant would furnish the necessary refrigerator equipment for handling the peach shipment, and that orders for cars should be placed by the appellee with the agent of the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway at Chatterton, Texas, and also stating that the cars would be iced at Shreveport and re-iced at Chatterton. The appellee also received a letter from officials of the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway Company, advising appellee that said railway had made arrangements with the appellant to furnish cars for the handling of all fruit and vegetables moving under refrigeration. In pursuance of this arrangement, the appellee ordered cars from the said Railway Company, as required for the shipment of the peaches in question from Chatterton, Texas. Cars were delivered and loaded with peaches and shipped to the appellee. This action was brought against the appellant, charging it with negligence in the manner in which it loaded the peaches in the said refrigerator cars, and also in the failure to properly ice said cars.

The record shows that the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway Company had entered into an agreement with the appellant regarding the furnishing of refrigerator cars by the appellant, and the transportation of the same by the said Railway Company. In said agreement the appellant herein is referred to as the "Refrigerator Company" and the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway Company is referred to as the "Katy Company," and the said parties are so designated throughout this case, and will be so referred to by us. By said agreement, appellant herein agreed to handle the fruit, melon, and vegetable shipments originating on the line of the Katy Company. The agreement provided that the Katy Company should pay to the Refrigerator Company 12½ per cent of the Katy freight revenue, exclusive of switching, bridge tolls, and other terminal charges. The agreement provided that the Refrigerator

Company should furnish to the Katy Company sufficient suitable cars, up to 600 in number, and as many more as it was able to furnish, for transportation of fruit as needed. The contract provided that the Refrigerator Company (appellant) should ice cars containing perishable commodities in shipments originating on the lines of the Katy Company. Also by its terms the Refrigerator Company undertook the responsibility of loading all such cars, and was allowed a supervision charge therefor.

This cause involves a shipment of nineteen cars. The appellee claims that the peaches in said cars were damaged because the appellant, as agent of the said Katy Company under said contract with it, undertook to load, brace, stow, and ice said cars, and did the same in such a careless, negligent, and unskilful manner that a large amount of the peaches was lost and destroyed, and appellee was put to additional expense to care for and market the remainder. The appellee's cause of action was pleaded in six different counts, or on six different "theories." The only one, however, submitted to the jury, was upon the theory of the alleged misfeasance of the appellant as agent of the Katy Company under said contract; the particular misfeasance charged being in regard to the manner of loading and icing the cars in question.

I. It is to be noticed at the outset that appellee's action is not brought against the Railway Company as initial carrier, nor is recovery sought under and by virtue of the so-called "Carmack Amendment," or otherwise as against the shipper. This action is against the Refrigerator Company to recover damages claimed to have been suffered by the appellee because of the negligent and careless manner in which the appellant, Refrigerator Company, performed its work of loading and icing the cars in question under its contract with the carrier, the Katy Company. There is no contention that there was any privity of contract between the appellant and the appellee. The action sounds in tort, if it can be maintained at all.

The question for our determination at this point is whether or not the appellee can maintain an action for damages against the appellant, Refrigerator Company, as the agent of the Railway Company, for its negligence in performing its contract with the latter. It is to be observed that appellant was not a common carrier, under the circumstances disclosed in this case, and is not liable to appellee, if at all, in any such capacity. Ellis v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 237 U. S. 434, 59 L. ed. 1036, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645.

Appellee's contract was with the initial carrier, the Katy Company. The duty of the latter company to appellee was to carry the shipment safely and with due regard to its perishable character. Beard v. Illinois C. R. Co. 79 Iowa, 518, 7 L.R.A. 280, 18 Am. St. Rep. 381, 44 N. W. 800.

Under the contract between the Refrigerator Company (appellant) and the Katy Company, the former became the agent of the latter company, and undertook, as its agent, to perform certain things required of said Railway Company under the contract of shipment between it and appellee.

The contention of the appellant is that the appellee has no cause of action whatever against the appellant, and that the trial court should have directed a verdict in appellant's behalf. If the question were one between the appellee and the Refrigerator Company, growing out of a contract between them, or were one between the Refrigerator Company and the Railway Company whereby the latter was suing for failure to properly perform the contract between them, we would have an entirely different question than the one presented here. Assuming that there was sufficient evidence to carry the case to the jury on the question of the negligent manner in which the cars in question were loaded and iced, the pertinent question still remains: Can the appellee recover from the Refrigerator Company for such negligence?

The question of the liability of an agent to a third person for negligence has been frequently before the courts, and there is much confusion and lack of uniformity in the authorities. Cases have frequently arisen where the duty which the agent owed to the public, rather than to an individual, was involved, and liability determined because of such duty. In a general way it may be said that an agent is liable to third parties for his own tortious acts, the same as any other person. The fact of the agency neither increases nor diminishes such liability. Bannigan v. Woodbury, 158 Mich. 206, 133 Am. St. Rep. 371, 122 N. W. 531; Humphreys Tunnel & Min. Co. v. Frank, 46 Colo. 524, 105 Pac. 1093; Berghoff v. McDonald, 87 Ind. 549; 2 C. J. 824, § 498.

In determining the liability of an agent to third parties for tortious acts directly connected with and growing out of the agency, the courts have recognized a distinction between malfeasance, misfeasance, and nonfeasance, but the line of demarcation has frequently been lost sight of, and reconciliation of the authorities is utterly impossible.

In Bell v. Josselyn, 3 Gray, 309, 63 Am. Dec. 741, the supreme court of Massachusetts says: "Nonfeasance is the omission of an act which a person ought to do; misfeasance is the improper doing of an act which a person might lawfully do; and malfeasance is the doing of an act which a person ought not to do at all."

In Williams v. Dean, 134 Iowa, 216, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 410, 111 N. W. 931, we said: "Nonfeasance is the nonperformance of some act which ought to be performed, and misfeasance is the performance of an act in an improper manner, whereby someone receives an injury."

Applying these definitions to the instant case, we can eliminate at once the question of "malfeasance," for there was here no doing of an act which ought not to have been done at all.

As early as 1701, in Lane v. Cotton, 1 Ld. Raym. 646, 91 Eng. Reprint, 1332, a distinction was recognized between the liability of an agent to third parties for nonfeasance and liability for misfeasance. The distinction was made by Chief Justice Holt in a dissenting opinion in that case, but it has been made the basis of a differentiation which has been preserved with more or less consistency by text-writers and courts since that time. Some of the later cases, however, have apparently eliminated the distinction entirely. The courts, recognizing this distinction, hold as a general rule that the agent is liable to his principal for nonfeasance,—that is, for an entire failure to perform his contract with his principal,—but that for such nonfeasance a third party cannot recover from the agent. This line of authorities also holds that where the agent has undertaken the performance of his contract, and performs the same in a careless and negligent manner, and injury results to a third party, the latter may recover from the agent because of his misfeasance. To state the proposition in another way: The agent is liable to his principal for nonfeasance, and may be liable to third parties for misfeasance. As bearing on these propositions, see Levi L. Brown Paper Co. v. Dean, 123 Mass. 267; Murray v. Usher, 117 N. Y. 542, 23 N. E. 564; Greenberg v. Whitcomb Lumber Co. 90 Wis. 225, 28 L.R.A. 439, 48 Am. St. Rep. 911, 63 N. W. 93; 2 C. J. 824, § 499.

Williams v. Dean, supra, was an action wherein suit was brought against the officers of an agricultural society, charging them with negligence in the erection of a wire screen on the grounds of the society. The plaintiff, a spectator at a ball game, was injured by a ball that was thrown or batted through the screen. In considering the case, the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Deemer, said: "The action sounds in tort, and is manifestly for trespass, or perhaps trespass on the case. Defendants were, of course, agents of the society. They were not the society itself, but were acting purely in a representative character. If liable at all, it is because of what they did. If they were guilty of some misfeasance or trespass, as distinguished from mere nonfeasance, then they were and are liable, and they cannot shield themselves by saying that they were acting as agents for the society. And in this connection it is entirely immaterial whether their acts were ultra vires or within the scope of their authority. No one is permitted to say in an action against him for trespass or for misfeasance that he was acting as an agent in doing the matters complained of, and is therefore not liable. Nor is his liability to be measured by the extent of the authority conferred upon him. On the other hand, no agent is liable to a stranger simply for nonfeasance; that is to say, for failure to do some act which his principal commits to his care. He may be liable for breach of contract to his principal, but not to a stranger for a tort. These views are stated with great force and perspicuity in Murray v. Usher, supra, and Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Robertson, 115 Ky. 858, 74 S. W. 1061. That the same rule applies to officers and directors of corporations, see 3 Thomp. Corp. §§ 4090, 4091, 4096, et seq.; Bruff v. Mali, 36 N. Y. 200, 6 Mor. Min. Rep. 574; Salmon v. Richardson, 30 Conn. 360, 79 Am. Dec. 255. Nonfeasance is the non-performance of some act which ought to be performed, and misfeasance is the performance of an act in an improper manner, whereby someone receives an injury. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Foulks, 191 Ill. 57, 60 N. E. 890. So that, as defendants may only be held liable for misfeasance, and can only be held liable for the negligent performance of some act which they undertook to perform, it must be shown, before they can be held liable, that such ones as are sought to be charged did something in a negligent or improper manner."

In the instant case there is no question of nonfeasance before us, because it is conceded on all hands that appellant undertook the performance of its contract with the Railway Company.

Is Williams v. Dean correct in principle, or should it be overruled? Can appellant be held liable to the appellee for misfeasance in performing its contract with its principal?

In Murray v. Usher, supra, cited by us in Williams v. Dean, it is said: "But the agent or servant is himself liable, as well as the master, where the act producing the injury, although committed in the master's business, is a direct trespass by the servant upon the person or property of another, or where he directs the tortious act. In such cases the fact that he is acting for another does not shield him from responsibility. The distinction is between misfeasance and nonfeasance. For the former the servant is, in general, liable; for the latter, not. The servant, as between himself and his master, is bound to serve him with fidelity and to perform the duties committed to him. An omission to perform them may subject third persons to harm and the master to damages. But the breach of the contract of service is a matter between the master and servant alone, and nonfeasance of the servant, causing injury to third persons, is not, in general, at least, a ground for a civil action against the servant in their favor."

In Baird v. Shipman, 132 Ill. 16, 7 L.R.A. 128, 22 Am. St. Rep. 504, 23 N. E. 384, it is said: "It is not the agent's contract with his principal which exposes him to or protects him from liability to third persons, but his common-law obligation to so use that which he controls as not to injure another. That obligation is neither increased nor diminished by his entrance upon the duties of his agency, nor can its breach be excused by the plea that his principal is chargeable."

In this case the agent of the owner had control and management of the premises, and was held liable for failure to make repairs resulting in injury to the third party.

In Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co. 62 Me. 552, 16 Am. Rep. 503, the plaintiff was a driver of a wagon, and his duties took him to a certain wharf. He stepped into a hole and was injured. The sugar company owned the wharf, and the other defendants were its general agents, and had the management of its business and charge of the wharf. The court said:

"The other defendants, who were the general agents of the corporation, and had the care of this wharf, and who, through their senior partner, had agreed with the lessees to make all needful repairs, are certainly in no better position than their principal.

"It is the actual personal negligence of the agents which constitutes the constructive negligence of the corporation. The corporation acts through and by them, and they act for the corporation, and when their acts or neglects result in injury to third parties they are equally responsible with their principals."

In Horner v. Lawrence, 37 N. J. L. 46, an agent or employee hauling wood for his employer failed to close a certain fence, in consequence of which hogs escaped from a pasture to a railroad and were killed. It was held that the servant was liable to the owner of the hogs. The court said: "It was his own misfeasance, for which, as servant, he cannot, in any respect, claim exemption against the party injured."

In Lottman v. Barnett, 62 Mo. 159, the architect of a building, who superintended its construction, failed to place sufficient girders or columns in the building, and injury resulted to a third person. The court said: "For negligence he is responsible, not merely to his employer, but to persons injured by reason of his acts."

In Bickford v. Richards, 154 Mass. 163, 26 Am. St. Rep. 224, 27 N. E. 1014, the parties negligently injured buildings in removing them, and were held liable, the court saying: "Whether servants or contractors, they were liable for the damage caused to the plaintiff's property by their tortious acts or misfeasance."

In Harriman v. Stowe, 57 Mo. 93, the defendant, as agent for his wife, made a trapdoor on her premises. A third party was injured. The court said: "The present case seems to be one, not of mere nonfeasance or omission, but of strict negligence or wrong."

Lough v. John Davis & Co. 30 Wash. 204, 59 L.R.A. 802, 94 Am. St. Rep. 848, 70 Pac. 491, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 146, was an action against an agent who was authorized to rent and repair a tenement house. The claim was made that the agent permitted the house to become unsafe for want of repairs, which caused the injury complained of. There is a very full discussion and review of the authorities. The court said: "There can be no distinction in principle between the acts of a servant who puts in motion an agency which, in its wrongful operation, injures his neighbor, and the acts of a servant who, when he sees such agency in motion, and when it is his duty to control it, negligently refuses to do his duty, and suffers it to operate to the damage of another. There is certainly no difference in moral responsibility, there should be none in legal responsibility. Of course, if the omission of the act or the nonfeasance does not involve a nonperformance of duty, then the responsibility would not attach. If it does involve a nonperformance of duty to such an extent that the agent is liable to the principal for the damages ensuing from his neglect, there is no hardship in compelling him to respond directly to the injured party. Such practice is less circuitous than that which necessitates first the suing of the master by the party injured, and then a suit by the master against the servant to recoup the damages."

It was held that a cause of action was properly pleaded.

In Ellis v. McNaughton, 76 Mich. 237, 15 Am. St. Rep. 308, 42 N. W. 1113, plaintiff was injured on a defective sidewalk. The question in the case was whether the defendant, as agent of the owner of the premises, could be held liable. The court said: "Irrespective of his relation to his principal, he was bound while doing the work to so use the premises, including this sidewalk, as not to injure others. Misfeasance may involve to some extent the idea of not doing; as where an agent, while engaged in the performance of his undertaking, does not do something which it was his duty to do under the circumstances; as, for instance, when he does not exercise that care which a due regard for the rights of others would require."

In Stiewel v. Borman, 63 Ark. 39, 37 S. W. 406, plaintiff sued for injuries in a coal mine by reason of negligence of an agent in allowing gas to accumulate. It was held that the agent was liable. The court said: "The liability of the agent rests upon his failure to discharge a duty as in misfeasance. Having complete control and management of the business, with the power and authority to do what is reasonably necessary to protect third persons against injuries resulting from omissions or commissions in the conduct of the same, he stands in the relation to others which his principal occupies. He is under obligation to so use that which he controls as not to injure another. For a failure to discharge this duty he is liable in damages to the party injured. This is a reasonable rule."

114 S. W. 754; and Tippecanoe Loan & T. Co. v. Jester, 180 Ind. 357, L.R.A.1915E, 721, 101 N. E. 915.

Some of the cases go farther, and indicate that the agent is liable for nonfeasance as well as misfeasance.

In Ellis v. Southern R. Co. 72 S. C. 465, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 378, 52 S. E. 228, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 541, the court reviewed the authorities somewhat and held: "The true rule deducible from the authorities is that the servant is personally liable to third persons when his wrongful act is the direct and proximate cause of the injury, whether such wrongful act be one of nonfeasance or misfeasance."

There is another line of cases a little nearer to the exact proposition involved in this case, and this is the class of cases where an agent or servant undertakes to perform a particular work for the principal or master, and has full charge and control thereof. These cases hold the agent is liable for an act of negligence in said work resulting in injury to a third person, whether it be an act of omission or commission. In such cases an omission of duty imposed upon him is deemed to be a misfeasance.

In Orcutt v. Century Bldg. Co. 201 Mo. 424, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 929, 99 S. W. 1062, the agent undertook the management of a building for his principal, and entered into the performance of the work. It was held that he was liable for injuries to a third party, caused by his misfeasance.

In Carson v. Quinn, 127 Mo. App. 525, 105 S. W. 1088, an agent who had the exclusive control and supervision of premises used for tenement purposes was held personally liable for injury received by a tenant who fell into a hole in the passageway.

Likewise, in Bannigan v. Woodbury, 158 Mich. 206, 133 Am. St. Rep. 371, 122 N. W. 531, an agent in full charge and control of a building was held liable for injuries caused by the fall of a pane of glass, which was negligently allowed to remain in an unsafe condition.

In Atkins v. Field, 89 Me. 281, 56 Am. St. Rep. 424, 36 Atl. 375, the court said: "If the defendant had not undertaken to rig and set up the derrick, or in so doing had simply executed the will of a lawful superior as to details of mode and material, there might be said to be mere nonfeasance on his part. But he did undertake the work, and practically exercised his own discretion as to mode and material. He was then bound to act carefully in every respect, and his carelessness in any respect was a misfeasance."

A leading case announcing the contrary rule is Delaney v. Rochereau, 34 La. Ann. 1123, 44 Am. Rep. 456. In this action a child was injured by the falling of a gallery of a house. The agents of the owner, who were bound to keep the building in good order, were sued for the injury. The court said:

"Everyone, whether he is principal or agent, is responsible directly to persons injured by his own negligence in fulfilling obligations resting upon him in his individual character, and which the law imposes upon him, independent of contract. No man increases or diminishes his obligations to strangers by becoming an agent. If, in the course of his agency, he comes in contact with the person or property of a stranger, he is liable for any injury he may do to either by his negligence in respect to duties imposed by law upon him in common with all other men.

"An agent is not responsible to third persons for any negligence in the performance of duties devolving upon him purely from his agency, since he cannot, as agent, be subject to any obligations towards third persons other than those of his principal. Those duties are not imposed upon him by law. He has agreed with no one, except his principal, to perform them. In failing to do so he wrongs no one but his principal, who alone can hold him responsible."

an agent was sued for negligence in failing to open a drain, because of which lands adjacent to the plantation of which he had charge were injured. It was held that there was no liability, although it was charged that the act was malicious.

See also Galbraith v. Illinois Steel Co. 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 799, 66 C. C. A. 359, 133 Fed. 485; Dean v. Brock, 11 Ind. App. 507, 38 N. E. 829.

We are confident that the rule announced by us in Williams v. Dean is sustained by the great weight of authority, and is sound in principle. We therefore hold that for misfeasance in the performance of its contract with its principal, which misfeasance caused injury to appellee's property, the latter had a right of action in tort against appellant. Boston Ins. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 118 Iowa. 423, 59 L.R.A. 796, 92 N. W. 88, Dillon v. Iowa C. R. Co. 118 Iowa, 645, 92 N. W. 855, and Cramblitt v. Percival-Porter Co. 176 Iowa, 733, L.R.A.1917C, 77, 158 N. W. 541, cited by appellant, are not inconsistent with this holding.

II. Appellant contends that the rule which exonerates an intermediate servant where an injury has been committed by a subordinate one under circumstances which make the immediate actor and the ultimate principal liable should be applied. See Williams v. Dean, 134 Iowa, 216, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 410, 111 N. W. 931. We fail to see how the rule contended for has any application to the facts of the instant case. Appellant, under its contract, undertook the work of loading and icing the car, and had full control as to how the work should be done.

III. It is contended that the Railway Company accepted the work of loading and icing, and that this absolves the appellant from liability. There is no evidence from which the jury could have found that the Railway Company knowingly accepted and approved the work of the appellant in loading and icing the cars even if the rule contended for should be approved.

IV. It is contended by appellant that the evidence does not disclose that the alleged acts of negligence of appellant caused the damages complained of. It is unnecessary to review the evidence on this question. It was fairly before the jury and properly submitted to it. There was sufficient evidence to go to the jury to support the claim of improper loading and icing, and that the same resulted in damages to appellee. It was essentially a jury question, and, finding sufficient evidence in the record to sustain the verdict, we cannot interfere.

Appeal—interference with verdict—jury question.

V. It is contended the appellee was guilty of contributory negligence, and, for that reason, cannot recover. This was a question for the determination of the jury, and was properly submitted by the court.

VI. Errors are urged in the admission of evidence. The first error urged on this ground that demands our attention is with respect to a transcript of testimony which was admitted under § 245a of the Supplement of 1913. From the record it appears that the appellee herein originally instituted suit in Wapello county against the appellant and the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Company, on February 13, 1914. Said action involved the identical shipment and cars under consideration in this action. The cause was submitted to the district court of Wapello county and tried without the intervention of a jury in October, 1915. Subsequently the court entered a finding that the Railway Company could not be held liable because of failure on the part of the appellee to comply with the requirements of the bill of lading in respect to the giving of notices, but that the Refrigerator Company was liable. Upon the motion of the appellant herein, under § 3502 of the Code, the action was dismissed, the order reciting: "Such dismissal is without prejudice to the merits of the action as between plaintiff and said defendant."

Immediately thereafter the present suit was instituted, embracing the identical matters included in the previous suit. This action was aided by attachment. Upon the trial of this cause, the appellee read in evidence from the transcript of testimony of certain witnesses given upon the former trial before the district court. Was this evidence properly admissible under the provisions of § 245a of the Supplement to the Code of 1913? The section of the statute provides that any transcript of an official court reporter, "when material and competent, shall be admissible in evidence on any retrial of the case or proceeding in which the same were taken."

We do not think that the legislature intended to use the word "case" in the statute in a narrow and strictly legal and technical sense. The evident purpose was to obviate the necessity of producing witnesses who had once been before the court and had testified respecting the matter in controversy between the parties. Under the provisions of the statute itself, if we should now reverse the case and send it back for a new trial, the transcript of the evidence on the last trial, which would include the transcript of the evidence of the first trial, would be admissible. Such an incongruous condition was never contemplated by the legislature. The proper course to pursue would have been to serve notice of intention to use the transcript, or obtain an order of court so to do, or secure a stipulation providing for its use. The situation here presented can and should be easily obviated.

In Re Wiltsey, 135 Iowa, 430, 109 N. W. 776, we held, under a somewhat similar situation, that where no new issues were involved and the evidence taken on the former trial was in respect to the very matters determined in the subsequent trial, the transcript was properly admitted in evidence.

Nothing in Spiers v. Hendershott, 142 Iowa, 446, 120 N. W. 1058, is inconsistent with this holding. In that case it affirmatively appeared that the transcript was offered in a case which was not a retrial of a former case, but that the actions were entirely distinct, and involved two separate and distinct wills, and that the action in which the evidence contained in the transcript was received had gone to final judgment. It is to be observed that the original case herein did not go to final judgment. It was dismissed as to the appellant under the provisions of § 3502 of the Code. The order of court recited: "Such dismissal is without prejudice to the merits of the action as between plaintiff and said defendant. The court finds and adjudges that the failure of plaintiff to prevail herein as against the said defendant is not because of any negligence in its prosecution."

Under the record, we think this transcript was admissible under this section of the statute. The parties were the same; the issues were the same; it was, to all intents and purposes, a retrial of the identical "case" in which the evidence in the transcript had been taken.

Evidence—transcript of evidence taken

In this connection, error is also predicated upon the action of the lower court in permitting the appellee to offer in evidence the deposition of a witness which was taken at the former trial above referred to. No question is raised that the deposition was not properly taken and filed upon the previous trial. It also appears that the deposition was taken upon notice, and that the appellant herein appeared and cross-examined the witness. It is urged, however, that the deposition was not duly filed in the instant case, nor was leave obtained to use it before the trial was begun. We are cited to Searle v. Richardson, 67 Iowa, 170, 25 N. W. 113. Therein we said: "But we are very clear that, under our practice, a party should not be permitted to use depositions on the trial of one cause which have been taken in another, without having filed them in the cause in which he proposes to use them, or obtaining leave before the commencement of the trial to so use them."

The rule so declared is undoubtedly correct, and a party should not be allowed to transport depositions from one cause to another without duly filing the same in the cause in which he proposes to use them, or obtaining leave of court to so use them, before the commencement of the trial. The reason for this rule is obvious. The evidence of a witness, taken in one cause, may be in a large measure material in some other cause between the same parties, but a portion of the evidence may be material in one case and wholly inadmissible in the other. But the rule can have no application where the deposition is used in a retrial of the same identical case, with the same parties and the same issues. Furthermore, it appears that the deposition now in question was offered in evidence in the former trial of the case, and the shorthand notes of the official court reporter so show. Certainly no prejudice could result to the appellant by the reading of the original deposition, rather than ^{—deposition taken for former trial.} by having the shorthand reporter read the same from his shorthand notes to the jury. We think the court did not err upon this record in admitting the deposition in evidence.

VII. Error is predicated upon the giving of certain instructions to the jury and the refusal to give instructions that were requested. The matters complained of largely include the same subject-matter heretofore discussed in this opinion, and it is unnecessary to discuss the matter further. We find no error in the instructions that were given or in the refusal to give the instructions that were requested by the appellant. The case seems to have been fairly submitted to the jury, and the judgment appealed from must be affirmed.

In view of this conclusion, no further consideration need be given to the appellee's cross appeal.

I. Scope.

This annotation will be confined strictly to the question of liability of the agent or servant of an individual or private corporation for injuries which occur to a third person through the performance or nonperformance of duties which he owes to his principal. There are several classes of cases which may, on their face, seem analogous to this question, and which, to some extent, may rest upon the general rules which govern the cases included in this note, but in which in fact other elements enter, and which are therefore excluded from consideration here. There are many cases in which the question has been whether or not the master and servant could be sued jointly for an injury caused by the act of the agent. If the joint liability is upheld, of course the court must assume that the servant is liable; but unless there is some discussion of the question of his liability, cases of that kind are not included.

So, cases are omitted which involve the question of the liability of an attorney at law for injuries to third persons. While such persons are, in a sense, agents, they are also officers of the court, and there may be considerations of public policy which would make a different rule applicable to them from that applicable to ordinary servants and agents. So, the general question of the liability of public officers will be omitted. Their liability depends so much upon the question of public policy that any ruling with regard to them might throw little or no light on the general question of liability of private servants or agents.

ity of private servants or agents. This will apply also to soldiers, although it may be suggested that a distinction has been made between officers and private soldiers, there being no liability on the latter for obeying orders, while there may be on the part of the former. Thus it has been held that a common soldier is not personally liable for committing a trespass under command of his officer. Trammell v. Bassett (1866) 24 Ark. 499.

But where an Army officer issued an order for seizure of property which was beyond his authority, the officer executing the order, by reason of which the property was lost to the owner, was held liable for the value thereof. The order given was an order to do an illegal act,—to commit a trespass upon the property of another,—and could afford no justification to the person by whom it was executed. "It can never be maintained that a military officer can justify himself for doing an unlawful act by producing an order of his superior." Mitchell v. Harmony (1851) 13 How. (U. S.) 115, 14 L. ed. 75.

Cases involving liability of the officers of corporations will also be omitted. Such officers representing, as they do, the corporation, and the corporation acting through them, a distinct ground of liability on their part may be found to exist which might not be the case with the mere agents and servants of such corporations or of individuals.

Cases involving the liability of contractors who have finished their contracts and turned the jobs over to the owners, who have accepted them, are omitted. These cases include servants who are employed upon work which afterwards causes injury, of which the following is an illustration:

"A contractor or hired man employed by and acting under direction of another person in digging a tunnel through an embankment, with which he has nothing further to do, is not liable for mere consequential injuries to third persons, as to whom he committed no direct trespass, where the injury results more than a year afterwards from water flowing through such tunnel, because it was the maintenance, and not the digging, of the tunnel, that caused the injury." Chapel v. Smith (1890) 80 Mich. 100, 45 N. W. 69.

So, also, are omitted cases involving the question of liability of subcontractors to the property owner. The question of liability of servants and agents for contempt of court in disobeying orders addressed to their employers is not considered.

The liability of agencies for collecting negotiable paper depending in part on the law merchant, and in part on general custom, are omitted. Moreover, there is a very numerous class of cases in which the courts have, on the facts, held the servant or agent not liable because no trespass, assault, conversion, or other wrong which was the basis of the action was established. The mere fact that no wrong was found to exist throws little light on the further question whether or not there would be a liability in case it did exist. Of this class reference is made to Crandall v. Loomis (1884) 56 Vt. 664.

The cases to be included are those for which the master is answerable because the act done was within the terms of his contract with the servant; and therefore, cases which have held the servant liable because he was acting outside the scope of his employment are not included.

As illustrative of this class, attention may be called to Wright v. Intermountain Motor Car Co. (1918) 53 Utah, 176, 177 Pac. 237, where it was held that one employed to demonstrate automobiles may be held personally liable if he takes a car after business hours, to accommodate a customer, and permits the customer to drive it, which results in the injury of a person on the highway.

So, a servant acts outside the scope of his employment where he takes his master's horse for his own purpose, and so insufficiently fastens it when leaving it that it breaks away, and causes the injury for which the suit is brought. Way v. Powers (1884) 57 Vt. 135.

The excessive or ultra vires acts of the agent for which he, and not the master, is liable, are discussed by Brown and Comstock, J.J., in Hibbard v. New York & E. R. Co. (1857) 15 N. Y. 455.

II. Introductory.

a. General rule.

An agent who violates a duty which he owes to a third person is answerable to such person for the consequences, whether it be an act of malfeasance, misfeasance, or nonfeasance. Stated in this form there is probably no case to be found to the contrary. But the doctrine laid down by some text-writers, founded on Lord Holt's dictum in Lane v. Cotton (1701) 12 Mod. 488, 88 Eng. Reprint, 1466, has caused much confusion in the decisions over a fictitious distinction between acts of malfeasance and misfeasance and those of nonfeasance. As shown by Labatt on Master & Servant, page 7973, this error and the absence of any valid distinction in the classes of negligence were distinctly pointed out more than twenty-five years ago; but there are courts which still solemnly discuss the distinction every time a case involving the question comes before them, and settle the rights of the parties according as they think the case comes within or falls without the distinction. Many of the later cases have, however, abandoned it, as have also most of the recent text-writers.

If a servant owes a duty to a third person because of a contract with his master, there is no reason why he should not be liable for injury caused by its nonperformance. Of course, the circumstances in which the failure of the servant to perform a duty owing to his master will raise a liability in favor of a stranger must, of necessity, be few; but when they exist, the rule of liability should be applied the same as though it was an act of malfeasance or misfeasance. The error that such liability does not exist not only arose from a misreading of the case of Lane v. Cotton, but also is an example of disconnected reasoning of which Judge Story, with whom the error seems to have originated, would hardly be imagined to be guilty. As will be seen in subdivision II. c, he laid down the formula that the servant or agent is liable to the third person for his mal- or mis-feasance, but not for his non-feasance. A moment's consideration demonstrates that there are many mal- and mis-feasances of the servant towards his principal which give no right of action to third persons any more than do acts of nonfeasance. Thus, the servant may be guilty of malfeasance toward his principal by embezzling money intrusted to his care. He may be guilty of misfeasance by negligently wrecking an automobile which he is employed to operate. Neither of these will give a third person a right of action. Therefore, to give a third person a right of action the act must not be a malfeasance or misfeasance toward the master, but must, because of the act which he does, or attempts to do, be a malfeasance or misfeasance toward a stranger. The same rule applies with respect to nonfeasance. The servant's mere omission of duty towards his master will not give the person a right of action, but omitting to perform a duty which he and his master owe to a third person may give a right of action. When, therefore, the formula is read as stated by Judge Story, the delicts comprising mal- and mis-feasance are, of necessity, toward third persons, while those comprising nonfeasance are solely towards the master and the persons toward whom the duty is owing, and the liabilities said to exist or not to exist are not the same.

formula becomes meaningless as an aid to the decision of concrete cases. It has been suggested that the only value which the formula has is to indicate that a liability to a third person cannot be predicated upon mere omission of duty owing to the master; but since the same is true with respect to mal- or mis-performance of duty owing the master, it would seem that the sooner the formula passes into oblivion, and the cases are judged solely upon the consideration whether or not the servant has breached any duty which he owed the complaining party, the better. Of course, in case of malfeasance or misfeasance, the relationship to the master may be entirely immaterial, because the liability may be predicated on the positive wrong done, while in case of nonfeasance, the duty to the complaining party must be worked out, if at all, through the duty which the servant had undertaken to perform for the master.

In volume 1, pp. 288, 289, of Jagard on Torts, it is said: "The thinness and uncertainty of the distinction between the misfeasance, malfeasance, and nonfeasance leaves an exceedingly unstable basis on which to rest an important principle of liability. It would, indeed, seem to be a fair criticism on the subsequent reasoning that the courts have, in applying the distinction, engaged in a solemn game of logomachy. Thus, in Bell v. Josselyn (1855) 3 Gray (Mass.) 309, 63 Am. Dec. 741, it was said that failure of defendant to examine the state of the pipes in a house before causing the water to be let on, would be a nonfeasance, but, if he had not caused water to be let on, that nonfeasance would not have injured the plaintiff. If he had examined the pipes, and left them in a proper condition, and then caused the letting on of the water, there would have been neither nonfeasance nor misfeasance. As the facts were, the nonfeasance caused the act done to be a misfeasance. The plaintiff suffered from the act done, which was no less a misfeasance by the reason of its being preceded by a nonfeasance. . . . "The futility of such reasoning on the word "nonfeasance" appears fully from the lack of definitiveness of the meaning to be given the term. This solemn legal jugglery with words will probably disappear "if the nature of the duty incumbent upon the servant be considered." If the servant owe a duty to third persons, derived from an instrumentality likely to do harm or otherwise, and he violates that duty, he is responsible. His responsibility rests on his wrongdoing, not on the positive or negative character of his conduct. A wrongful omission is as actionable as a wrongful commission."

b. Lane v. Cotton.

The celebrated case of Lane v. Cotton (1701) 11 Mod. 17, 12 Mod. 472, 88 Eng. Reprint, 855, 1458, Comyns, 107, 92 Eng. Reprint, 984, Holt, 583, 90 Eng. Reprint, 1222, 1 Salk. 17, 1 Ld. Raym. 655, 91 Eng. Reprint, 17, 1337, which seems to have been the cause of the misunderstanding upon this subject, was one to hold the Postmaster General liable for loss of exchequer bills from a letter after it had been deposited in the receiving office. It was held that he was not liable, but Chief Justice Holt, dissenting, argued in a long opinion that he should be held liable, and one branch of the argument was as follows: "It was objected at the bar, that they have this remedy against Breese (who was apparently the clerk from whose possession the loss occurred). I agree, if they could prove that he took out the bills, they might sue him for it; so they might anybody else on whom they could fix that fact; but for a neglect in him they can have no remedy against him; for they must consider him only as a servant; and then his neglect is only chargeable on his master, or principal; for a servant or deputy, quatenus such, cannot be charged for neglect, but the principal only shall be charged for it; but for a misfeasance an action will lie against a servant or deputy, but not quatenus a deputy or servant, but as a wrongdoer. As if a bailiff, who has a warrant from the sheriff to execute a writ, suffer his prisoner by neglect to escape, the sheriff shall be charged for it, and not the bailiff; but if the bailiff turn the prisoner loose, the action may be brought against the bailiff himself, for then he is a kind of wrongdoer, or rescuer." It will be noticed that the question of the liability of the clerk was not involved, and the only ground upon which it becomes material at all is that it was suggested by the prevailing judges as one reason for the non-liability of the Postmaster General, that the receiving clerk was personally liable.

There are several reports of the case of Lane v. Cotton, and they do not strictly agree as to what the majority judges hold, or as to what Lord Holt himself held. All of the reports give more prominence to Holt's dissenting opinion than they do to the prevailing opinions. The question before the court being the liability of the Postmaster General, the question of the liability of the clerk through whose negligence the letter was lost was in no way before the court. It was admitted in the case that he was not a party to the taking of the letter, but was simply negligent in caring for it, so that he was liable merely for nonfeasance, unless that term is limited to the sense in which it has been used by some of the later text-writers. See II. d.

Farresley's report, which goes under the name of Holt (Holt, 583, 90 Eng. Reprint, 1222), makes the other three judges hold the Postmaster General not liable because Breese was necessarily liable himself. And Salkeld's report makes all three judges agree that he is liable (1 Salk. 17, 91 Eng. Reprint, 17).

In the report in 1 Ld. Raym. 646, 91 Eng. Reprint, 1332, Powys, J., is made to say that an action would lie against Breese, and therefore plaintiff is not without remedy, and in this, Gould, J., seems to have concurred.

In the report in 11 Mod. 12, 88 Eng. Reprint, 853, however, Powys, J., is made to say in response to the objection that if the action does not lie against the Postmaster General there may be a wrong without any remedy, —that it is often so when no person can be found against whom to have a remedy. And the same response appears in the report of Comyns, 103, 92 Eng. Reprint, 982.

Not only were the arguments of the prevailing judges thus inadequately reported by the various reporters, but there is not an agreement among them as to Lord Holt's position in the matter.

In the report in 1 Ld. Raym. 655, 91 Eng. Reprint, 1337, Holt is made to say that Breese cannot be charged as an officer for negligence. For misfeasance of a deputy an action will lie against him, but that is not qua officer, but qua tort-feasor.

In 11 Mod. 17, 88 Eng. Reprint, 855, the statement is, if the deputy be guilty of misfeasance an action will lie against him; but for the nonfeasance or negligence of a deputy, the superior is punishable; and if, in this case, any misfeasance could be proved upon any particular deputy, as the taking out of the bills by him, he would be punishable.

In Comyns, 107, 92 Eng. Reprint, 984, Holt's statement is reduced to the following: "Another objection is that an action may be brought against the subagent, but for negligence the principal must answer for his inferior officer."

In Salkeld's Report (1 Salk. 17, 91 Eng. Reprint, 17), Holt is made to say that though the master be liable, yet Breese is chargeable also, but he is not chargeable as an officer, but as a wrongdoer.

And in the report of the case by Thomas Farresley, which goes under the name of Holt (Holt, 583, 90 Eng. Reprint, 1222), Holt is made to say: "I am of opinion though the Postmaster General be liable, that Breese is chargeable also, not as an officer, but as a wrongdoer, for 'tis upon this reason that action of the case lies against the gaoler as well as against the sheriff upon a voluntary escape."

It will be noticed that the court was dealing with the question of the liability of a public official, and there has always been a distinction between the liability of their deputies and that of servants or private individuals. In the excerpt quoted above from 12 Mod., Holt's illustration is of a sheriff and his bailiff.

In Cameron v. Reynolds (1776) 1 Cowp. 406, 98 Eng. Reprint, 1155, Lord Mansfield said that the judges were all of opinion that an action for breach of duty in the office of sheriff must be brought against the sheriff himself, as for an act done by him, although it was in fact done by the undersheriff.

For authority for the statement set out above, from 12 Mod., Lord Holt cites 1 Leon. 146; 3 Cro. 175, 143; 41 Edw. III. 12; 1 Rolle, 78; and Salkeld adds Noy, 90.

The case in (1589) 1 Leon. 146, 74 Eng. Reprint, 135, is Marsh & Astrey's Case, in which Marsh brought action against Astrey, an undersheriff, for failure to return a summons for lands. It was argued on one side that the action should have been against the sheriff, but Snag, contra, said if the return be insufficient, the sheriff shall be amerced, but in the case of failure to return it is clear that the action lieth against the undersheriff if the person will, and such was the opinion of the judges. And judgment was given for the plaintiff. The case in 3 Cro. (Cro. Eliz.) 175, 78 Eng. Reprint, 432, seems to be the same case as that in Leonard, although it is attributed to a different year and term; but it is expressly stated that Coke moved in arrest of judgment that, the action being for nonfeasance, that is, for not returning the writ, the action lieth not against the undersheriff, but ought to be brought against the sheriff himself. But the argument did not prevail. There is no case in point on page 143, and so it must be an error in citation, but Salkeld locates the reference at page 743 (1599) 78 Eng. Reprint, 976. That was the case of Baldry v. Johnson, an action against the jailer of a prison for that the bailiffs of a vill had directed a warrant to the undersheriff to take a person in such manner that they have his body at the next court. The undersheriff made the arrest, and committed the prisoner to the custody of the jailer. After verdict for plaintiff, it was moved in arrest of judgment that the jailer was not liable because the undersheriffs had no authority to commit the prisoner to his custody, and that they alone were liable for the escape. And the conclusion seems to be that the judgment was arrested because the undersheriffs alone were liable.

The case of Laycock v. Undersheriff, Noy, 90, 74 Eng. Reprint, 1057, was an action against an undersheriff because of a false return non est inventus on a latitat. It was argued that for a falsity the action will lie against an undersheriff, but the report states that the court seemed to the contrary. For the undersheriff is not an officer to the court, but the sheriff himself shall be amerced for all defaults, negligence, and falsities of the undersheriff.

The case in (1614) 1 Rolle Rep. 78, 81 Eng. Reprint, 341, is Bell v. Catesby, in which Bell brought an action against Catesby, an undersheriff, for suppressing a warrant which had been put into his hands for service, the allegation being that he levied on the goods and afterwards concealed the writ and made no certificate of it. Exception was taken, after verdict, that the action will not lie against the undersheriff, but the judgment was given by the court for the plaintiff.

There is no case on page 12 of 41 Edw. III. having any bearing on the question under discussion. The case carried on to that page from the previous one was a writ of formedon to establish a remainder, and the case beginning on that page involved the right of infants against whom a right to real estate was sought to be established, to have the writ abated. It has been suggested that the reference was to pl. 12 of the Book of Assize of 41 Edw. III. But that was a prosecution for mayhem which involved a question of jurisdiction over persons not served. So that the citation seems to throw no light upon Lord Holt's meaning. Of the cases cited by Lord Holt, therefore, four seem to have

But Lord Holt seems to have acted upon the opinion contended for by him in the next case which came before him.

In Savage v. Walthew (1708) 11 Mod. 135, 88 Eng. Reprint, 947, a carrier brought an action against his servant for loss of goods delivered to him for carriage, and it was objected that if the action lies, defendant will be twice charged by the master and by the owner. Holt, Ch. J., said it is not so unless there is an actual conversion, for the owner of the goods has an action against the servant only in case of a conversion.

A singular fact is that in at least two subsequent English cases, Lord Holt's opinion is referred to as the rule of the case. Jones v. Hart (1698) 2 Salk. 441, 91 Eng. Reprint, 382; Bennett v. Bayes (1860) 5 Hurlst. & N. 391, 157 Eng. Reprint, 1233, 29 L. J. Exch. N. S. 224, 8 Week. Rep. 320, 2 L. T. N. S. 156.

c. Judge Story's rule.

Judge Story, in his work on the Law of Agency, published in 1839, founded the following statement on what he terms Lord Holt's celebrated judgment in Lane v. Cotton: "The agent is also personally liable to third persons for his own misfeasances and positive wrongs. But he is not, in general (for there are exceptions), liable to third persons for his own nonfeasances or omissions of duty, in the course of his employment. His liability, in these latter cases, is solely to his principal, there being no privity between him and such third persons, but the privity exists only between him and his principal. And hence the general maxim as to all such negligences and omissions of duty is, in cases of private agency, 'respondeat superior.'" § 308.

"The distinction, thus propounded, between misfeasance and nonfeasance, between acts of direct, positive wrong, and mere neglects by agents, as to their personal liability therefor, may seem nice and artificial, and partakes, perhaps, not a little of the subtlety and overrefinement of the old doctrines of the common law. It seems, however, to be founded upon this ground: that no authority whatsoever from a superior can furnish to any party a just defense for his own positive torts or trespasses, for no man can authorize another to do a positive wrong. But in respect to nonfeasances or mere neglects in the performance of duty, the responsibility therefor must arise from some express or implied obligation between particular parties standing in privity of law or contract with each other, and no man is bound to answer for any such violations of duty or obligation, except those to whom he has become directly bound or amenable for his conduct." Story, Agency, 9th ed. § 309.

In making this statement, Judge Story seems to have overlooked the obligations which are imposed upon all living in a civilized community, in favor of their neighbors. Because of this obligation the law and public policy impose certain duties upon persons who have contracted with a master to do a certain thing which makes them liable to third persons for its nonperformance. Most acts of negligence are, in final analysis, acts of nonfeasance, but the books are full of cases in which servants and agents have been held liable for negligence. While, therefore, many cases have attempted to maintain the formula laid down by Judge Story, they have, in practice, either distinguished it so that little is left of it, or departed from it altogether. As will appear in the next succeeding section, certain text-writers have attempted to preserve the formula by giving it an interpretation so narrow that there is really little left of it.

d. Attempted explanation of rule.

Clark & Skyles, in their work on the Law of Agency, make the following statement: "There is a distinction between nonfeasance and misfeasance or malfeasance; and this distinction is often of great importance in determining an agent's liability to third persons. By reason of some of the cases failing to clearly notice this distinction there has been some confusion in the decisions on this point. In this connection, nonfeasance means the total omission or failure of an agent to enter upon the performance of some distinct duty or undertaking which he has agreed with his principal to do; misfeasance means the improper doing of an act which the agent might lawfully do; or, in other words, it is the performing of his duty to his principal in such a manner as to infringe upon the rights and privileges of third persons; and malfeasance is a doing of an act which he ought not to do at all. . . . From these meanings, it will be seen that it is not every omission or failure to perform a duty that will constitute a nonfeasance, but only an omission to perform such distinct duties as he owes to his principal, as distinguished from those which he owes to third persons or to the public in general, as a member of society. Nonfeasance does not extend to the omission or failure to do some act whereby a third person is injured, after he has once entered upon the performance of his contractual obligations. For example, if an agent undertakes to perform certain acts for another, and he refuses or fails to enter upon such performance, it is a nonfeasance; but if he once begins the performance of such acts, and in doing so fails or omits to do certain acts which he should have done, whereby a third person is injured, it is not a nonfeasance, but a misfeasance." Clark & S. Agency, p. 1299.

Mr. Mechem (Agency, § 572) also states that "some confusion has crept into certain cases from a failure to observe clearly the distinction between nonfeasance and misfeasance. As has been seen, the agent is not liable to strangers for injuries sustained by them because he did not undertake the performance of some duty which he owed to his principal, and imposed upon him by his relation, which is nonfeasance. Misfeasance may involve, also, to some extent, the idea of not doing; as where the agent, while engaged in the performance of his undertaking, does not do something which it was his duty to do, under the circumstances,—does not take that precaution, does not exercise that care, which a due regard for the rights of others requires. All this is not doing; but it is not the not doing of that which is imposed . . . upon him by law as a responsible individual in common with all other members of society. It is the same not doing which constitutes actionable negligence in any relation."

It will thus be seen that these authors narrow the meaning of nonfeasance down to a mere failure to enter upon the performance of a duty which the contract imposes upon the servant. This meaning of the term is much narrower than that which was in the mind of Lord Holt or Judge Story, or than that which has been in the minds of many of the judges who have attempted to apply the formula in deciding cases. It may be seriously questioned whether, even in this narrow form, the formula is accurate. Is it entirely safe to say that when the question is determined solely by the duty of the servant to the person injured, the courts will not say that, in case an agreement is made with a protective agency for a watchman on a particular occasion, and the servant employed by the agency, without notice of the fact that he did not intend to meet his engagement, leaves the property unguarded when the owner is relying on him for protection, so that no other is provided, and the property is burglarized or destroyed, the servant will not be liable? Or, in case an agreement is made with a nurses' association for a nurse for a critical occasion, and she does not undertake the job, so that, because of inability to procure other assistance on account of want of timely notice of the nurse's default, the patient dies, the nurse will not be liable? Other cases of similar import readily come to mind and one cannot dogmatize upon them before the questions have been considered by the courts in their true light. This does not in any way interfere with the rule that a third person cannot maintain an action on a contract made for his benefit, because the contract between master and servant is not necessarily made for his benefit. It would not, however, be extending the doctrine that one having entered upon the performance of his duties who omits, to the injury of a third person, to perform some act which is part of his duties, is liable for the injury thereby caused to the third person, on the ground that it is misfeasance, to hold that it is also misfeasance to breach his agreement to perform an act, failure to perform which will injure a third person, after he has undertaken to do so, without giving any notice of his intended omission, on the ground that he will be deemed to have entered upon the performance of his agreement.

This narrowing of the definition of nonfeasance has, in some degree, presented a way out of the dilemma in which the old formula placed the courts, and some of the courts have followed it. Thus, in Atkins v. Field (1896) 89 Me. 281, 56 Am. St. Rep. 424, 36 Atl. 375, the court said: "If the defendant had not undertaken to rig and set up the derrick, or in so doing had simply executed the will of a lawful superior as to details of mode and material, there might be said to be mere nonfeasance on his part. But he did undertake the work, and practically exercised his own discretion as to mode and material. He was then bound to act carefully in every respect, and his carelessness in any respect was a misfeasance."

So, in Hagerty v. Montana Ore Purchasing Co. (Hagerty v. Wilson) 38 Mont. 69, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 356, 98 Pac. 643, the court said: "The courts and text-writers have not always been accurate in defining the terms 'nonfeasance' and 'misfeasance,' or in discriminating between them. As applied in cases of this character, we think the term 'nonfeasance' refers to the omission on the part of the agent to perform a duty which he owes to his principal by virtue of the relationship existing between them; but, whenever the omission on the part of the agent consists of his failure to perform a duty which he owes to third persons, then, as to such third persons, his omission amounts to 'misfeasance,' for which he is responsible. We think this conclusion is based upon reason and authority."

In Orcutt v. Century Bldg. Co. (1907) 201 Mo. 424, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 929, 99 S. W. 1062, the court said: "When it [the defendant] undertook the management of this building from its principal, it undertook to do for the principal a particular work; and after it entered upon the performance of that work, any act which it did, whether by omission or commission, was misfeasance. After making this contract, had it stood aloof and refused to take the management of the building, and, in so doing, thereby failed to do something, which resulted in injury to a third person, it would not have been liable, because we would thus have mere nonfeasance. But, after it assumed its management, and thereby commenced to do the thing it contracted and agreed to do, then, as said before, acts of omission or commission constitute misfeasance, or a failure to properly do the things which it had, in the line of its duty, commenced to do."

In Brower v. Northern P. R. Co. (1910) 109 Minn. 385, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 354, 124 N. W. 10, where an engineer, in repairing a water gauge, failed to replace the guard, the court said: "From the facts stated in the complaint it satisfactorily appears that appellant undertook the execution of the duty of replacing the gauge, and that he performed it negligently; hence his act was one of misfeasance, and not one of nonfeasance. . . . Strictly speaking, the act of the engineer in failing to put on the guard was nonfeasance,—that is, in not doing an act which he was required to perform; but the distinction between misfeasance and nonfeasance is sometimes fanciful."

So, in Southern R. Co. v. Grizzle (1906) 124 Ga. 735, 110 Am. St. Rep. 191, 53 S. E. 244, where it was held that the negligence of a railroad engineer in failing to blow his whistle where he was required by law to do so was a misfeasance, rendering him liable for injuries resulting therefrom, the court said: "Misfeasance may involve also, to some extent, the idea of not doing; as where an agent engaged in the performance of his undertaking does not do something which it is his duty to do under the circumstances, or does not take that precaution, or does not exercise that care, which a due regard to the rights of others requires. All this is not doing; but it is not the not doing of that which is imposed upon the agent merely by virtue of his relation, but of that which is imposed upon him by law as a responsible individual in common with all other members of society. It is the same not doing which constitutes actionable negligence in any relation. . . . The engineer having once undertaken, in behalf of the principal, to run the train, it was incumbent upon him to run it in the manner prescribed by law; and a failure to comply with the law, although it involved an act of omission, was not an act of mere nonfeasance, but was an act of misfeasance."

In Williams v. Dean (1907) 134 Iowa, 216, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 410, 111 N. W. 931, it is said, nonfeasance is nonperformance of some act which ought to be performed, and also is the performance of an act in an improper manner, whereby someone receives injury.

"Nonfeasance is the failure to do that which one, by reason of his undertaking, and not because imposed upon him as a legal duty, agrees to do for another; that which is imposed upon him merely by virtue of his relation to his principal. Misfeasance, on the contrary, may consist in failing to do that which is imposed as a duty, or in doing for another, in an improper manner, that which the principal ought to have done. As of the latter class would be where an agent actually undertakes and enters upon the performance of a certain work for the principal, in the execution of which it is his duty to use reasonable care in the manner of executing it, so as not to cause injury to others, and he cannot, by failing to exercise such care, either while performing the work or by abandoning it in an uncompleted condition and leaving it unguarded or unsafe, exempt himself from liability to those who may suffer injury by reason of such negligence." Dean v. Brock (1894) 11 Ind. App. 507, 38 N. E. 829.

It will be noticed that one of the reasons given by Judge Story (supra, II. c) for holding the servant not liable is the maxim "respondeat superior;" and that has also been suggested as a reason in some of the cases. But the mere fact that the master is required to respond for the consequences of acts done on his behalf does not mean that there shall be no remedy against the one primarily liable for the injury, if he is a responsible person. The maxim "respondeat superior" was adopted to prevent a responsible principal from avoiding liability for injuries caused by the transaction of his business by employing impecunious servants, and there seems to be no reason why it should operate to relieve the negligent servant from personal responsibility.

c. Breach of servant's duty to person injured.

The only rule which can be sustained on principle is that the servant or agent is liable for injury to third persons when, and only when, he breaches some duty which he owes to such third person. The cases are increasingly recognizing this test.

In Morey v. Shenango Furnace Co. (1910) 112 Minn. 528, 127 N. W. 1134, it is said that if a servant owes a duty to a third person, and violates that duty, he is responsible because of his wrongdoing, and not because of the positive or negative character of his conduct.

In an action to hold one employed to operate a ferry for a county, liable for loss of property off the boat, the court said: "A servant or agent may be personally liable for the damnifying consequences of a tort committed by him in the master's service, and so whether the servant's or agent's dereliction, proximately causing the damage, is assignable to the categories of nonfeasance or of misfeasance. . . . Personal liability attaches to the servant or agent when the servant or agent would be liable if there had been no relation of master and servant or principal and agent. Such liability is therefore dependent upon an act or omission, misfeasance, or nonfeasance, on the part of the servant or agent himself; and any dereliction of the master or principal, not effectively participated in by the servant or agent, will not, of course, afford the basis for the personal culpability of the servant or agent." Hilburn v. McKinney (1920) 204 Ala. 158, 85 So. 496.

An agent of a corporation is not to be held personally liable merely because he is such agent, but he must be so connected with the tortious act that he would be personally liable for his wilful act or negligent conduct without regard to the liability of the corporation. Frorer v. Baker (1907) 137 Ill. App. 588.

Where a certificate of title, prepared by an attorney for a property owner, was acted upon by a bank in lending money to the property owner, the court, without direct discussion of the question of liability of an agent for injury to third persons, in deciding against the liability, makes some observations which have a very material bearing upon the question. It says, the person occasioning the loss must owe a duty arising from contract or otherwise, to the person sustaining the loss. Also that building contractors are not liable to third persons for accidents or injuries which may happen to them from imperfections of the structure after the same is completed and has been accepted by the employer. Where there is no fraud or collusion or privity of contract, the agent will not be held liable to a stranger unless the act is one immediately dangerous to the lives of others, or is an act performed in pursuance of some legal duty. National Sav. Bank v. Ward (1880) 100 U. S. 195, 25 L. ed. 621.

One employed in a mill may be liable to a coemployee for negligence in directing the removal of a structure which had operated as a stop for a traveling crane, so that the pulley runs off the end of the rail, to the injury of the employee. The court says, a servant in charge of his master's property is liable to strangers in the management of it, not because he owes a duty in respect of it to the master, but because the possession and charge of property put him under an obligation of care in the use and management of it. The negligence must be negligence to strangers, and not to the master only. The violation of the master's orders, or the neglect or improper use of his property, not violating the duty which the servant owes to strangers, would not make him liable to them. Osborne v. Morgan (1884) 137 Mass. 1.

In Haynes v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. (1911) 145 Ky. 209, 140 S. W. 176, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 719, the court said: "There is no reason for making a distinction between acts of commission and omission when each involves a breach of duty. The servant is not personally liable in either case because the breach of duty was committed by him while acting in the capacity of servant, but responsibility attaches to him as an individual wrongdoer without respect to the position in which he acts or the relation he bears to some other person. It is the fact that the servant is guilty of a wrongful or negligent act amounting to a breach of duty that he owes to the injured person that makes him liable. It is not at all material whether his wrongful or negligent act is committed in an affirmative or wilful manner, or results from mere nonattention to a duty that he owes to third persons, and that it is entirely within his power to perform or omit to perform."

III. Malfesance.

a. In general.

The term "malfesance" is employed to indicate acts which are forbidden or illegal, so that they are not justified under any circumstances.

In Travis v. Claiborne (1817) 5 Munf. (Va.) 439, Roane, J., says if an agent does an act which the principal ought not to require nor he to obey him in, his character as agent ceases, and he himself becomes responsible for his acts.

Since authority from one who has no right to confer it is void, it is no legal excuse for an act which causes an injury to another that the person committing it acted under the direction or by the consent of a third person who himself had no right to grant such authority or permission, and hence the well-settled rule that if a principal is a wrongdoer the agent, however innocent his intention, who participates in his acts, is also a wrongdoer. It must, therefore, be true, as a general proposition, that if an injurious act be done without sufficient authority, it is no answer to the claim of the owner for redress that the immediate author of the mischief acted in good faith, by direction of one whom he supposed to be the owner. Jones v. Fort (1860) 36 Ala. 462.

An agent who commits an act prohibited by law is liable as a principal. Swaggard v. Hancock (1887) 25 Mo. App. 596.

One doing an illegal act under contract with another is personally liable for any damage that may proximately flow from it. Moore v. Koppin (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 135 S. W. 1033.

Servants of a railroad company who knowingly back a train in a manner prohibited by statute are personally liable for injury thereby caused to a fellow servant. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Archer (1916) 113 Miss. 158, 74 So. 135.

Where the statute requires railroad rights of way to be kept clear from inflammable material, a section foreman will be liable in damages for injuries to adjoining lands by fire started on the right of way by his negligence in failing to keep it clear of such material. Patry v. Northern P. R. Co. (1911) 114 Minn. 375, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 568, 131 N. W. 462.

panies are required to maintain efficient spark arresters, engineers in charge of locomotives are liable for failure to see that the spark arresters on their engines are in good condition. Ibid.

An agent who receives usurious interest for his principal with notice that it is usurious, and that he will be held personally liable for it, cannot defeat an action on the ground that he acted merely as agent. O'Connor v. Clopton (1882) 60 Miss. 349.

In Jenne v. Sutton (1881) 43 N. J. L. 257, 39 Am. Rep. 578, which involved the question of liability of the president of a political club for injury done by fireworks exploded in a public street by direction of the club, the court said that the act of exploding them in the public street being unlawful, there can be no question with respect to the legal liability of all persons concerned in the doing of such act.

b. Trespass.

A servant who, in carrying out the terms of his employment, or who, by obeying the command of his master, commits a trespass, is personally liable therefor, and cannot plead in defense the fact that his act was that of his master.

That a servant committed a trespass by the command or encouragement of his master, the master is liable, but the servant is not thereby excused, for he is only to obey his master in matters that are entirely lawful. 1 Bl. Com. 430.

An agent who commits a positive wrong, such as a trespass, cannot shield himself simply because he acts as agent for another. Bader v. Mills

& B. Co. (1921) — Wyo. —, 201 Pac. 1012.

Waller v. Martin (1856) 17 B. Mon. (Ky.) 181, was an action against the officers, engineers, and laborers of a railroad company for trespassing on plaintiff's land. Only the officers were served with process, but the court held that if the company had no authority to commit the act, they were individually liable.

In Gilmore v. Driscoll (1877) 122 Mass. 199, 23 Am. Rep. 312, 14 Mor. Min. Rep. 37, which involved the right to lateral support, there is a dictum to the effect that even an agent of the owner of adjoining land will be liable for his own negligence or positive wrongs, for his principal could not confer upon him any authority to commit a tort upon the property or rights of another.

A servant who participates in the digging of a trench which casts water into another's cellar is liable for the resulting damage. The court says that for a misfeasance done by an agent in the line of his duty, he is liable. Martin v. Benoist (1886) 20 Mo. App. 262.

Agents of a corporation who enter upon private land and cut trees cannot defeat liability for the trespass on the theory that they were agents, if the corporation had no authority to do the act. Brownell v. Fisher (1880) 57 Cal. 150.

An agent who, under direction of his principal, unlawfully cuts timber of another, is liable for trespass. Baker v. Davis (1906) 127 Ga. 649, 57 S. E. 62.

An agent is liable in trespass for appropriating for his principal lumber belonging to another. Gravett v. Mugge (1878) 89 Ill. 218.

One cannot avoid liability for trespass in cutting and carrying away timber from another's land by the fact that he was acting merely as agent. Hazen v. Wight (1895) 87 Me. 233, 32 Atl. 887. The court says if the employer was a trespasser in ordering the removal of the timber, the servant was also a trespasser in carrying out the order, because a servant can never have greater authority than his employer.

In an action against a general contractor for injuries by a blast fired by one in charge of the blasting work, the court held that defendant could not be held liable for the act, but stated that the one responsible for the blast, and those under his control, by reason of their direct participation in the injurious act, might be liable. Brown v. Lent (1848) 20 Vt. 529.

Employees causing injury by blasting are personally liable therefor. Hardrop v. Gallagher (1854) 2 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 523.

An employee responsible for the setting off of a blast which throws debris onto neighboring property is personally liable for the trespass. Page v. Dempsey (1906) 184 N. Y. 245, 77 N. E. 9, 22 Am. Neg. Rep. 135.

The active manager of a coal mine is personally liable for directing the deposit of culm where it is washed into a stream to the injury of lower riparian property. Hindson v. Markle (1895) 171 Pa. 138, 33 Atl. 74. The court says if the acts were wrongful and occasioned injury to plaintiff, they were acts of misfeasance for which, under all the authorities, he was liable. They were his own voluntary acts, not enjoined upon him by his employers.

An agent in charge of an ore mill cannot escape liability for injury done to lower riparian property by the casting of tailings into the stream so as to pollute the water, by the fact that he was a mere agent. Humphreys Tunnel & Min. Co. v. Frank (1909) 46 Colo. 524, 105 Pac. 1093.

In Nunnally v. Southern Iron Co. (1895) 94 Tenn. 397, 28 L.R.A. 421, 29 S. W. 361, where a general manager of a mining corporation injured lower riparian property by casting debris into the stream, the court said: If the agent of a corporation or an individual commits a tort, the agent is clearly liable for the same, and it matters not what liability may attach to the principal, the agent must respond in damages if called upon to do so. "To permit an agent of a corporation, in carrying on its business, to inflict wrong and injuries upon others, and then shield himself from liability behind his vicarious character, would often both sanction and encourage the perpetration of flagrant and wanton injuries by agents of insolvent and irresponsible corporations. It would serve to stimulate the zeal of responsible and solvent agents of irresponsible and insolvent corporations in their efforts to repair the shattered fortunes of their failing principals upon the ruins of the rights of others."

An agent who, by direction of his employer, breaks the connection of a property owner with a sewer as a method of enforcing payment of charges for the right to use it, cannot defeat liability if the act was a wrongful trespass, on the ground that he acted merely as agent. Diamond & O. C. Sewerage Co. v. Smith (1901) 27 Tex. Civ. App. 558, 66 S. W. 141.

Where defendant demurred to a bill to enjoin him from entering upon plaintiff's land and destroying a weir, on the ground that he was a mere agent, the court said there was no agency between wrongdoers, and that want of interest was no defense because the tort was committed under direction of another. Heugh v. Abergavenny (1874) 23 Week. Rep. (Eng.) 40.

In McManus v. Crickett (1800) 1 East, 106, 102 Eng. Reprint, 43, 5 Revised Rep. 518, where the question was as to the liability of the master for a wilful trespass of the servant, Lord Kenyon referred to cases in which the servant, through negligence, ran over a boy in the street, and another ran against and overturned a vehicle, by which its load was injured, and stated that there could be no doubt of the servants in these cases being liable as trespassers.

Servants of a telephone company, who enter upon private property and cut the branches off trees to facilitate the stringing of wires, are personally liable for the trespass. Reber v. Bell Teleph. Co. (1916) 196 Mo. App. 69, 190 S. W. 612.

A broker who, as the agent of a landlord, attempts to distrain for rent, will be liable jointly with the latter in case he seizes exempt property. Gauntlett v. King (1857) 3 C. B. N. S. 59, 140 Eng. Reprint, 660.

A servant who commits a trespass in running a mine over onto adjoining property will be individually liable therefor. Blaen Avon Coal Co. v. McCulloh (1883) 59 Md. 403, 43 Am. Rep. 560.

But if the agent acts under direction of his principal, an action of trespass will not lie against him unless it would lie against the principal. Strong v. Colter (1868) 13 Minn. 82, Gil. 77.

In Paton v. Lancaster (1874) 38 Iowa, 494, which was an action to enjoin interference with plaintiff's possession of real estate, it appeared that defendant and his attorneys had committed actual trespasses on the property, and, although defendant was held liable, it was held that the attorneys, to the knowledge of plaintiff, were acting only as defendant's agents, and that, no fraud being charged, the action would not lie against them.

In Buron v. Denman (1848) 2 Exch. 167, 154 Eng. Reprint, 450, which involved the question of liability for acts done by an officer in suppression of the slave trade, it was held that the act being approved by the government, there was no personal liability; but Parke, Baron, said if an individual ratifies an act done on his behalf, the nature of the act remains unchanged, it is still a mere trespass, and the party injured may sue either principal or agent.

c. Assault.

An agent or servant cannot escape liability for an assault by showing that it was committed by command of the principal or master.

If one person employs another to commit an assault and battery and the act is perpetrated, both are responsible in damages. Bell v. Miller (Ohio) supra.

The agent is personally liable for assault committed in discharging the duties imposed upon him by the master. Brokaw v. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. (N. J.) supra.

The mate of a vessel cannot justify the commission of a wrongful assault upon a seaman by the fact that it was ordered to be done by the master. Brown v. Howard (N. Y.) supra.

Those in charge of a railroad train are personally liable for injuries caused by the use of excessive force in removing a person from the train. St. Louis, A. & C. R. Co. v. Dalby (Ill.) supra.

In Chamberlain v. Chandler (Fed.) supra, which was an action to hold the master of a vessel liable in damages for illegal treatment of passengers upon his vessel, the court does not separately consider the question of his liability as agent of the owners, but says that, in exercising the rights of sovereign control while the ship is at sea, if he chooses to perform his duties or exert his office in a harsh, intemperate, or oppressive manner, he is responsible to the law; and the court states that it appears that if he is guilty of gross abuse and oppression, the courts will never be found slow in visiting him, in the shape of damages, with an appropriate punishment.

An employee of a railroad company is personally liable for assault and battery committed by him upon an intending passenger. Priest v. Hudson River R. Co. (N. Y.) supra.

In Evansville & C. R. Co. v. Baum (Ind.) supra, which was an action against the master, the court says the servant himself is liable if he makes an assault upon another to gratify his private hate or malignity, under color of discharging the duty he has undertaken for his master, though he is, in general, not so liable to strangers for the consequences of mere negligence in the course of his employment.

In Lisner v. Hughes (D. C.) supra, which was an action against a master and servant jointly for an assault committed by the servant, the question discussed was as to the form of action and sufficiency of proof; but it seems to have been assumed that the action would lie against the servant.

An agent in charge of an office who is furnished with a weapon for protection against robbers is personally liable in case, by mistake of judgment, he shoots one entering the office on lawful business. Blakely v. Greer (Ohio) supra.

Where a blast in a quarry injured a person passing on the highway, an action was brought against the servant performing the work, it was said to be well settled that the servant is liable for his own carelessness. Wright v. Compton (Ind.) supra.

In Com. v. Rigney (Mass.) supra, a servant, at the command of his master, ejected a third person from premises in possession of the master, and he was held liable for assault; but the question of the effect of the command of the master is not discussed, the case turning upon the question of the right to effect the ejection.

d. Fraud and extortion.

An agent or servant is personally liable for injury inflicted upon third persons by his false representations, fraud, or extortion committed on behalf of his employer.

One who extorts money from another cannot avoid liability on the ground that he was acting for another person, to whom he has paid the money. Bacchino v. Cook (N. J.) supra.

An agent is personally liable for securing the surrender of bonds by their holder upon payments in Confederate currency by representing that such currency was legal tender, and that the creditor was compelled to receive it, whether the statement was fraudulently untrue, or constituted duress, by forcing the currency on the unwilling creditor. Mann v. McVey (W. Va.) supra.

For deceit and false representations made by an agent in the course of his employment, both the agent and his principal are civilly liable. Wheeler v. Baars (Fla.) supra.

In Cameron v. First Nat. Bank (Tex.) supra, which involved the question of liability of directors of a corporation, the court says an agent is as much responsible as his principal for fraud perpetrated by another, in which he participated.

In Reed v. Peterson (Ill.) supra, in which relief was sought from a fraudulent deprivation of a person of his property against a corporation and its cashier and agent, the court states the rule that, in an action at law for damages, the fact that defendant acted throughout in the capacity of agent, in a fraud perpetrated by him, will afford him no excuse.

An insurance agent is personally liable for false representations which induced the taking of a policy which would not otherwise have been taken. Hedden v. Griffin (Mass.) supra.

An agent is liable for false representations made in his master's business. Weber v. Weber (1882) 47 Mich. 569, 11 N. W. 389. The court says a person cannot avoid responsibility merely because he gets no personal advantage from the fraud. All persons who are active in defrauding others are liable for what they do, whether they act in one capacity or another.

The treasurer of a corporation, who has received, as custodian, stock to which another person will be entitled when he has performed certain services for the corporation, cannot avoid personal responsibility for his fraud in representing that it had been destroyed, and refusing to deliver it up when the condition was fulfilled, on the ground that the action should have been against the corporation. The court says that it is true that he, as agent of the corporation, could not be held liable for its acts, but he is charged with fraud and deceit, and for those acts he, and not the corporation, is the responsible party. McDonald v. McKinnon (1892) 92 Mich. 254, 52 N. W. 363.

A servant of a corporation is personally liable for fraudulently over-issuing its stock. Bruff v. Mali (1867) 36 N. Y. 200.

An agent who assists a trustee of corporate stock in selling it and securing a transfer of it on the books of the corporation is liable for its value to a cestui que trust. Caulkins v. Memphis Gaslight Co. (1887) 85 Tenn. 683, 4 Am. St. Rep. 786, 4 S. W. 287.

One who aids in procuring corporate stock to be illegally issued to him under circumstances which would make him, if acting in his own right, responsible to the true owner, cannot avoid liability because he was acting as agent for another. Baker v. Wasson (1880) 53 Tex. 150.

An agent of a bank, who makes a false statement upon inquiry by a third person as to the credit of a person named, is personally liable for the loss caused thereby to the one making the inquiry. That ruling, however, is put upon the ground that the inquiry was made of the manager individually, and that, therefore, the bank would not be liable for his act. Swift v. Jewsbury (1846) L. R. 9 Q. B. (Eng.) 301, 43 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 56, 30 L. T. N. S. 31, 22 Week. Rep. 319.

In Hempfling v. Burr (1886) 59 Mich. 294, 26 N. W. 496, the court, in speaking of a claim that a cashier of a bank was not liable for a fraud committed by him in behalf of the bank, says this is a very singular result, and one which is too unreasonable to bear consideration.

Sales.

An agent is personally liable for false representations made in the sale of his principal's property. Lamm v. Port Deposit Homestead Asso. (1878) 49 Md. 233, 33 Am. Rep. 246; Campbell v. Hillman (1854) 15 B. Mon. (Ky.) 508, 61 Am. Dec. 195; Gutchess v. Whiting (1866) 46 Barb. (N. Y.) 139.

Agents who, by false representations, induce others to purchase invalid warrants, are personally liable in an action for money had and received, although they have turned the proceeds of the sale over to their principals. Moore v. Shields (1889) 121 Ind. 267, 23 N. E. 89.

In Re Cushman (1916) 95 Misc. 9, 160 N. Y. Supp. 661, which was an action to hold the estate of a guardian liable for false representations as to title in the sale of the ward's real estate, the court recognizes the rule that a known agent is not responsible to a third person for acts done by him in performance of an authority rightfully conferred. He is not liable to third persons for omission or neglect of duty, though he may be liable for his own torts.

An agent fraudulently selling an unsound horse as sound is liable for the fraud. Carpenter v. Lee (1833) 5 Yerg. (Tenn.) 265.

An agent assisting in defrauding a customer into the purchase of worthless stock is personally liable. Brumley v. Chattanooga Speedway & Motor-drome Co. (1917) 138 Tenn. 534, 198 S. W. 775. The court says: "If one acting as the agent or employee of another is guilty of fraud under circumstances which would make him responsible if acting for himself, he may not be relieved from liability by showing that he acted as agent for such another, even though no personal benefit accrues to him." Indeed, liability rests primarily upon the agent as the immediate actor at fault, and even his principal's liability is derivative from that primary source, and dependent on whether or not the agent acted for the principal.

... There can be no sound distinction between torts of negligence and torts growing out of fraud and deceit in this regard. The case for liability on the part of the agent rather would seem to be stronger in the latter case, since ordinarily he consciously and wittingly does the wrongful act that deceives and defrauds."

If one send his servant to sell a counterfeit Bezoar stone as genuine, and the servant, with knowledge of the deceit, follows his instructions, an action on the case lies against him. Southerne v. Howe (1619) Rolle, Rep. 28, 81 Eng. Reprint, 637, citing (1606) 3 Jac. B. R. Lopez's Case.

An agent who effects the sale of an encumbered leasehold without disclosing the fact of the encumbrance is personally liable for the down payment which has been made to him. Arnot v. Biscoe (1743) 1 Ves. Sr. 95, 27 Eng. Reprint, 914, 18 Eng. Rul. Cas. 156.

Where an agent having silver to sell for his principal sold it on a false assay for more than it was worth, and credited his principal's account with what he received, he was held to be personally liable to the purchaser for the deficiency, on the ground that he had not, by merely crediting his principal's account, changed his position. The agent was guilty of no wrong in the matter, however, because he employed a professional assay master to compute the amount. The decision was put upon the ground of mutual error. Cox v. Prentice (1815) 3 Maule & S. 345, 105 Eng. Reprint, 641, 16 Revised Rep. 288.

In Cullen v. Thomson (1863) 4 Macq. H. L. Cas. (Eng.) 441, 9 Jur. N. S. 85, 6 L. T. N. S. 870, which was an action to hold managers of a corporation liable for fraudulent sales of stock, the Lord Chancellor says all persons directly concerned in the commission of a fraud are to be treated as principals. No person can be permitted to excuse himself on the ground that he acted as the agent or as the servant of another, and the reason is plain; for the contract of agency cannot impose an obligation on the agent or servant to commit, or assist in the committing of, a fraud.

Agents who aid in concealing property obtained by fraud will be equally liable therefor with the one guilty of the fraud. Allen v. Hartfield (1875) 76 Ill. 358.

The same principle applies to an agent who aids in a breach of trust.

The agent of a trustee, who, with knowledge that a breach of trust is being committed, assists in that breach of trust, is personally answerable, although he may be employed as the agent of the person who directs him to commit the breach of trust. Atty. Gen. v. Leicester (1844) 7 Beav. 176, 49 Eng. Reprint, 1031.

There is one early case which, as reported, seems to be out of harmony with the law as afterwards established.

In Anonymous (1472) Y. B. (Eng.) Edw. IV. 6, pl. 10, an action of deceit was brought against a person for selling cloth warranted to be of a certain length, which was not so long as warranted. The defendant pleaded that he sold as servant for the owner, and the court said that plaintiff could look to the master, for the servant sold merely as servant.

As will be seen in the discussion of the question of conversion, III. j, there is a theory that if the servant or agent acts merely as a conduit through whose possession the goods pass, without any act on his part to affect the title, he is not liable. This rule has been applied in a few cases which appear to have involved liability for fraud.

Thus, a clerk is not personally liable for failure to credit a payment on the books which he has turned over to his master. Cary v. Webster (1721) 1 Strange, 480, 93 Eng. Reprint, 647. The court, however, says that if he had not paid it over, the plaintiff would have had his option to charge either servant or master.

Taunt. 359, 127 Eng. Reprint, 872, which was an action for money had and received against the bailiff of a sheriff, who had extorted more money than his warrant called for by threat of distress, and paid the money over to the sheriff, the question of liability was compared to that of an agent, and the distinction was made that if the money were paid to the agent to be paid to the principal, the agent would not be liable, though he would be if it were not paid expressly for the benefit of the principal.

In 1 Rolle, Abr. 95, it is said that if a servant of a taverner sell wine which is bad, yet an action of deceit will not lie against the servant, for he did this as servant. But no authority is cited for the proposition, and the author concludes his sentence, "Contra, 9 Hen. VI. 533." The latter authority was a case against B and C for the sale of bad wine, and C defended on the ground that he sold as the servant of B, and Martin held that the defense was not good; so that Rolle's statement does not seem to be correct.

And in one case it was held that there was no liability for false representations in the sale of stock, if they were honestly made, the agent himself being deceived by the principal. Eblin v. Sellars (1894) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 539.

That makes the question of knowledge or notice on the part of the agent an element in the liability of the agent, but it would seem that the same rule should apply to the agent as to the principal; that is, he should be liable not only for statements which he knows to be false, but also for those which he ought to have known to be so.

A servant or agent cannot avoid liability for libel published by him by the fact that he acted merely in the capacity of servant or agent. Pollasky v. Minchener (1890) 81 Mich. 280, 9 L.R.A. 102, 21 Am. St. Rep. 516, 46 N. W. 5; Morse v. Modern Woodmen (1917) 166 Wis. 194, 164 N. W. 829, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 480.

In Breay v. Royal British Nurses Asso. [1897] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 272, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 587, 76 L. T. N. S. 735, 46 Week. Rep. 86, which involved the question of the liability of a benefit association for a libel published in a paper which it maintained, the court said that if the article was a libel, the secretary of the association, who ordered the publication to be made, would be personally liable for it.

In Maloney v. Bartley (1812) 3 Campb. (Eng.) 210, which involved a question of admissibility of evidence, the court says that a person who has written a copy of a libel and delivered it to a third person is liable, and the fact that his master ordered him to do so is no justification.

Civil actions for libel seem to be rare; and therefore attention is called to the following cases in which prosecutions were upheld against servants as such: Rex v. Clerk (1728) 1 Barnard. K. B. 304, 94 Eng. Reprint, 207; Rex v. Knell (1729) 1 Barnard. K. B. 305, 94 Eng. Reprint, 207.

There is a tendency running through the decisions, however, to hold that if the agent or servant is a mere innocent conduit through which the wrong is committed, he will not be personally liable. Thus, a porter, who, in the course of his business, delivers parcels containing libelous handbills, is not liable in an action of libel if he can show that he was ignorant of the contents of the parcels. Day v. Bream (1837) 2 Moody & R. (Eng.) 54.

f. Obstruction of ancient lights.

A servant of a corporation is liable for obstructing ancient lights. Thompson v. Gibson (1841) 7 Mees. & W. 456, 151 Eng. Reprint, 845, 9 Dowl. P. C. 717, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 330.

The managing clerk of a property owner under whose direction buildings are constructed which darken the ancient lights of a neighboring property owner is personally liable for the injury. Wilson v. Peto (1821) 6 J. B. Moore (Eng.) 47.

g. Abuse of legal process.

An agent or servant who uses legal process in an illegal manner incurs the same liability as he would had he employed it in his own behalf.

In McGarrahan v. Lavers (R. I.) supra, a clerk in a restaurant was held liable for directing the arrest of a customer, without any discussion as to whether or not the action should have been brought against his employer.

A manager of a store is personally liable for arresting, without warrant, a customer who is alleged to have been guilty of shoplifting, which did not occur in his presence. Gearity v. Stresbourger (N. Y.) supra.

And the general rule is that the servant or agent is liable in all cases for false arrest. Josselyn v. McAllister (Mich.) supra.

A clerk and watchman of a hotel who took part in a wrongful arrest of a guest for alleged refusal to pay a bill are personally liable in damages therefor. Sundmacher v. Block (Ill.) supra.

An agent or servant is liable in damages for causing the arrest of a person maliciously and illegally, although he is acting for his principal. Warfield v. Campbell (Ala.) supra.

If A orders B to conduct a prosecution, and both know that the person charged is innocent, they are equally to blame. The fact of B obeying A's command is not enough to exonerate him. Stevens v. Midland Counties R. Co. (1854) 10 Exch. 352, 156 Eng. Reprint, 480, 2 C. L. R. 1300, 23 L. J. Exch. N. S. 328, 18 Jur. 932.

One who, as agent of another, collects money by execution, and, instead of applying it on the judgment and costs in the action, applies it to other claims of his principals, cannot avoid liability to the judgment debtor on the ground that he acted as agent. Wright v. Eaton (Wis.) supra. The court says the fact that the client obtained the money as agent, if wrongfully obtained, cannot absolve him from liability to the person from whom it was obtained, although he had paid it over to his principal.

In an action against agents for illegally bringing suit in the admiralty for a matter arising within the body of a county, it was held that the express command of the master would not avail because the warrant of no man, not even the King himself, can excuse the doing of an illegal act, for, although the commanders are trespassers, so are also the persons who do the act. Sands v. Child (1693) 3 Lev. 351, 83 Eng. Reprint, 725.

In Wood v. Weir (Ky.) supra, an attorney who maliciously procured a restraining order to deprive plaintiff of his property was held liable in damages; but there is no discussion of his position as agent of his client.

In Barker v. Braham (1773) 3 Wils. 377, 95 Eng. Reprint, 1109, 2 W. Bl. 866, 96 Eng. Reprint, 510, which involved the question of liability of an attorney for illegally suing out a capias ad satisfaciendum, he attempted to defend on the ground that he merely acted as agent for his principal; but the court said all the books say that all are principals in trespass.

An agent having the renting of property for the owner cannot defeat liability to an action for trespass in directing the leaving of a distress for rent after the rent had been tendered, on the ground that he was merely acting as agent. Bennett v. Bayes (1860) 5 Hurlst & N. 391, 157 Eng. Reprint, 1233, 29 L. J. Exch. N. S. 224, 8 Week. Rep. 320, 2 L. T. N. S. 156.

Agents of an officer who, after attaching a vessel, permit it to continue its accustomed course of business, and who receive the profits thereof, are liable to the attaching creditor, who establishes his title to the vessel, for the amounts so received, the court saying that an agent is liable for misfeasance to the owner of the property, whether he acted by direction of his principal or not. Richardson v. Kimball (Me.) supra.

A real estate broker employed by a property owner to make a distress for rent is personally liable for distraining goods not subject to distress. Gauntlett v. King (1857) 3 C. B. N. S. 59, 140 Eng. Reprint, 660.

An agent who acts maliciously in making the affidavit and bond necessary to secure an attachment is personally responsible for the injury done. Wallace v. Finberg (Tex.) supra.

h. Infringement of patent.

Agents who participate in the infringement of a patent may be held personally liable for their acts.

And an injunction will lie against them to prevent infringement. Good-year v. Phelps (1853) 3 Blatchf. 91, Fed. Cas. No. 5,581; Poppenhausen v. Falke (1861) 4 Blatchf. 493, Fed. Cas. No. 11,279; Iowa Barb Steel Wire Co. v. Southern Barbed-Wire Co. (1887) 30 Fed. 123; Cahoone Barnet Mfg. Co. v. Rubber & C. Harness Co. (1891) 45 Fed. 582.

An agent who actively participates in the infringement of a patent is liable in damages. National Car-Brake Shoe Co. v. Terre Haute Car & Mfg. Co. (1884) 19 Fed. 514.

In an action against the chairman of the directors of a railroad company for contracting for certain work which involved the infringement of a patent, the court says undoubtedly all persons commanding, procuring, aiding, or assisting in the commission of a trespass are principals in the transaction, and stand responsible to answer in damages to the injured person. Both the master who commands the doing and the servant who does the acts of trespass may be made responsible as principals. Lightner v. Brooks (1864) 2 Cliff. 287, Fed. Cas. No. 8,344.

Sickels v. Borden (1857) 4 Blatchf. 14, Fed. Cas. No. 12,833, was a proceeding in attachment for violation of an injunction against infringement of a patent by the use of an engine to which the mechanism had been attached. But with respect to the liability of the engineer having no interest in, or control over, the engine, it was argued that it would not do to punish by attachment the mere servants of the owner of the boat, who were subject to the orders of the master and to punishment for disobedience if they refused to aid in the navigation of the boat. But the court held that both the master and engineer, as agents of the foreign corporation which owned the boat on which the infringing mechanism was placed, were proper parties to the suit, at least for the purpose of enjoining the engineer as the acting infringer. And neither his agency nor his relationship to the master or to the vessel affords an excuse for violation of the injunction.

But an action at law for damages cannot be maintained against servants who merely make or sell an article which infringes a patent. United Nickel Co. v. Worthington (1882) 13 Fed. 392.

So, customhouse agents of foreign manufacturers, who aid in passing through the customhouse articles manufactured abroad which infringe a domestic patent, cannot be held liable for the infringement. This was placed upon the ground that the act was neither making, using, exercising, nor vending the invention. Nobel's

Explosives Co. v. Jones (1883) L. R. 8 App. Cas. (Eng.) 5, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 339, 48 L. T. N. S. 490, 31 Week. Rep. 388, affirming (1880) L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 722, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 582, 44 L. T. N. S. 593, 30 Week. Rep. 494.

The directors of a corporation which has been guilty of an infringement of a patent may be held personally liable so far as they co-operated in the infringement, and it is no justification for them to say that the corporation ordered them to do so. Betts v. De Vitre (1864) 11 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 535, 5 New. Rep. 165.

1. Meddling with decedents' estates.

An agent who assists his principal in meddling with the estate of a deceased person, with which the principal is not authorized to interfere, is personally liable therefor.

In Lysley v. Clarke (1851) 14 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 510, there is a dictum to the effect that one interfering with the estate of a deceased person, as agent for another, is a wrongdoer and liable as executor de son tort.

An agent of an executrix, who mismanages the estate and converts income to his own use, is liable to the executrix, but not to heirs and distributees. Phinney v. Phinney (1859) 17 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 197.

In Pond v. Underwood (1766) 2 Ld. Raym. 1210, 92 Eng. Reprint, 299, it was held that one who, as agent for an administrator appointed before finding the will, collects money due the intestate and turns it over to the administrator, is not liable in trover to the executor when appointed. The court held that though the administrator might be liable, yet it would be hard to make defendant liable, he having paid the money over before he knew of the will.

But in Jacob v. Allen (1703) 1 Salk. 27, 91 Eng. Reprint, 26, it was held that an agent of an administrator who collects money for the estate, and pays it over to the administrator before the will is found, is liable to the executor in indebitatus assumpsit, because the administration was void and could give him no authority to act.

The earlier case was decided by Trevor, Ch. J., and was indebitatus assumpsit for money had and received, and it was objected that defendant acting only as agent, it was a receipt by the administrator, and not by defendant, and that the action ought to be special assumpsit, and not general indebitatus, because, the money having been received by special authority, to the use of another, this express intent prevents the raising of an implied contract to a third person. Sed non allocatur for the administration was merely void and the administrator could give no authority, and then there is nothing to hinder the raising of an implied contract. The later case was the same form of action for money which was due the testator and collected by defendant before the will was found. The case came before Lord Holt, who, as has been seen, was inclined to favor a rule of nonliability in case of agents acting for their principals, and he directed a nonsuit. In Sadler v. Evans (1766) 4 Burr. 1984, 98 Eng. Reprint, 34, decided about the time of Pond v. Underwood, Lord Mansfield said that he favored the later case.

One who, at the instance of a widow, collects and pays over to her money due the estate when she has not taken letters of administration, is personally liable to the executor for the amount so collected. Sharland v. Mildon (1846) 5 Hare, 469, 67 Eng. Reprint, 997, 15 L. J. Ch. N. S. 434, 10 Jur. 771. The court says the authorities clearly show that the doctrine that the possession of the agent is the possession of the principal has no application to the case of a wrongdoer.

The husband of an administratrix, acting as her agent, may be directly liable to the cestuis que trust for any fraud or collusion in the management of the estate. Lehmann v. Rothbarth (1884) 111 Ill. 185.

Executors and trustees in charge of the property of a deceased are personally liable for permitting the property to become so out of order that a window falls from the building, to the injury of a passer-by. Ferrier v. Trépannier (1895) 24 Can. C. S. 86,

Where the treasurer of a savings bank paid out money of a deceased depositor in settlement of claims against him, and it was sought to make him liable for other debts as executor de son tort, he claims exemption as having acted merely as agent of the bank; but the court says the actual perpetrator of a positive and obvious wrong can never exonerate himself from personal liability by showing that he was acting as the agent or servant of another, or even by his superior command. Bennett v. Ives (1862) 30 Conn. 329.

In Stephens v. Bacon (1822) 7 N. J. L. 1, it was held that an agent of an executrix who receives money held by testator in trust for a third person is not liable in assumpsit to the third person. The court says a mere agent, without suggestion of fraud, is answerable only to his principal.

If a person acting as agent for another takes possession of the personal property of a decedent and converts it into money, without administration, he will be liable to the lawful administrator for the value of the property so converted. Stevenson v. Valentine (1889) 27 Neb. 338, 43 N. W. 107. One employed to collect some debts belonging to a decedent's estate was sought to be held liable for paying them over to decedent's widow, and it was held that he will not be relieved from liability on the ground that he was acting as agent for the widow, since the law does not recognize the relation of principal and agent as existing amongst wrongdoers. Sharland v. Mildon (Eng.) supra.

j. Conversion.

1. In general.

An agent or servant who assists his principal or master in converting property of a third person to the use of the principal or master is personally liable to the true owner for the loss thereby inflicted upon him.

If A takes property by command of B, replevin may be brought against both. (1676) 2 Rolle, Abr. (Eng.) 431.

A person wrongfully taking property is liable in replevin although he acts as agent for another. Thompson v. McLean (1890) 32 N. Y. S. R. 736, 10 N. Y. Supp. 411.

In Arthur v. Balch (1851) 23 N. H. 157, which was an action to hold the master liable for conversion by his servant, the court said that it was formerly held that where goods were converted by a servant at the command or by direction of the master, no action would lie against the servant, but that this doctrine is no longer held to be the law.

One who takes and converts property of another cannot escape liability to the owner by showing that he acted as agent. Warder-Bushnell & G. Co. v. Harris (Iowa) supra. The court says the capacity in which a tort-feasor acts does not protect him from liability for his acts.

Where one to whom stock has been sent for delivery upon payment of the amount for which it was held as collateral converted it to his own use, an action was brought against him by the true owner, and the court, after stating that he had transcended the power conferred upon him, and was guilty of misfeasance toward the one entitled to possession of the stock, says: "Although an agent, for non-feasance and omissions of duty, is not liable, except to his principals, the rule is otherwise when the act complained of is misfeasance. In all such cases he is personally responsible, whether he did the wrong intentionally, or ignorantly by the authority of his principal; for the principal could not confer on him any authority to commit a tort upon the rights or property of another." Crane v. Onderdonk (1873) 67 Barb. (N. Y.) 47.

One aiding in the conversion of property cannot escape liability in trover on the ground of his agency. Shearer v. Evans (Ind.) supra.

In Davies v. Vernon (1844) 6 Q. B. 443, 115 Eng. Reprint, 169, 14 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 30, which was an action against an attorney, the court says the general rule is that an agent is liable in trover for a conversion to which he is a party, though it be for the benefit of his principal.

• Replevin lies against an agent who aids in detaining property of another. Berghoff v. McDonald (Ind.) supra. The court says, in torts the rule of principal and agent does not exist. They are all wrongdoers.

An agent who, for and in behalf of his principal, takes the property of another without the latter's consent, is guilty of conversion. McConnell v. Prince (Ga.) supra.

It is no defense in trover that defendant acted under authority of another, who had no authority over the property. Gaines v. Briggs (1849) 9 Ark. 46.

An agent who takes for a principal plank to which the principal has no claim is personally liable in trover for the conversion. Barton v. Willey (1875) 2 W. N. C. (Pa.) 157.

One taking possession of another's animals, and carrying them off, cannot defeat liability on the ground that he was acting as agent. Shilling v. Shilling (1896) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 35 S. W. 420.

Persons who wrongfully drive a cropper off his land and appropriate his crop cannot defeat liability because they acted as agents. Ellis v. Stine (1900) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 55 S. W. 758.

In Huffman v. Parsons (1879) 21 Kan. 467, there is a dictum to the effect that if an agent, sued for the value of a wagon which he had taken from possession of plaintiff, committed a wrong in taking the wagon, he would be liable even though he acted as agent of another.

A cartman who assists in moving goods of a third person at the instance of his employer is liable in trover. Thorp v. Burling (1814) 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 285.

So, where cartmen assist the wrongdoer in reducing property to his possession by taking it from the place where the owner had deposited it, and carting it away, they will be liable for the conversion, although they did not know of the adverse title. The only ground on which the carrier cannot be held liable is that he has received and transported the goods after the trespasser has reduced them to his possession. Mead v. Jack (1883) 12 Daly (N. Y.) 65.

Agents sued in replevin for property taken by them for their principal cannot defeat the action by showing that they acted as agents. Barnhart v. Ford (1887) 37 Kan. 520, 15 Pac. 542.

Agents who aid their principal in concealing and retaining title to property fraudulently obtained are liable in trover. Allen v. Hartfield (1875) 76 Ill. 358.

An agent assisting in preventing the removal of trade fixtures from a building is personally liable in trover. Farrar v. Chauffetete (1848) 5 Denio, (N. Y.) 527.

The servant of a bankrupt, who, under his general authority, after his master has committed an act of bankruptcy and absconded, sells goods belonging to the bankrupt, is guilty of conversion. Pearson v. Graham (1837) 6 Ad. & El. 899, 112 Eng. Reprint, 344, 2 Nev. & P. 636, W. W. & D. 691, 7 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 247.

The master of a ship who negligently signs a bill of lading in favor of a third person, and then delivers according to the bill of lading, notwithstanding notice not to do so, is liable for conversion. Schuster v. McKellar (1857) 7 El. & Bl. 704, 119 Eng. Reprint, 1407, 26 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 281, 3 Jur. N. S. 1320, 5 Week. Rep. 656.

Where the master of a ship unnecessarily sells the cargo before reaching destination, he is guilty of conversion. Ewbank v. Nutting (1849) 7 C. B. 797, 137 Eng. Reprint, 316.

But an agent acting in the presence and under the direction of his master in taking possession of property claimed by another was held, in Strong v. Colter (1868) 13 Minn. 82, Gil. 77, not to be liable for the conversion unless his principal would also be liable.

And there is no liability for conversion for acts in which the agent does not participate. McLennan v. Minneapolis & N. Elevator Co. (1894) 57 Minn. 317, 59 N. W. 628.

And that doctrine was, in Leuthold v. Fairchild (1885) 35 Minn. 100, 27 N. W. 503, 28 N. W. 218, where an employee of a warehouse was sued for assisting in wrongfully disposing of property of a patron, carried to such an extent that the court said that the rule was that "an agent or servant who, acting solely for his master or principal, and by his direction, and without knowing of any wrong, or being guilty of gross negligence in not knowing of it, disposes of, or assists the master in disposing of, property which the latter has no right to dispose of, is not thereby rendered liable for a conversion of the property."

There is a rule acted upon by the courts more or less generally that an agent is not personally liable if he is a mere conduit through whose possession the property passes without any effect upon the title. Thus, a bailee or carrier may receive the property and return it to the principal or to his consignee without personal liability. This class of cases is not within the scope of this annotation because the cases turn upon the principle that there is no conversion in fact, without throwing any light upon the question now under consideration; namely, What is the liability of an agent who aids in a conversion?

Where a packer received, packed, and shipped goods to a third person which had been intrusted to his employers for sale, and by him pledged to such third persons for money lent, the court held that the packer was not liable for conversion, because he was exercising a public employment, and that he was a mere conduit in the ordinary course of trade, and could not be charged with a conversion. Greenway v. Fisher (1824) 1 Car. & P. (Eng.) 190.

But in Fowler v. Hollins (1872) L. R. 7 Q. B. 628, 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 410, that case was doubted on the ground that a packer is not engaged in a public employment.

One Arkansas case failed to recognize this exception to the rule, and held broadly that in trover it is no defense that defendant acted under authority of another, who was himself a trespasser. Gaines v. Briggs (1848) 9 Ark. 46. In that case an instruction was disapproved which was to the effect that if defendant, in removing the property, acted as a mere carrier, at the instance and request of a third person, and with no intention of converting the property to his own use, or with the intent to exercise any right of ownership over said property, but in good faith, and at the time of the removal, the third person was in peaceable and quiet possession of the property, and defendant in no wise consented to, aided, or counseled the removal of the property, he would not be responsible.

2. Property turned over to principal.

The fact that the property has been turned over to the principal is immaterial. The liability of the agent continues as though he still had the property in his possession. In fact, the act of turning it over may be the very act which completes the conversion.

An agent who, having become possessed of negotiable bills which had been taken from a bankrupt under circumstances such that they belonged to the one from whom he obtained them, may be personally liable in trover for turning them over to his principal after notice of the owner's claim. Powell v. Hoyland (1851) 6 Exch. 67, 155 Eng. Reprint, 456, 20 L. J. Exch. N. S. 82.

Where a clerk of a foreign merchant bought goods belonging to a bankrupt's estate and sent them to his employer, he was held personally liable for the conversion, although he was ignorant of the fact that the goods belonged to the estate. Stephens v. Elwall (1815) 4 Maule & S. 259, 105 Eng. Reprint, 830. Lord Ellenborough said the clerk acted under an unavoidable ignorance, and for his master's benefit, when he sent the goods to his master, but nevertheless his acts may amount to a conversion, "for a person is guilty of a conversion who intermeddles with any property and disposes of it, and it is no answer that he acted under authority from another who had himself no authority to dispose of it." And he says in answer to the plea of hard case, "What can be more hard than the common case in trespass, where a servant has done some act in assertion of his master's right, that he shall be liable not only jointly with his master, but, if the master cannot satisfy it, for every penny of the whole damage?"

An agent who trades a new machine in his hands for sale for an old one belonging to a third person is personally liable to the true owner, although he turns the old one and the money received in the trade over to his employer. Rice v. Yocum (1893) 155 Pa. 538, 26 Atl. 698.

An agent who has money to which his principal has no right is personally liable to one from whom it is wrongfully withheld. Jensen v. Miller (1916) 162 Wis. 546, 156 N. W. 1010.

In an action against an attorney for wrongfully collecting money and turning it over to his principal, the court says that the rule is that if an agent collects for his principal money which does not belong to him, and turns it over to the principal, he is personally liable therefor. Blizzard v. Brown (1913) 152 Wis. 160, 139 N. W. 737.

That one wrongfully obtaining money from another acts as agent for a third person does not absolve him from liability to the person from whom he secured it, although he has paid it over to his principal. Wright v. Eaton (1859) 7 Wis. 595.

Agents who assist their principal in appropriating the proceeds of a check which was alleged to be lost, after a duplicate had been issued in its place, with the understanding that the first one, if found, would be returned or destroyed, cannot avoid liability on the ground of their agency. Mayer v. Kilpatrick (1894) 7 Misc. 689, 28 N. Y. Supp. 145. The court says the principal cannot authorize or be deemed to have authorized the commission of any unlawful act by his agent, and defendants will not be permitted, therefore, to escape liability because, in the conversion of the check, they pretended to act for another.

In Hearsey v. Pruyn (1810) 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 182, it is said the law is well settled that an action may be sustained against an agent who has received money to which the principal has no right, if the agent has had notice not to pay it over.

One who bids in, as agent for another, at execution sale, property upon which he knows a third person has a lien, is guilty of conversion. McCormick v. Stevenson (1882) 13 Neb. 70, 12 N. W. 828; Stevenson v. Valentine (1889) 27 Neb. 338, 43 N. W. 107; Cook v. Monroe (1895) 45 Neb. 349, 63 N. W. 800; D. M. Osborne Co. v. Plano Mfg. Co. (1897) 51 Neb. 502, 70 N. W. 1124.

One who collects for another a draft received by indorsement in a gambling transaction, and turns the proceeds over to him, less his own commission for the service, is liable for the conversion. Williams v. Wall (1875) 60 Mo. 318.

Where an agent to collect a bill receives property from the debtor which belongs to a third person, and transmits it to his principal, he is liable in trover. The court said he was not relieved from liability by the fact that, in receiving the property from the debtor, he acted as the agent of the creditor, and without notice of the title of the true owner. Whoever meddles with another's property, whether as principal or agent, does so at his peril, and it makes no difference that, in doing so, he acted in good faith; nor, in case of an agent, that he delivers the property to his principal before receiving notice of the claim of the owner. If an agent takes the property of another without his consent and delivers it to the principal, it is a conversion, and trover will lie for recovery of the property, or for damages. Miller v. Wilson (1896) 98 Ga. 567, 58 Am. St. Rep. 319, 25 S. E. 578; Flannery v. Harley (1903) 117 Ga. 483, 43 S. E. 765.

Where an agent purchased slaves unlawfully sold at an auction, and immediately turned them over to his principal, but was sued for the conversion, the court says: "Our first impression was that the defendant, having acted merely as the agent of another person, and having parted with the possession before he received notice of the title of the plaintiff, was not responsible in this action, but that the suit must be brought against the principal. Subsequent reflection has satisfied us that we were mistaken, and that the principal upon which we relied does not govern such cases as this. The general rule of law, that agents properly authorized, acting for a known principal, without any personal undertaking, are not individually responsible, does not apply to torts, because no one can lawfully command another to commit a wrong. It is also clear that every unlawful intermeddling with the goods of another is a conversion; and it is no answer to the true owner, that the person so receiving the goods was ignorant of his title, or that he received them for the use or benefit of another. The taking or receiving of them, being a conversion, his subsequent disposition of them will not exonerate him from liability. . . . Although, therefore, this may appear to be a hard case, it is perfectly clear the defendant, in receiving the slaves, was guilty of a conversion, although he was ignorant of the title of the plaintiff, and was acting merely as the agent of another, and consequently liable to be sued in this form of action." Lee v. Mathews (1846) 10 Ala. 682, 44 Am. Dec. 498.

But where one, as agent, purchases the share of the cotenant in a horse at execution sale, and delivers him to his principal, he is not liable for conversion of the share of the other cotenant unless his acts deprived such cotenant of the means of locating the animal. Sheffler v. Mudd (1897) 71 Mo. App. 78.

So, an agent of a surety company is not liable for conversion in placing money deposited with him by a customer as collateral for a bond executed in his favor in a bank account upon which checks for various purposes are drawn, after the agency has terminated and the fund has passed under control of the surety company. Sagone v. Mackey (1919) 225 N. Y. 594, 122 N. E. 621, reversing (1916) 172 App. Div. 192, 158 N. Y. Supp. 579, where the court says that the law is well settled that where an agent misapplies and misappropriates trust moneys, he, as well as the principal, is liable to the cestuis que trust therefor. When this defendant received these trust funds, it was not only the duty of his principal, but his own duty, to keep them separate and distinct, not only from the funds of the company, but also from his individual funds. When he employed them in an account which contained a general fund of the company, and also an individual fund from which he drew for his personal use, he, as well as the principal, was liable for misfeasance and misappropriation. His wrongful act was a breach of duty owing to the cestuis que trust, for which he is personally liable.

Where a servant was sued in trover for conversion of a flute which he had obtained from plaintiff for his master's inspection, and which was not returned, it was held that the master was a competent witness to show that he authorized the obtaining of the flute, the chief justice saying that if he authorized the delivery of the message which was in fact delivered, the plaintiff could not recover from the servant. Grylls v. Davies (1831) 2 Barn. & Ad. 514, 109 Eng. Reprint, 1234. In that case trover had been brought against the servant, and after verdict in his favor, the only question was as to the competency of the principal as a witness, and that depended upon whether or not he was an interested party. The ground of the ruling of the chief justice is not stated. If the intent to convert the flute was not formed until after it had been delivered to the master, the servant may possibly not be liable because he did not participate in the conversion; but if the message was part of the scheme to get possession of and convert the instrument, it is not apparent why the servant should not be personally liable for aiding such a scheme.

Some New York cases, by an application of the principal of nonfeasance which obtained in that state, have reached the conclusion that an agent who purchases for a principal property claimed by another is not liable for the conversion. Jackson v. Klingner (1900) 33 Misc. 758, 67 N. Y. Supp. 850.

So, replevin will not lie against an agent who takes for his principal an article sold by the principal on conditional sale, and turns it over to the principal to hold for defaulted payments. Iserman v. Conklin (1897) 21 Misc. 194, 47 N. Y. Supp. 107. The court says the agent acted, with knowledge of the plaintiff, as the agent of the sellers, and not for himself.

In conflict with the above doctrine is the early English case of Mires v. Solebay (1677) 2 Mod. 242, 86 Eng. Reprint, 1050. In that case it appeared that, in consequence of a controversy over the title to some sheep, replevin was brought to recover their possession, and defendant, by command of the replevin suit, assisted the officers in driving the sheep to the plaintiff's pasture. Defendant was held not liable in trover, partly upon the ground that the sheep were in the custody of the law; but the court said the action will not lie against the servant, for apparent wrong; for if the master's command, though he had no title, yet he shall be excused. And this ruling would extend to all cases where the master's command was not to do an apparent wrong; for if the master's cause depend upon a title, be it true or false, it is enough to excuse the servant; for otherwise it would be a mischievous thing if a servant upon all occasions must be satisfied with his master's title and right before he will obey his commands. But the servant cannot plead the command of the master in bar of a trespass. The jury having failed to find a conversion, the court said it would not intend one, because, if the conversion was to the use of the master, there is no call for this action to be brought against defendant, but it ought to be brought against the master. It will be noted that in that case the jury refused to find a conversion, and that, together with the other elements in the case, makes the argument of the court of little weight. In the light of later decisions it would seem that had nothing appeared further than that, at his master's command, defendant assisted in taking sheep from their owner's pasture to his master's without authority of the owner, defendant could not shield himself from liability to suit.

In Berry v. Vantries (1824) 12 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 89, it is said the law is well laid down in Mires v. Solebay (Eng.) supra, that trover cannot be maintained against a servant who has acted by his master's command, unless it were to do an apparent wrong. And that where the master's cause depends on a title, as where the command is given under the color of a writ, whether valid or not, a servant will be excused, for it would be unreasonable to require him to scruti-

3. Sale and proceeds turned over.

An agent who makes a sale of property to a third person at the command of his employer is liable in detinue, notwithstanding he acted merely as agent. Poole v. Adkisson (1833) 1 Dana (Ky.) 110. The court says the principal cannot delegate authority to another to do an act which he himself has no legal authority to do. An agent or servant is responsible for his own tortious act even though it was done in submission to the command or authority of his employer or master. The general rule is that he whose voluntary act, whether for himself or another, operates injuriously to the rights of a third person, shall be responsible to the person who may be injured by the wrongful act.

A sale of property by an agent which deprives the true owner of it subjects the agent to liability for trover, although he has turned the proceeds over to his principal. Gage v. Whittier (1845) 17 N. H. 320.

A servant who, in attempting to collect for his master a debt from a bankrupt, receives goods from the latter which he sells, and turns the money over to his principal, is personally liable in trover to the bankrupt's assignee. The court says that if the agent is a tort-feasor, no authority that he can derive from his master can excuse him from being liable in this action. Perkins v. Smith (1752) 1 Wils. 328, 95 Eng. Reprint, 644.

In Featherstonhaugh v. Johnston (1818) 8 Taunt. 237, 129 Eng. Reprint, 374, 2 J. B. Moore, 181, a consignee of goods, who sold them without notice of the claim of a third person, was held liable to him for the full value.

A bank which receives from a depositor money orders which he has embezzled, and cashes them, and places the proceeds to his credit, is liable for a conversion. Fine Art Soc. v. Union Bank (1886) L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. (Eng.) 705, 56 L. J. Q. B. N. S.

70, 55 L. T. N. S. 536, 35 Week. Rep. 114, 51 J. P. 69.

One who merely aids the wife of a bankrupt in pawning some plate, and immediately delivers the proceeds to her, is personally liable in trover for the conversion. Parker v. Godin (1728) 2 Strange, 814, 93 Eng. Reprint, 866.

An administrator who sells a chattel not owned by his intestate, and applies the proceeds to the payment of the debts of his intestate, is liable in trover to the true owner for its value. Newsom v. Newsom (1829) 1 Leigh (Va.) 94, 19 Am. Dec. 739.

That one is acting as agent when he takes possession of property of one person to secure the debt of another, and has it sold, is no defense in an action of trover against him. Kauffman v. Beasley (1881) 54 Tex. 563.

An agent who sells stolen property is liable to the true owner in trover if he refuses to disclose his principal. Thum v. Fish (1882) 12 W. N. C. (Pa.) 94.

One who enters another's close at the instance of a third person, and takes away and sells wood, accounting to such third person for the proceeds, is liable in trespass to the true owner, although he was ignorant of the fact that his employer did not own the wood. Higginson v. York (1809) 5 Mass. 341.

Where an agent of one cotenant sold the common property, the court said: "He must stand on the same ground with his principal. The sale was equally a wrong by both. . . . That the sale by the defendant below was such an assumption of authority over another's property as to amount to a conversion, there can be no doubt. If a party claim the property in the chattels as his own, or even assert the right of another over them, it is evidence of a conversion; and where a person's property is sold by one, whether for his own use or the use of another, it is a conversion, for it is a tortious act, and the gist of the action." Perminter v. Kelly (1851) 18 Ala. 716, 54 Am. Dec. 177.

Commercial agents of privateers were, in Hills v. Ross (1796) 3 Dall.

(U. S.) 331, 1 L. ed. 623, held liable to the owners of a prize which had been captured for the proceeds of sales which they, under direction of the privateers, had received and paid over to the privateers, with notice of the claim of the true owners.

4. Assisting conversion.

Where consignees of a ship indorsed a bill of lading so as to permit goods to be taken by one not their true owner they were held liable in damages, the court saying that the fact that they were the agents of the owners of the ship would not relieve them from such liability. Webb v. Winter (1851) 1 Cal. 417.

A butcher who cuts up game for officers who have wrongfully seized it, and distributes it for consumption under their direction, is liable in trover. McPheters v. Page (1891) 83 Me. 234, 23 Am. St. Rep. 772, 22 Atl. 101.

An attorney at law who assists in the conversion of property by being present at an unlawful sale and bidding thereon cannot escape responsibility on the ground that he acted merely as agent. Peckinbaugh v. Quillin (1882) 12 Neb. 586, 12 N. W. 104.

But where the manager of a business, under direction of his employer, utilizes funds of the employer, under the latter's direction, to pay general debts of the business instead of a note, the holder of which claimed a special interest in the property, it was held that the agent was not personally liable. Hodgson v. St. Paul Plow Co. (1899) 78 Minn. 172, 50 L.R.A. 644, 80 N. W. 956. The court says, in contemplation of law such a servant has no possession of or title to his master's property. A servant may be a joint trespasser or joint tort-feasor in assisting the master in taking the goods wrongfully, but the servant is not liable for merely holding and refusing to deliver up goods received by him from his master, and held by him under the master's orders. The decision in that case, however, would seem to have been put upon a ground not applicable to the facts involved.

The court says: "If, while the $2,000 was still on deposit, and Power, as such servant, had the custody of the certificate of deposit, plaintiff had brought its action against him alone to have a trust declared in its favor upon such certificate, we are clearly of the opinion that the action could not be maintained. It would be useless to bring such an action. The plow company might discharge Power the next day after the action was commenced. Thereafter his relations to the certificate of deposit would be the same as those of any other stranger, and the action must necessarily be abortive. If plaintiff could not maintain such an action against Power while the alleged trust fund was so on deposit, it cannot maintain this action now, after the trust fund has been distributed in payment of the debts of the plow company." But the agent was not in mere passive possession. Conceding that no action would lie against him, if such was the fact, it by no means follows that he would not be liable where he had assisted in actually disbursing the funds.

The Minnesota decisions hold that an agent or servant, who, acting for his master or principal, and by his direction, and without knowing of any wrong, or being guilty of gross neglect in not knowing of it, disposes of, or assists the master in disposing of, property which the latter has no right to dispose of, is not thereby rendered liable for a conversion of the property. Leuthold v. Fairchild (1886) 35 Minn. 100, 27 N. W. 503, 28 N. W. 218; McLennan v. Minneapolis & N. Elevator Co. (1894) 57 Minn. 317, 59 N. W. 628.

5. Mortgaged property.

That one assisting in wrongfully taking mortgaged property out of the possession of the mortgagor acted merely as agent for the mortgagee does not absolve him from liability in trover for the injury. Hall v. Garvin (1920) 113 S. C. 182, 102 S. E. 1.

An agent who sells mortgaged property for the mortgagor is liable to the mortgagee for the conversion. Sprights v. Hawley (1868) 39 N. Y.

441, 7 N. Y. Trans. App. 14, 100 Am. Dec. 452, affirming Dudley v. Hawley (1863) 40 Barb. 397, where the court said that the aiding in disposing of the property was an act of conversion in which defendant was a volunteer actor without excuse, and that the law holds him liable in such case, although he did not participate in the proceeds.

One aiding a mortgagor to secrete the mortgaged property so that the mortgage lien cannot be enforced is liable in trover. Flanders v. Colby (1853) 28 N. H. 34.

The owner of a grain elevator who receives mortgaged wheat from the mortgagor, mingles it with other wheat in its elevator, and ships it out of the country by orders of the mortgagor, is liable for conversion. Philip Best Brewing Co. v. Pillsbury & H. Elevator Co. (1888) 5 Dak. 62, 37 N. W. 763; Nichols S. & Co. v. Barnes (1882) 3 Dak. 148, 14 N. W. 110.

The shipping by a warehouseman with whom mortgaged cotton is stored, of the property at the instance of the mortgagor, renders the warehouseman liable in trover. Hudmon v. DuBose (1888) 85 Ala. 446, 2 L.R.A. 475, 5 So. 162. The exception with respect to restoration of the property to the bailor does not include a restoration of the bailor's dominion by an act the essential nature of which is in defiance of the true owner's title, or the probable consequences of which will be to put the property beyond his reach.

But in Travis v. Claiborne (1817) 5 Munf. (Va.) 435, it was held that an agent who assists in disposing of a mortgaged slave without notice of the mortgage is not personally liable for the conversion after he has turned the proceeds over to his principal. The ruling was put upon the ground that the recording of the mortgage did not charge the agent with notice, but only made it good against creditors and purchasers. Cabell, J., says: "The command of the principal will not justify the agent in committing a trespass, nor even an apparent wrong; in such a case, both the principal and agent are liable to the party injured. But where the conduct of the agent is within the limits of the authority confided to him, is fair, and unattended by circumstances sufficient to apprise him that he is acting wrongfully in relation to others,—or, in other words, where he does not commit an apparent wrong,—the principal, and not the agent, is responsible for the act." And Roane, J., after stating that a verdict against the agent would not bind the principal, said it would be an enormity if the agent should be condemned and imprisoned on the ground of invading the property right of a third person in a subject which, in a future action between the proper parties, may be found to have been the property of his principal, and not of the stranger. A construction of this sort would destroy and put an end to agencies of every kind. No man would become an agent without, at the same time, becoming an insurer.

6. Refusal to deliver property in agent's possession.

A mere bailee may be liable for conversion if he refuses to surrender the property to the true owner. Wilson v. Anderton (1830) 1 Barn. & Ad. 450, 109 Eng. Reprint, 855, 9 L. J. K. B. 48.

The general question of the liability of bailees in such cases is not within the scope of this annotation, and only two cases will be included in which the servant was treated as a bailee, and the general principles applicable in case of servants applied.

Where one in whose custody property wrongfully seized under execution is placed, with an offer of indemnity, by the execution creditor, refuses to give it up, he is liable for conversion. Catterall v. Kenyon (1842) 3 Q. B. 310, 114 Eng. Reprint, 525, 6 Jur. 507, 2 Gale & D. 545.

A clerk in a business, who takes on an account due his master a bill which was left with the debtor merely for discount, and refuses to surrender it on demand, may be liable for conversion. Cranch v. White (1835) 1 Bing. N. C. 414, 131 Eng. Reprint, 1176, 6 Car. & P. 767, 1 Scott, 314, 4 L. J. C. P. N. S. 113, 1 Hodges, 61.

In Lee v. Bayes (1856) 18 C. B. 609, 139 Eng. Reprint, 1508, 25 L. J. C. P.

N. S. 249, 2 Jur. N. S. 1093, where one in whose possession a stolen horse, purchased at public auction, had been placed for keeping, refused to deliver it to the owner upon demand, he was held to be guilty of conversion. The court says if the one who holds the goods chooses to set up the title of his bailor, and to rely on it, he is doing an act which is foreign to his employment or his duty. He asserts a title adverse to the real owner of the goods, and he is guilty of conversion.

A carrier's agent, who, by direction of his employer, refuses to deliver property to a consignee, is personally liable in trover. Elmore v. Brooks (1871) 6 Heisk. (Tenn.) 45. The court says if the agent elects to obey an order which was illegal, he cannot escape from the consequences by shifting the liability upon his principal.

An agent, who, having possession of a chattel belonging to a third person, by direction of his employer refuses to deliver it to the true owner, is liable in trover. Singer Mfg. Co. v. King (1884) 14 R. I. 511.

A manager of a factory who refuses to deliver a patented machine which had been set up in the factory, to the owner, was held personally liable in trover, the court saying that his possession, being an executive one, was different from that of an ordinary servant; that he is to judge of the propriety of every measure taken for the benefit of his employer, and that, as respects third persons, he acts at his peril. Berry v. Vantries (1824) 12 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 89.

An agent of one having no title to property cannot defeat an action for trover brought by the true owner, by setting up the claim of his principal. Doty v. Hawkins (1833) 6 N. H. 247, 25 Am. Dec. 459.

The agent of an express company, who has been instructed to hold goods transported by it until payment of certain charges thereon, cannot defeat an action of replevin on the ground of his agency, where the demand is too large and the proper charge is tendered, although he may be liable to the company in case he surrenders the property for less than the sum demanded by it. Eveleth v. Blossom (1867) 54 Me. 447, 92 Am. Dec. 555.

In Prince v. Puckett (1848) 12 Ala. 832, which was trespass against a warehouseman with whom a sheriff had stored goods seized under a writ against a nonowner, and who refused to deliver them to the true owner on request, the court said the remedy was trover or detinue.

An overseer may be liable in trover for slaves in his possession. Porter v. Thomas (1857) 23 Ga. 467. The court says a servant may be charged in trover though the conversion be done by him, however innocently, for the benefit of his master; and it is immaterial whether he had his master's authority or not.

To raise the question discussed in this annotation there must be an actual conversion or wrongful act on the part of the servant; and therefore, a distinction must be kept in mind between cases of conversion and cases like Alexander v. Southey (1821) 5 Barn. & Ald. 247, 106 Eng. Reprint, 1183, 24 Revised Rep. 348, where the agent of an insurance company, who had salvaged goods in the company's warehouse, refused to deliver them without an order from the insurers, and it was held not to be a conversion.

The manager of a storage warehouse who merely refuses to select goods of a patron which are not covered by a chattel mortgage when the mortgagee directs those covered to be retained does not become liable for conversion, the court designating the act as being mere nonfeasance. Economy Furniture Co. v. Chapman (1894) 54 Ill. App. 122.

There are cases at variance with the rule laid down in this subdivision which cannot, on their facts, be harmonized with it.

Thus, where plaintiff bought goods in England through an agent of the seller in this country, and, upon the goods arriving here, the agent refused to deliver them, the court held that the remedy was solely against the principal, the merchant in England. Bradford v. Eastburn (1808) 2 Wash. C. C. 219, Fed. Cas. No. 1,767. It was difficult to support that ruling in principle. If the title had passed to the plaintiff, so that the property was in him, why could he not have had a remedy against the one who withheld the property from him, even though that person was acting as agent for another?

A servant is not liable in replevin merely because he refuses to deliver property which his master had placed in his custody, to a third person, without direction from the master. Mount v. Derick (1843) 5 Hill (N. Y.) 456; Goodwin v. Wertheimer (1885) 99 N. Y. 153, 1 N. E. 404.

Where personal property is left with an employer to assist in performance of a contract with the owner, the servant of the employer is not liable in replevin for refusal, at the employer's command, to surrender the property to the owner. Hensley v. Howland (1895) 10 Misc. 756, 31 N. Y. Supp. 823. The court says it is true that a wrongdoer may not plead agency for another in extenuation of his wrongdoing; yet, on the other hand, a servant is not to be made liable as for a conversion of chattels of which he has the custody at the hands of his employer, and which he refuses to surrender at the demand of a stranger, even though he may have good reason to believe that the stranger has good title to the property.

Replevin will not lie against a freight agent for refusal to deliver property until a claim for freight is paid. McDougall v. Travis (1881) 24 Hun (N. Y.) 590. The court says: "As it was not in the defendant's possession, it could not be rightfully taken by replevin against him. For instance, if one were in possession of furniture in one's own house, a person claiming it could not maintain replevin against the servant who should refuse to deliver it on demand. Replevin is to be brought against the person in possession, not against one who is the mere servant of the possessor. None of the cases cited by the plaintiff are in conflict with this rule. The plaintiff argues that whoever does the wrong is liable. He does the wrong who, being in possession wrongfully, refuses to surrender. He does not do the wrong who is not in possession. And it is not every exercise of physical power over the thing in question which constitutes possession."

Colvin v. Holbrook (1848) 2 N. Y. 126, was an action against a deputy sheriff for refusal to pay money over to plaintiff. Plaintiff insisted that he was a mere agent of the sheriff, and that his liability was to be considered from that point of view. The court said that this was less favorable to defendant, but proceeded to consider the case according to plaintiff's contention. It said: "The rule, it is believed, is universal, that a known agent is not responsible to third persons for acts done by him in pursuance of an authority rightfully conferred upon him. The very notion of an agency proceeds upon the supposition that what a man may lawfully do by a substitute, when performed, is done by himself; and the individuality of the agent so far is merged in that of the principal. It is also settled, if anything can be established by authority, that an agent is not liable to third persons for an omission or neglect of duty in the matter of his agency, but that the principal is alone responsible." The court, however, said that the plaintiff makes title, if he has any, through the official acts of the deputy, and is thus compelled to recognize the right of the sheriff to receive the deposit, and also the duty of the deputy to pay it over to him. It thus appears that the deputy was acting in the strict line of his duty, and was under no obligation to plaintiff, and therefore there was no wrong for which an action would lie against him.

7. Form of action.

In most of the cases cited in the preceding subdivisions, the action in which relief was sought was trover or replevin. In some cases in which money alone was involved in the transaction, the form of the action was for money had and received. The liability of the agent for a conversion is, of course, founded on a wrongful act for which trover is the proper form of remedy. Cyc. (vol. 27, p. 849) says that an action for money had and received is an equitable one in which plaintiff waives all torts, trespasses, and damage. Under these circumstances, it is quite probable that if the money has been turned over to the principal, money had and received is not a proper form of action. But it has been held that an action for money had and received lies against an agent who has collected insurance money for his principal upon a loss for which the insurer was not liable, if he has merely credited it to the principal in his accounts, without having actually paid it over. The case was treated, however, as merely one of mistake, not of wrongdoing on the part of the agent. But the court asks, Is it conscionable that the agent should keep money which he has got by the misrepresentations of his principal? Buller v. Harrison (1777) Cowp. pt. 2, p. 566, 98 Eng. Reprint, 1243.

But an agent who collects for his principal rents, the liability for which is disputed, is not personally liable to the tenant for money had and received after he has turned it over to his principal. Sadler v. Evans (1766) 4 Burr. 1984, 98 Eng. Reprint, 34. The court thought that the principles upon which the action for money had and received was founded did not apply to the case. The defense in such action is an equity, which will rebut the action. The money was paid to a known agent. He was liable to his principal for it, and in such cases the action ought to be brought against the principal except in special cases, as under notice or mala fides.

So, the mere fact that an agent of one partner in a stagecoach sends to another partner less than his share of the profits does not render him liable to such partner in an action for money had and received, although the agent acknowledges that his employer had placed the full amount in his hands to be forwarded, where there is nothing to show that the employer may not have countermanded the payment before it was sent. Howell v. Batt (1833) 2 Nev. & M. 381, 5 Barn.

& Ad. 504, 110 Eng. Reprint, 877, 3 L. J. K. B. N. S. 49.

8. Liability of broker or sales agent.

a. In general.

A broker or sales agent who sells property for one who is not the owner is liable to the true owner as for a conversion.

A factor who sells property of one person under authority from another cannot avoid liability in trover on the ground of his agency. Arkansas City Bank v. Cassidy (1896) 71 Mo. App. 186.

Brokers who sell cattle on the market for slaughter and consumption, and turn the proceeds over to their employer, are liable in trover to the true owner for their value. LaFayette County Bank v. Metcalf (1890) 40 Mo. App. 494.

Brokers to whom cotton is shipped for sale are liable to the true owner after receiving notice of his claim and demand for the proceeds of the sale, if they subsequently turn the proceeds over to their correspondent. Ledoux v. Anderson and Ledoux v. Cooper (La.) supra.

A bank which, as agent of a cotton buyer, sells cotton which the latter has not paid for, and turns the proceeds over to him, whereby the true owner loses the price, is liable for the conversion. National Bank v. Piland (1918) 22 Ga. App. 471, 96 S. E. 341.

In Cerkel v. Waterman (1883) 63 Cal. 34, the court, without discussion, held commission merchants liable for selling wheat as that of their principal, and turning the proceeds over to him, when the wheat in fact belonged to another.

But where a dairyman sent a cow to a cattle market, and directed the cattle salesman into whose pen it was put, to sell it, the mere fact that the salesman received an offer for it which, when communicated to the dairyman, was accepted by him, and paid the proceeds through his bank account to the dairyman, does not render the salesman liable for a conversion. Turner v. Hockey (Eng.) supra. The court applied the rule of the conduit pipe, saying that where the salesman merely acts as a conduit by which title is passed from seller to buyer without himself interfering with it, he is not personally liable.

The assumption and exercise of dominion over a chattel inconsistent with the title and general dominion which the true owner has in and over it is a conversion, and it is immaterial whether the act done be for the use of defendant himself, or of a third person. And therefore it was held, by a divided court, in Fowler v. Hollins (1872) L. R. 7 Q. B. (Eng.) 628, 41 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 277, 27 L. T. N. S. 168, 20 Week. Rep. 868, affirming a judgment of the Queen's bench, that a broker who sells cotton the title to which was fraudulently obtained by his employer is personally liable for the conversion in case he sells it to a stranger. The case was, however, affirmed by the House of Lords in (1876) L. R. 7 H. L. 757, 44 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 169, 33 L. T. N. S. 73, but it seemed to be the opinion of some of the judges, at least, that since brokers act merely as conduits to pass the title from seller to buyer without themselves interfering with the goods, there would be no liability.

So, commission merchants selling mortgaged property are liable in trover to the mortgagee. Brown v. James H. Campbell Co. (1890) 44 Kan. 237, 21 Am. St. Rep. 274, 24 Pac. 492.

A commission merchant who sells mortgaged property for the mortgagor when the mortgage is on record is liable in trover, although he immediately turns over the proceeds to his employer. Marks v. Robinson (1886) 82 Ala. 69, 2 So. 292.

A factor who sells cotton with notice of a lien upon it, thereby aiding in the destruction of the lien, is liable for conversion. Merchants & P. Bank v. Meyer (1892) 56 Ark. 499, 20 S. W. 406.

In an early Tennessee case it was held that factors who sell property for an agent in possession, and turn the money over to him, are liable in trover to the true owner. Taylor v. Pope (1867) 5 Coldw. (Tenn.) 413.

But that case was overruled in Roach v. Turk (1872) 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 708, 24 Am. Rep. 360, where it was held that commission merchants are not liable to the true owner for selling property for one wrongfully claiming it, and turning the proceeds over to him, without notice of the rights of the owner. The court says: "If the plaintiffs recover in this case, it must be for a conversion of the cotton by parties who had no knowledge of their title or claim, and who never for a moment claimed adversely to their rights. It is equally clear that we must force upon the defendants the position of antagonism to the rights of the plaintiffs, contrary to the facts of the case, and assume that they are guilty of a tortious conversion when it is evident that, had they known of the plaintiffs' title, they would most readily have yielded to it. Can such a liability be based on sound principle? We think not. . . . It is clear, beyond question, that there can be no conversion in a case like this without an adverse holding or claim as against the title of the true owner (which necessarily involves a knowledge of such title); and until such knowledge is fixed on the party in possession, or who has been in the possession, of the property, he cannot, in the language of Mr. Greenleaf, be said to 'exercise dominion over it in exclusion or in defiance of the plaintiff's right, or to withhold the possession from the plaintiff under a claim of title inconsistent with the title of the true owner.' . . . In order to make the factor liable, a demand must be made while the property or its proceeds are in his hands; or notice of the owner's title, or the want of title on the part of the party placing it in his hands, must be brought home to him, and thus fix upon him a wrongful assertion of dominion and control over another's property, and in defiance of his right."

b. Stolen property.

A broker selling stolen property is liable in trover to the true owner. Bercich v. Marye (1874) 9 Nev. 312, 13 Mor. Min. Rep. 544; Thompson v. Allen (1898) 76 Mo. App. 418; Laughlin v. Barnes (1898) 76 Mo. App. 258; Fort v. Wells (1895) 14 Ind. App. 531, 56 Am. St. Rep. 316, 43 N. E. 155.

An agent who sells stolen bonds for his principal, and delivers to him the proceeds, is liable in trover for their conversion. Kimball v. Billings (1867) 55 Me. 147, 92 Am. Dec. 581. The court says the principal could not secure to the agent immunity for an act which the principal could not do himself.

A factor who sells stolen property for the thief, and refuses information to enable the true owner to trace the property, is liable in trover. Cassidy Bros. & Co. v. Elk Grove Land & Cattle Co. (1894) 58 Ill. App. 39. The court says that, as against the view of liability, it is argued: "That such a rule imperils great commercial interests, and that those great agencies by which property is necessarily transferred from seller to buyer should not be required to investigate title to the property handled at the peril of liability for its value. There is much force in this contention, which has been exhaustively discussed in the cases referred to, and yet, in principle, it is difficult to see why, if the innocent purchaser of stolen property is liable, the agent, who should know better than he the title, and who induced the purchase, should not also be equally liable. If the purchaser is guilty of a tort, the one who suggests it and aids in its commission, according to the fundamental rules of law, is equally guilty. There are no agencies in torts."

A broker who sells stolen securities and turns the proceeds over to the thief is liable to the true owner for their value. Swim v. Wilson (1891) 90 Cal. 126, 13 L.R.A. 605, 25 Am. St. Rep. 110, 27 Pac. 33. The court says it is clear that the thief did not acquire a right to the stock, and it is equally clear that defendant, acting for him as his agent, did not have a greater right, and his act was, therefore, wholly unauthorized, and, in law, a conversion of the property. "To hold the defendant liable, under the circumstances disclosed here, may seem, upon first impression, to be a hardship upon him. But it is a matter of everyday experience that one cannot always be perfectly secure from loss in his dealings with others, and the defendant here is only in the position of a person who has trusted to the honesty of another, and has been deceived. He undertook to act as agent for one who, it now appears, was a thief; and, relying on his representations, aided his principal to convert the plaintiff's property into money; and it is no greater hardship to require him to pay to the plaintiff its value than it would be to take the same away from the innocent vendee, who purchased and paid for it."

If one with whom a horse has been placed for sale refuses to deliver it to another, claiming that it had been stolen from him, he may be held liable for conversion. Lee v. Robinson (1856) 18 C. B. 599, 139 Eng. Reprint, 1504, 2 Jur. N. S. 1093, 25 L. J. C. P. N. S. 249.

In Alexander v. Swackhamer (1885) 105 Ind. 81, 55 Am. Rep. 180, 4 N. E. 433, 5 N. E. 908, which involved the liability of the ultimate purchaser of stolen property to the true owner, the court, in the course of the opinion, says that when the brokerage firm sold the property, received the money, and turned it over to the thief, this amounted to a conversion of the property for which the brokers were liable.

One who merely collects for a thief a government voucher, and turns the proceeds over to him, is liable for conversion to the true owner. Koch v. Branch (1869) 44 Mo. 542, 100 Am. Dec. 324. The court says public policy as well as private rights demand that the settled rule that no title shall pass through a thief shall not be relaxed, and those who buy it of him shall be compelled to give up the property unless they have converted it, when they shall be held for its value. Factors and agents also should be held to the same accountability. It is their duty to know for whom they act, and whether they can be saved harmless if their actions shall amount to a conversion of another's property.

But one who, as agent, sells coupons from stolen bonds and turns the proceeds over to his employer, is not liable in trover for conversion of the coupons. Spooner v. Holmes (1869) 102 Mass. 503, 3 Am. Rep. 491. The court held that the coupons were negotiable and subject to the same rules as bank bills or other negotiable instruments payable in money to bearer. The court concluded that neither taking the coupons by delivery, transferring them by delivery, nor paying over the proceeds to the employer, constitutes a conversion for which the broker could be held liable in an action of tort in the nature of trover.

The agent must, however, have received the coupons, and sold them without notice of the infirmity of his employer's title, and have acted in good faith, without gross negligence, as agent only, without receiving any benefit from the transaction.

B. Auctioneers.

a. In general.

An auctioneer who makes sale of property which does not belong to the one employing him, and passes the title to the purchaser, is personally liable to the true owner for the conversion.

Ireland.—Ganly v. Ledwidge (1876) Ir. Rep. 10 C. L. 33.

In Hills v. Snell (Mass.) supra, there is a dictum to the effect that an auctioneer or a broker who sells property for one who has no title, and pays over to him the proceeds with no knowledge of the defect of title or want of authority, is liable to the true owner for its conversion.

An auctioneer who, with notice, sells property of a third person at the instance of his client, is personally liable to the true owner. Hardacre v. Stewart (Eng.) supra. The court said that by his manner of conducting himself he made himself quasi principal. If a man sells property of others with full notice that he is doing wrong, and that he is disposing of that to which he has no title, he is liable to an action for money had and received.

In Adamson v. Jarvis (1827) 4 Bing. 66, 130 Eng. Reprint, 693, 5 L. J. C. P. 68, which was an action by an auctioneer for contribution from the one who delivered property to him for sale, it appeared that the auctioneer, relying on defendant's claim to title, had sold the property to a third person, and had been compelled to make restitution to the true owner.

In Farebrother v. Ansley (1808) 1 Campb. (Eng.) 343, where a judgment had been rendered against an auctioneer for selling property wrongfully seized by a sheriff, a recovery of indemnity which he sought from the sheriff was denied on the ground that there is no contribution between wrongdoers.

An auctioneer who has actual possession and makes delivery of goods sold for one person which are the property of another is liable to the latter for conversion. Consolidated Co. v. Curtis (Eng.) supra.

Where a mortgagee of some cabs procured a loan on them from an auctioneer, and then had the auctioneer sell them, after which the auctioneer delivered the proceeds to him over and above the loan, the auctioneer was held liable to the mortgagor. Cochran v. Rymill (1879) 40 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 744, 27 Week. Rep. 776. The court said that the case showed a clear dealing with the property, and an exercising of dominion over the chattels, and a delivery of them to the purchaser. In that case it is said that if a man goes into an auctioneer's yard, holding a horse by the bridle, and says: "I want to sell my horse; if you will find a purchaser I will pay a commission." And the auctioneer says: "Here is a man who wants to sell a horse; will anyone buy him?"—if he then and there finds him a purchaser and the seller himself hands over the horse, there will be no act on the part of the auctioneer which could render him liable for conversion. But in the case before the court there was a clear dealing with the property, and exercising dominion over the chattel, and a delivery of it by the defendant to another person, to do what he liked with it. The owner has a right to say: "You have undertaken to deal with my goods as though you had a right to sell them or deal with them; I am not going to take the trouble to trace each one of them, but I look to you for the value of them."

Where an auctioneer proceeds to sell goods as the property of a tenant after the landlord has levied a distress upon them, he is liable for a rescue. Iredale v. Kendall (1878) 40 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 362. The defense was that the defendant did not attach the goods, but merely received the bids on them, and the tenant delivered them to the purchaser; but the court said that the defendant enabled the tenant to dispose of the goods and assisted him in so doing. He knowingly and intentionally assisted in transferring the dominion to property in the goods to the purchaser, and was therefore liable.

But where horses were sold in the yard of an auctioneer by one who had already granted a bill of sale of them to a third person, the auctioneer merely taking a commission on the sale, it was held that he did not interfere with them in such a way as to be personally liable for the conversion. National Mercantile Bank v. Rymill (1881) 44 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 767.

In one English case it was held that where a person who has given a bill of sale of a cow takes it to an auctioneer for sale, the latter will not be liable for making the sale, where he is ignorant of the fact of the prior bill of sale. The court places this ruling upon the ground that he is a mere conduit pipe for the purpose of conveying the interest. Turner v. Hockey (1887) 56 L. J. Q. B. N. S. (Eng.) 301. But in Consolidated Co. v. Curtis [1892] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 502, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 325, 40 Week. Rep. 426, 56 J. P. 565, 25 Eng. Rul. Cas. 162, it is said that if delivery under the contract be assumed, that proposition is not law. It is in direct conflict with principle and with authority. The decision is, however, justified on the ground that in that case the auctioneer merely obtained an offer which he communicated to the seller, who accepted it, so that the auctioneer did no more than act as a mere intermediary in the transaction.

b. Stolen and mortgaged property.

The rule of liability on the part of the auctioneer applies even though the property has been stolen or is subject to mortgage, of which facts he is ignorant.

A salesmaster in a public market who sells a stolen cow and turns the proceeds over to the one offering it for sale is personally liable in trover to the true owner, although he did not know that it was stolen. Ganly v. Ledwidge (1876) Ir. L. Rep. 10 C. L. 33.

Where an auctioneer receives misappropriated goods into his custody, and, on selling them, hands them over to the purchasers with a view to passing the property to them, he is guilty of conversion. Barker v. Furlong [1891] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 172, 60 L. J. Ch.

N. S. 368, 64 L. T. N. S. 411, 39 Week. Rep. 621. The court says the general rule is that, where an agent takes part in transferring the property in a chattel, and it turns out that his principal has no title, his ignorance of this fact affords him no protection. And Turner v. Hockey (1887) 56 L. J. Q. B. N. S. (Eng.) 301, where, under the circumstances, the auctioneer was held not liable, was questioned.

The case of Hoffman v. Carow (1838) 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 21, where an auctioneer was held liable for selling stolen goods, was not decided strictly upon the question of the liability of an agent, but merely on the general question of the public policy with respect to dealing with stolen property. Senator Verplanck, in writing for affirmance on appeal in (1839) 22 Wend. 285, said: "The policy of our law is to make every man look to the character of those with whom he deals, and who are responsible for the title of property in the articles bought and sold. If he does not do this, he must take the consequent risk. The same considerations of public policy apply to him who sells as the agent of another, as to him who buys; both of them are to look to the character of the person with whom they deal. If in this they are negligent, or have been deceived, they must take the consequences whenever their rights come into conflict with those of any innocent sufferer by the act of the same guilty third party. Accordingly, the doctrine of our decisions is, that the original and true owner of movable property, who has not by his own act or assent given a color of title or an apparent right of sale to another, may recover the value of those goods from anyone having them in possession and refusing to deliver them up, or who has applied them to his own use, or has in any other way converted them; i. e., has changed the substance of the things in question, their character, use, or ownership, to the injury of the real owner." But he further said: "In the argument before us, it was very strongly urged that a rule of law thus charging mere agents would work great public injury as well as private injustice, as it would extend to common carriers, shipmasters, and others, through whose hands goods feloniously or wrongfully obtained might pass. There may be some cases going to that length, but they are not, in my judgment, within the principle or the policy of the rule, nor are they included in the older decisions. . . .

I cannot think the law charges one who had accidentally a temporary possession of goods without claim of property, and with which he has parted before demand. It requires a wrongful taking or conversion of the thing itself to make the transaction tortious. The auctioneers who had sold the goods now in question have made such an unauthorized conversion, and must be answerable for the value. In this instance the rule falls hardly upon innocent and honorable men; but, looking to general considerations of legal policy, I cannot conceive a more salutary regulation than that of obliging the auctioneer to look well to the title of the goods which he sells, and, in case of feloniously obtained property, to hold him responsible to the buyer or the true owner, as the one or the other may happen to suffer."

In an early California case it was held that an auctioneer who sells stolen goods and turns the proceeds over to the thief is liable in trover for the conversion. Rogers v. Huie (1851) 1 Cal. 429, 54 Am. Dec. 300. But a different conclusion was reached in that case, apparently, on a rehearing. Rogers v. Huie (1852) 2 Cal. 571, 56 Am. Dec. 363. The court holds that there was no conversion by the auctioneer, there being no appropriation of the goods to his own use, or wrongful intent, which was held to be necessary to a conversion. It says he was a mere agent for the transmission of the property from one hand to another. Each act committed in connection with the goods was not his act, but that of his employer. A case relied on for authority held that one acting in the usual course of trade is an exception to the general rule. The distinction between that case and that of a servant is that here is a public employment. In Swim v. Wilson

So, an auctioneer is liable for selling mortgaged goods at the instance of the mortgagor. Moloughney v. Hegeman (1880) 9 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 403.

Although he had no personal knowledge of the mortgage. Coles v. Clark (1849) 3 Cush. (Mass.) 399.

An auctioneer who persists in selling under a mortgage given to delay creditors notwithstanding demand by a representative of the insolvent mortgagor is liable for the conversion. Milliken v. Hathaway (1888) 148 Mass. 69, 1 L.R.A. 510, 19 N. E. 16.

But in Frizzell v. Rundle (1890) 88 Tenn. 396, 17 Am. St. Rep. 908, 12 S. W. 918, it was held that an auctioneer is not liable for selling for a mortgagor the mortgaged property, and turning over the proceeds to him, so as to deprive the mortgagee of his lien. This ruling is put upon the ground that the constructive notice of the record did not bind the auctioneer, who himself asserted no title to the property.

And somewhat in accord with that doctrine is the unreported case of Jacobs, cited in Ashe v. Livingston (1797) 2 S. C. L. (2 Bay) 84, where it was held that an auctioneer is not liable to an action for money had and received in case he turns over to his employer the money received from the sale, although the property sold belonged to a third person. There is, however, some ground for distinction between liability in the two forms of action. If the agent is regarded as merely having received the money, he must have received it as a mere conduit for its transmission; whereas if the effort is made to hold the agent liable for dealing with the property, he may be regarded as assisting in the conversion, and so be liable in trover, as the cases usually regard him.

k. Forcible entry and detainer.

One cannot defeat an action for forcible entry and detainer on the ground that he was acting as agent. Luling v. Sheppard (1896) 112 Ala.

538, 21 So. 352. The court says the act is a tort, and no principle of law is more general and better settled than that one guilty of a tort cannot justify on the ground that he was acting in the capacity of an agent, and not on his personal responsibility. It has never been questioned that an agent is liable for his actual torts.

IV. Misfeasance.

a. In general.

As has been seen from the foregoing subdivisions of this annotation, there is very little difficulty in determining what is an act of malfeasance, and the liability of the servant or agent for committing it; but when it comes to distinguishing between misfeasance and nonfeasance, and laying down any rule which will be of practical value, very great difficulty is encountered. As a general proposition for classification purposes, the acts of misfeasance are merely acts of negligence, i. e., the misperformance of acts which there is a perfect right to perform in a proper way. Very slight consideration will show that the true distinction between misfeasance and nonfeasance is not merely between performance and omission to perform. For example, a motorman in charge of a street car injures a pedestrian at a highway crossing. It cannot be true that he would be liable if the injury were caused by driving the car too fast, but would not be liable if it were caused by his failure to stop the car in time to avoid the injury. Application of the formula that the servant was liable for misfeasance, but not for nonfeasance, would render the conductor of a train liable in case he injured a drunken passenger by negligently removing him from the car, but not liable for injury by the drunken person to a fellow passenger, resulting from the conductor's failure to remove or restrain him. In many of the cases where the courts have attempted to apply the formula they have held acts of omission to be misfeasance. These cases will be considered in subdivision V. of this annotation. It may be stated as a general rule, however, that the servant or agent is liable for any injuries caused to third persons by active, as distinguished from passive, negligence on his part. This does not mean that there may not be liability for passive negligence, but that question will be considered in later subdivisions.

One employed to make excavations for the foundation of a building may be personally liable for so negligently performing the work that an adjoining building is undermined and caused to fall. Block v. Haseltine (1891) 3 Ind. App. 491, 29 N. E. 937.

Where one employed to build a trapdoor does so so negligently that another falls into it and is injured, the servant will be personally liable therefor. Harriman v. Stowe (1874) 57 Mo. 93. The court, after setting out, with apparent approval, Judge Story's theory of nonliability for nonfeasance, says the agent undertook and proceeded to build the trapdoor, but did it so negligently as to cause the injury. Under such circumstances, the action would be maintained against the agent.

Where the employee of a corporation which had undertaken to shoot an oil well for plaintiff so negligently performed the work that the well was destroyed, the court said the fault charged upon the employee was not an omission to perform a duty of his master toward the injured third person, or mere negligence, but was negligent conduct in the doing of his own duty as an employee, for the negligent and unskilful doing of which both the employer and employee are liable. Indiana Nitroglycerin & Torpedo Co. v. Lippincott Glass Co. (1904) — Ind. App. —, 72 N. E. 183.

An agent who constructs an improperly covered excavation in a public street is personally liable for injury to a pedestrian who falls into it. Burke v. Werlein (1918) 143 La. 788, 79 So. 405.

An agent of a railroad, who, in changing the course of a highway, constructs a wire fence across the abandoned road, without marks, is personally liable for injury to one colliding with it in the dark, in attempting to use the highway. Blue v. Briggs (1894) 12 Ind. App. 105, 39 N. E. 885. The court says he who commits an unlawful act or act of misfeasance and positive and aggressive wrong to another cannot escape liability therefor, upon the ground of his being an agent for another.

One who superintends the making of a connection with a sewer which is done so carelessly as to cause the water from the sewer to flow into and injure the property of a stranger is personally liable for the injury. Hawkesworth v. Thompson (1867) 98 Mass. 77, 93 Am. Dec. 137.

Where the managing agent of a block of tenements ordered the water turned on when a faucet in one of the rooms was open and the waste pipe clogged, so that the water overflowed, to the injury of occupants of a lower room, he was held to be personally liable. Bell v. Josselyn (1855) 3 Gray (Mass.) 309, 63 Am. Dec. 741. The court says the injury was caused not by his nonfeasance but by his misfeasance. His omission to examine the pipes in the house before the water was turned on was nonfeasance; but if he had not caused the water to be turned on, that nonfeasance would have caused no injury. As the facts are, the nonfeasance caused the acts done to be a misfeasance. There was no less a misfeasance by reason of it being preceded by a nonfeasance.

A committee of a religious society, authorized to secure the painting of the interior of the church, will be personally liable in case they furnish to the painters a staging which is insufficient, and causes their injury. Mulchey v. Methodist Religious Soc. (1878) 125 Mass. 487.

Employees of one who has contracted to move a building are liable to the owner for their negligence, which injures the building. Bickford v. Richards (1891) 154 Mass. 163, 26 Am. St. Rep. 224, 27 N. E. 1014. The right of action depends upon the fact that they have wrongfully or negligently done something to the property which has injured it. The gist of the action is the breach by defendants of the duty which they owed to the owner not to injure his property by any wrongful or negligent act of theirs.

A servant of the lessee of a horse, who drives it so immoderately that it dies, is personally liable to the owner for its value. Banfield v. Whipple (1865) 10 Allen (Mass.) 30, 87 Am. Dec. 618.

The abuse and injury of a team by overdriving and heating by the agent to whom it was committed by one who had hired it is a positive damage, and not a mere omission of duty, and the agent is therefore liable for the injury done. Buis v. Cook (1875) 60 Mo. 391.

An agent who kills a mare in negligently roping her for the purpose of breaking her, which his employer has been engaged to do, cannot escape liability on the ground that he was merely an agent. Miller v. Staples (1893) 3 Colo. App. 93, 32 Pac. 81. The court says: "The frequent attempts of agents to escape responsibility for their negligent acts by shielding themselves behind the principal whose business they may be transacting when the injury is done has led to many discussions as to the proper limits of the defenses based on the employment. The rule is pretty well settled that while both principal and agent are liable for the injuries which may come to a third person from the agent's misfeasance or malfeasance, the injured party may elect to sue one or the other, or both, at his pleasure. Doubtless the primary responsibility rests on the principal as to the agent's misfeasance, and he should be called upon to answer for the damages resulting from the negligent performance of his agent; yet the servant or agent may likewise be sued, and he cannot escape by asserting that what he did was done while working for his master."

An agent for the sale of threshing machines, who takes control of the testing of a new machine which has been sold and has undertaken a job, is personally liable for negligent operation of the engine, so that it sets fire to the grain stacks. Cronkhite v. Whalen (1920) 111 Wash. 31, 189 Pac. 94.

A servant in charge of his master's team is liable for wilfulness or negligence in causing injury to a person who attempts to board the wagon for a ride. Wright v. Wilcox (1838) 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 343, 32 Am. Dec. 507.

A section boss of a railroad is personally liable for injuries to a horse which he negligently drives over a stock gap. Louisville & N. R. Co. v.

In Parsons v. Winchell (1850) 5 Cush. (Mass.) 592, 52 Am. Dec. 745, where the question was whether or not a joint action would lie against master and servant for injuries done by the negligent driving of the master's horses, the court says that the servant is answerable to the person injured by his acts done as servant.

In holding that no action lay against an intermediate servant for the negligence of those under him, the court said the action must either be brought against the servant committing the injury, or against the master. Stone v. Cartwright (1795) 6 T. R. 411, 101 Eng. Reprint, 622, 9 Mor. Min. Rep. 672.

In Standard Oil Co. v. Anderson (1909) 212 U. S. 215, 53 L. ed. 480, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 252, which was an action to recover for personal injuries caused by the negligent operation of a winch by a servant in charge of it, and the question in the case was who was the master at the time of the injury, within the rule that the master was liable for the negligent act of his servant, the court observed, by way of dictum, that the servant himself is, of course, liable for the consequences of his own carelessness.

In 1 Bl. Com. 431, where the author is considering the liability of the master for negligence of his servant, he states that if a smith's servant lames a horse while shoeing him, an action lies against the master, and not against the servant. No authority is cited for this proposition, and it is questioned in the notes in Lewis's edition of that work.

A railroad engineer is personally liable for injury to one at a highway crossing by his failure to give the required signals when approaching it with his engine. Southern R. Co. v. Grizzle (1906) 124 Ga. 735, 110 Am. St. Rep. 191, 53 S. E. 244. The court says: "An agent is not ordinarily liable to third persons for mere nonfeasance. . . . An agent is, however, liable to third persons for misfeasance. Nonfeasance is the total omission or failure of the agent to enter upon the performance of some distinct duty or undertaking which he has agreed with his principal to do. Misfeasance means the improper doing of an act which the agent might lawfully do; or, in other words, it is the performing of his duty to his principal in such a manner as to infringe upon the rights and privileges of third persons. Where an agent fails to use reasonable care or diligence in the performance of his duty, he will be personally responsible to a third person who is injured by such misfeasance. The agent's liability in such cases is not based upon the ground of his agency, but upon the ground that he is a wrongdoer, and as such he is responsible for any injury he may cause. When once he enters upon the performance of his contract with his principal, and, in doing so, omits, or fails to take reasonable care in the commission of, some act which he should do in its performance, whereby some third person is injured, he is responsible therefor to the same extent as if he had committed the wrong in his own behalf. . . . Misfeasance may involve also to some extent the idea of not doing; as where an agent engaged in the performance of his undertaking does not do something which it is his duty to do under the circumstances, or does not take that precaution or does not exercise that care which a due regard to the rights of others requires. All this is not doing, but it is not the not doing of that which is imposed upon the agent merely by virtue of his relation, but of that which is imposed upon him by law as a responsible individual in common with all other members of society. It is the same not doing which constitutes actionable negligence in any relation. . . . In the present case the failure of the engineer to comply with the requirements of the Blow-post Law was not doing, but the running of the train over the crossing at a high rate of speed without giving the signals required by law was a positive act, and the violation of a duty which both the engineer and the railroad company owed to travelers upon the highway. The engineer having once undertaken, in behalf of the principal, to run the train, it was incumbent upon him to run it in the manner prescribed by law; and a failure to comply with the law, although it involved an act of omission, was not an act of mere nonfeasance, but was an act of misfeasance."

Those in charge of a locomotive are personally liable for their own negligence in injuring a traveler at a highway crossing. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Coley (1905) 121 Ky. 385, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 370, 89 S. W. 234; Zibbell v. Southern P. Co. (1911) 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513; Edwards v. Great Northern R. Co. (1919) 42 N. D. 154, 171 N. W. 873; Able v. Southern R. Co. (1906) 73 S. C. 173, 52 S. E. 962, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 549.

Or for killing him. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Dixon (1898) 104 Ky. 608, 47 S. W. 615.

The engineer of a train which kills a person at a highway crossing cannot defeat an action for damages on the theory that he was merely agent for the railroad company. Hough v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1914) 169 Iowa, 224, 149 N. W. 885.

Where plaintiff was injured by the negligence of a railroad engineer in running his engine over a highway crossing, the court said his liability is made to appear when the evidence shows that he failed to use reasonable care and diligence in the performance of his duty, and such misfeasance resulted in injury to a third person. When an agent once enters upon the performance of his contract with his principal, and in doing so omits, or fails to take reasonable care in the commission of, some act which he should do in its performance, whereby third persons are injured, he is responsible therefor to the same extent as if he had committed the wrong in his own behalf. Southern R. Co. v. Reynolds (1906) 126 Ga. 657, 55 S. E. 1039.

In Ellis v. Southern R. Co. (1905) 72 S. C. 465, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 378, 52 S. E. 228, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 541, one attempting to flag a train at night was killed by the negligence of the engineer in running the train at high speed past the stopping place after signaling that the train would stop. The court says the question is whether or not an agent is personally liable to a third person for nonfeasance causing injury. And after reviewing authorities, the court concludes that the true rule is that the servant is personally liable to third persons when his wrongful act is the direct and proximate cause of the injury, whether such wrongful act be one of nonfeasance or misfeasance.

A fireman on a locomotive is personally liable for the death of a pedestrian attempting to cross the track at a much-used crossing near the railroad station, where he failed to keep a lookout as the train started up to leave the station after discharging passengers. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Banks (1911) 144 Ky. 137, 137 S. W. 1066, affirmed in (1914) 232 U. S. 146, 58 L. ed. 544, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 278.

Where a cow was killed by a train, and the action was against the engineer and fireman, the court held that if the railroad company would be liable, defendants were liable. Suydam v. Moore (1850) 8 Barb. (N. Y.) 358. The inclination of the court seems to be to hold the defendants liable for the negligence of their employer because the cow was upon the track on account of absence of fences and cattle guards which the company was under obligation to erect. The court says defendants were not bound to remain in the employ of the company after it had neglected to erect the fences. Such act greatly increased their responsibility. If they continued to remain at their respective posts they had no just cause for complaining if the public held them accountable for the consequences resulting from this omission of their employers.

Under the Georgia Code, an agent is personally liable for his own torts; and therefore an agent in charge of an automobile, who negligently runs down a pedestrian on the highway, cannot avoid liability merely on the theory that he is an agent. Wadley

v. Dooly (1912) 138 Ga. 275, 75 S. E. 153.

Where a servant, by command of his master, takes ungovernable horses to a place much frequented by people, to break them, he will be personally liable for injury done by their running down a stranger. Michael v. Alestree (1676) 2 Lev. 172, 83 Eng. Reprint, 504, 3 Keble, 650, 84 Eng. Reprint, 932.

In Quarman v. Burnett (1840) 6 Mees & W. 499, 151 Eng. Reprint, 509, 9 L. J. Exch. N. S. 308, 4 Jur. 969, where the question was whether the owner of a team, a driver, or a hirer was liable for the driver's negligence in leaving the team unattended, so that it ran away, to the injury of plaintiff, the court said the question is whether anyone but the coachman is liable to the person injured; for the coachman certainly is.

In an action for injury caused by the driving of a team along a highway against the horse on which plaintiff was riding, the question involved was whether trespass was the proper form of action. The court said that unless the master expressly commanded the servant to commit the trespass, the servant alone is liable in this form of action. Tuller v. Voght (1851) 13 Ill. 277.

An agent of the owner of a horse which is dangerous to be used on the public streets is liable for injuries to a traveler by the running away of the horse while it is being used in such place under his direction. Corliss v. Keown (1910) 207 Mass. 149, 93 N. E. 143.

In Phelps v. Wait (1864) 30 N. Y. 78, where the agent in charge of a team drove over plaintiff, to his injury, the question was whether a joint action would lie against him and the owner of the team; and there seems to be no question that the driver was liable to the person injured.

And the principle of that case was followed in Montfort v. Hughes (1854) 8 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 591.

c. Agents of carriers.

A servant in charge of a steamboat is personally liable for injury to a passenger through negligent operation of the boat. Whalen v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1906) 73 N. J. L. 192, 63 Atl. 993.

In Le Blanc v. Sweet (1902) 107 La. 355, 90 Am. St. Rep. 303, 31 So. 766, where a passenger on a boat was drowned through the negligence of the captain in handling the boat, while she was attempting to disembark, the headnote says that since the master was acting in a representative capacity, the owner alone was liable, and the opinion simply states that, under the circumstances, no reason was found for holding the captain liable.

In Whitmore v. Waterhouse (1830) 4 Car. & P. (Eng.) 382, which was an action against the proprietors of a coach and the servant in charge of it, for injury to a passenger by the latter's negligence, a verdict went for defendants for lack of proof; but the court was of opinion that the servant would be personally liable to the passenger for the injury.

In Williams v. Cranston (1816) 2 Starkie (Eng.) 82, a watch which had been given to the driver of a stage-coach for delivery to the owner was lost and suit was brought against the driver. The court said there was nothing to indicate that he received the parcel otherwise than in the character of servant, and that the loss appears to have resulted from the negligence of the master through the medium of his servants, so that there could be no recovery against the servant.

A railroad company which, as agent for a sleeping car company, sells an intending passenger a sleeping car ticket for a car which does not follow the route called for by the transportation ticket, cannot avoid liability for expulsion of the passenger from the car on the theory that it is a mere agent. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Price (1911) 125 Tenn. 646, 148 S. W. 219. The court says the acts were those of misfeasance and negligence for which the agent is liable.

So E. H. EMERY & Co. v. AMERICAN REFRIGERATOR TRANSIT CO. (reported herewith) ante, 86, holds that a refrigerating company which contracts with a railroad company to ice fruit cars is liable to a shipper for injury to his fruit by the negligent manner in which it performs its agreement.

The negligence of a railroad company in misbilling freight so that it is delayed on the road is an act of misfeasance, and not of nonfeasance, and therefore, it is liable notwithstanding it was acting merely as agent for another road. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Foulks (1901) 191 Ill. 57, 60 N. E. 890.

A station agent of a railroad company who refuses to route cattle over the shorter route to destination, and sends them over a longer route, is personally liable for an injury thereby caused to them. Eastin v. Texas & P. R. Co. (1906) 99 Tex. 654, 92 S. W. 838. The court says that where an agent is empowered to perform a duty for his principal and neglects to perform it, and damage accrues from the failure, the agent is not responsible. But where the agent, acting for his principal, does a wrongful act and damage results to a third person, he is responsible. The same ruling was made on second appeal (1907) 100 Tex. 556, 102 S. W. 105, which was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in (1909) 214 U. S. 153, 53 L. ed. 946, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564.

Where goods were delivered to a ship for transportation, and lost before the ship left port, an action was brought against the master, and it was objected that he was but a servant to the owners, but Lord Hale held that the law takes notice of him that he is more than a servant. He is rather an officer than a servant, and is chargeable for the loss. Morse v. Slue (1673) 1 Vent. 238, 1 Mod. 85, 86 Eng. Reprint, 159, 752, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 244, T. Raym. 220, 83 Eng. Reprint, 453.

In Schlosser v. Great Northern R. Co. (1910) 20 N. D. 406, 127 N. W. 502, which involved the question of liability of a carrier to the owner for injuries to horses which had been shipped to him by a bailee, the court says that the rule is that an agent is liable to third persons for negligence resulting in injury to them in the discharge of his agency. An agent, like other persons, in discharging his duties to his principal, is bound to recognize and respect the rights and privileges of others. He must take care that he does not by his own act unnecessarily injure another. If he fails to do so, either negligently or intentionally, and thereby causes an injury to another, he is liable in damages to the person injured. The fact that he was acting as agent at the time will not relieve him from liability. Everyone, whether he is principal or agent, is responsible directly to persons injured by his negligence in fulfilling obligations resting upon him in his individual character, and which the law imposes upon him independently of contract. Where an agent is guilty of misfeasance, that is, where he has actually entered upon the performance of his duties to his principal, and in doing so fails to respect the rights of others, by doing some wrong, as where he fails or neglects to use reasonable care and diligence in the performance of his duties, he will be personally responsible to a third person who is injured by reason of his misfeasance. An agent's liability in such cases is not based upon the ground of his agency, but on the ground that he is a wrongdoer, and as such is responsible for any injury he may cause.

One employed to unload shells from a boat for use of a railroad company may be liable for injury to a passenger caused by his piling them so close to the track that they slid onto it and derailed a car. Englert v. New Orleans R. & Light Co. (1911) 128 La. 473, 54 So. 963.

d. Negligent fires.

A section foreman is personally liable for permitting the right of way to become covered with inflammable material, so that it ignites and causes injury to neighboring property. Carter v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (1910) 84 S. C. 546, 66 S. E. 997.

A servant employed to construct a sign in a shed let to the employer for the purpose is personally liable for destruction of the shed by fire caused by his negligence in lighting his pipe.

Woodman v. Joiner (1864) 10 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 852.

Those in charge of a locomotive, the sparks from which set fire to private property, are personally liable for the injury thereby caused. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Neilson (1905) 118 Ill. App. 343.

In an action for damages for wrongfully setting fire to a prairie, to the injury of plaintiff's property, it appeared that the fire was set by one defendant as agent of the other, and defendant requested an instruction that plaintiff could not recover against both defendants, for if one acted under the instructions and directions of the other, then the latter alone would be liable. The court said, the instruction is clearly wrong; if the act complained of was illegal, the fact that one of the defendants committed it under direction of the other did not relieve him from responsibility. All concerned in the commission of a wrongful act are responsible for the consequences. Admit the principle asserted in this instruction, and every person charged with the commission of an act prohibited by law would excuse himself by showing that he acted in obedience to the command or under the direction of another. And such a doctrine would be subversive of private rights and detrimental to the public interests. Johnson v. Barber (1849) 10 Ill. 425, 50 Am. Dec. 416.

c. Injury to fellow servants.

1. In general.

Except in cases where the courts have become confused by the suggested distinction between cases of misfeasance and nonfeasance, the general rule is that the servant is liable for injuries which he inflicts upon a fellow servant, either through his negligence or unskilful management of the business intrusted to him, or through omissions to perform duties committed to him.

Scotland. — Wright v. Roxburgh (1864) 2 Ct. Sess. Cas. 3d series, 748.

If one by his negligence injures another, it is no defense in a suit against him to assert that they were both employed under one master. Lawton v. Waite (Wis.) supra.

In Hanna v. Granger (1894) 18 R. I. 507, 28 Atl. 659, which involved the question of the liability of the master for the negligent injury of a servant by his fellow servant, the court says that the injured servant may sue his fellow servant for his negligence, but not the master.

In Schumpert v. Southern R. Co. (1903) 65 S. C. 332, 95 Am. St. Rep. 802, 43 S. E. 813, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 676, where the question was as to whether or not master and servant could be sued jointly for negligent injury to a fellow servant, the court says counsel do not dispute the proposition that the servant is liable for his own tort.

In Coalgate Co. v. Bross (1909) 25 Okla. 244, 138 Am. St. Rep. 915, 107 Pac. 425, which involved the question of the right to join the negligent servant with the principal in an action by an injured fellow servant for damages, it seems to be assumed that the servant was liable, the court saying that it is argued that the cause of action of one servant against another grows out of the legal duty that each owes to the other to use care for the other's safety in the conduct of the common undertaking, and that the liability of the master being founded on a different principle, the parties could not be joined.

When a yard foreman, after ordering brakemen to couple two broken cars together with chains, permitted the engine to come against the standing cars so as to drive together the cars upon which the employees were working, to their injury, the foreman was held personally liable for the injury. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Charman (1903) 161 Ind. 95, 67 N. E. 923.

And the same ruling was made in the Federal court between the same parties, the court holding that where a brakeman ordered to couple broken cars together with a chain was killed by the negligence of the yardmaster in permitting the engine to back against the train in which he was working, the duty of the person in charge of the switch yard growing out of the exigency of the social order was so to conduct himself about his master's business as not to injure a fellow servant by his negligence or want of due care. The negligence of the person in charge of the switch yard gave rise to a twofold breach of duty; namely, that of the person in charge of the switch yard and that of the railroad company. Charman v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. (1900) 105 Fed. 449.

The engineer of a train is liable for the death of a railroad employee through the negligence of the engineer and cannot escape responsibility on the contention that he acted merely as agent for another. Martin v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1894) 95 Ky. 612, 26 S. W. 801.

In an action to hold one in charge of construction work liable for injury to an employee through his negligence, the court says: "An agent of the owner of property who has the complete control and management of the property or premises is bound to keep and maintain or control it as not to injure others, and for this breach of duty is liable to third persons for injury proximately resulting to the latter while using the premises in an ordinary and appropriate manner. The agent cannot excuse himself on the plea that his principal is liable. It is not his contract with the master that exposes the agent to liability to such third persons; it is the liability of the servant, independent of that of the master, by reason of the servant's common-law obligation to so use that which he controls as not to injure another. The mere relation of agency does not exempt a person from liability for an injury to a third person proximately resulting from the neglect of duty of such agent for which he would otherwise be liable. . . .

The agent, having entered upon the construction of the cottonseed bins in question, was in duty bound to use reasonable care in the manner of executing that work as not to cause any injury to third persons (working thereon under him or going thereby) which may be the natural consequence of his actionable negligence in construction of the bins and their insecurity and dangerous condition. He may not exempt himself from liability to any person who suffers injury by reason of his having it so negligently constructed and left without the proper safeguard of a sufficient and adequate support." Wright v. McCord (1920) 205 Ala. 122, 88 So. 150.

But to render the employee liable to a coemployee he must, of course, owe him some duty the breach of which causes the injury.

For a servant of a miner can be held liable for injury to another miner by the fall of a rock in the mine only so far as the individual acts or omissions within the scope of his employment contribute to the injury. Allen v. Bear Creek Coal Co. (1911) 43 Mont. 269, 115 Pac. 673.

An employee acting under immediate direction of superior officers, without knowledge of the perilous position of a servant injured, is not liable for the injury. Chandler v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1913) 251 Mo. 592, 158 S. W. 35.

The foreman of a packing plant does not owe any duty to employees to have the working place safe, so as to become liable for injury in case of defect in such place. Macutis v. Cudahy Packing Co. (1913) 203 Fed. 291. The court says the act of the foreman was a mere nonfeasance,—mere omission on his part to perform the master's duty as to inspection and repairs. For this the foreman is not liable to the injured employee. The consensus of judicial opinion is such that there cannot be said to be a fair, debatable question as to the joint liability of master and servant for the servant's misfeasance.

An agent employed to operate a mine is not liable merely because of his agency to an employee injured by an explosion of gas in the mine. Stiewel v. Borman (1896) 63 Ark. 30, 37 S. W. 404. The court says if he owed the employee no duty he was not liable. A legal duty is an essential element of negligence without which there can be no negligence, and there can be no duty to do an act when there is no legal right to do it. An agent stands in the relation of confidence and privity to no one except his principal. To him alone he is under obligations to perform those duties which he expressly or impliedly assumed when he entered into that relation, and hence to him alone is liable for their nonperformance. Consequently, no third person is entitled to recover against him for damages sustained by reason of the nonperformance or neglect of duty which he owed to his principal. He, however, like other persons, in discharging his duties to his principal, is bound to recognize and respect the rights and privileges of others. He must take care that he does not by his own act unnecessarily injure another. If he fails to do so, either negligently or intentionally, and thereby causes an injury to another, he is liable for damages to the person injured. The fact that he is acting as agent at the time will not relieve him of the liability. The court, after citing cases holding that an agent in charge of real estate, or of the construction of a building, might be liable for negligence, says: The same rule applies to agents having full and complete control and management of any business enterprise or undertaking, and the power and authority to do whatever, in the exercise of ordinary prudence, he finds reasonably necessary to prevent injury to others. But whether the failure to use such precautions be misfeasance there is a conflict of opinion, but the question is of no particular importance. The liability of the servant rests upon his failure to discharge a duty, as in misfeasance. He is under obligation so to use what is under his control as not to injure another. For a failure to discharge this duty he is liable in damages to a person injured.

2. Acts of commission.

There is no doubt that if the servant commits an act of positive negligence by which his fellow servant is injured, he will be liable for the consequences.

A servant is liable to his coservant for misfeasance in pushing upon him a hand car which they are engaged in loading onto another car. McGinnis v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1906) 200 Mo. 347, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 880, 118 Am. St. Rep. 661, 98 S. W. 590, 9 Ann. Cas. 656.

The general managers of an electric power company are liable to a lineman where they turn the power on a line on which he is at work without giving him any warning of the danger. Hoag v. Washington-Oregon Corp. (1914) 75 Or. 588, 144 Pac. 574, rehearing in (1915) 75 Or. 597, 147 Pac. 756.

An engineer is liable for injuries inflicted upon a postal clerk by his negligent handling of his engine. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Houchins (1905) 121 Ky. 526, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 375, 123 Am. St. Rep. 205, 89 S. W. 530.

A train despatcher who, through the negligent transmission of orders, causes a collision and death of a brakeman, is personally liable for the injury. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gollihur (1907) 40 Ind. App. 480, 82 N. E. 492.

An agent in charge of a station may be held liable for injury to a boy who is painting barrels, and whom he instructs to wash in gasoline and burn the gasoline when he is through, if he is found to have been negligent in giving such instructions, and the boy is injured in carrying them out. Standard Oil Co. v. Marlow (1912) 150 Ky. 647, 150 S. W. 832.

In Hare v. McIntire (1890) 82 Me. 240, 8 L.R.A. 450, 17 Am. St. Rep. 476, 19 Atl. 453, which was an action by an employee in a quarry against another employee for injuries caused by the negligent firing of a blast, the court said the right of action, if it exists, must be founded "on the defendant's misfeasance, which, even if it could be deemed a breach of his contract with his master, would not, for that reason, exempt him from liability to others injured thereby, provided such misfeasance was a violation of a duty springing from the relation between them. And we are of opinion that where two or more persons are engaged in the same general business of a common employer, in which their mutual safety depends somewhat upon the care exercised by them respectively, each owes to the other a duty resulting from their relation of fellow servants, to exercise such care in the prosecution of their work as men of ordinary prudence usually use in like circumstances; and he who fails in that respect is responsible for a resulting personal injury to his fellow servant."

Employees of a mill who attach a block and tackle to the ceiling and leave it in such a manner as to be dangerous to other employees at work in the mill will be liable for an injury caused by its fall on such employees. Osborne v. Morgan (1881) 130 Mass. 102, 39 Am. Rep. 437. The court says: "In the case at bar, the negligent hanging and keeping by the defendants of the block and chains in such a place and manner as to be in danger of falling upon persons underneath was a misfeasance or improper dealing with instruments in the defendant's actual use or control, for which they are responsible to any person lawfully in the room and injured by the fall, and who is not prevented by his relation to the defendants from maintaining the action. . . . The plaintiff's action is not founded on any contract, but is an action of tort for injuries which, according to the common experience of mankind, were a natural consequence of the defendants' negligence. The fact that a wrongful act is a breach of a contract between the wrongdoer and one person does not exempt him from the responsibility for it as a tort to a third person injured thereby."

In that case, the court in effect overrules Albro v. Jaquith (1855) 4

Gray (Mass.) 99, 64 Am. Dec. 56, which was an action to hold the superintendent of a mill liable for injuries to an employee through his negligence with respect to the handling of the gas by which the mill was lighted. In the latter case the court said: "An agent or servant is always responsible to his principal or employer for the negligent or unfaithful performance of his duty, where loss or damage results from it. But, in reference to third persons, there is a qualification of his liability. There is a well-established distinction between nonfeasance and misfeasance. As to the former, which is merely negligence or carelessness in the performance of duty, the responsibility to the principal arises from some express or implied obligation between particular parties standing in privity of law or contract with each other. In such case the responsibility is commensurate with the obligation assumed. But this is the extent and limitation of his liability. He is not bound to answer for such violation of duty or obligation, except to those to whom he has become directly bound or answerable for his conduct. . . . This principle, applied to the facts stated in the declaration, is decisive against the right of the plaintiff to maintain her present action. No fea-sance or positive act of wrong is charged or imputed to the defendant. The whole ground of complaint against him is that, having the care and superintendence of the apparatus and fixtures used in the mill of the Agawam Canal Company, for the purpose of generating, containing, and burning inflammable gas, he was negligent, careless, and unskilful in the management of them. His obligation to be faithful and diligent in this particular resulted either from an express contract with his principal, or is to be implied from the nature and character of the service in which he was engaged. And because this is the sole origin and foundation of his duty, he is responsible only to the party to whom it was due for the injurious consequences of neglecting it. It is not pretended that he had entered into any stipulation, or made any positive engagement, with the plaintiff, in relation to the service which he had agreed to render to their common employer. She, therefore, can have no legal right to complain of his carelessness or unfaithfulness; for he had made himself, by no act or contract, accountable to her."

An agent intrusted with the management of a construction job is personally liable for injury to a servant through the fall of a scaffold, due to the negligence of the agent. Fort v. Whipple (1877) 11 Hun (N. Y.) 586.

Where a railroad hand was injured by the movement of the train by the engineer while the hand was between the cars, the court said: "It is contended that the failure of the engineer to give notice to the plaintiff of his intention to move the train while the plaintiff was between the cars was a mere act of nonfeasance, for which the plaintiff must look to the master, and not to the servant. This contention cannot be supported. Conceding, without deciding, the rule to be that, for mere nonfeasance, the servant of the master cannot be made responsible to third persons injured thereby, we are clearly of opinion that the act of the engineer in backing the engine voluntarily, without giving notice, was misfeasance, instead of nonfeasance; that the knowledge he had, or ought to have had, of the presence of the plaintiff between the cars, made his movement of the train without giving notice a direct trespass or wrong committed by him against plaintiff, without regard to the relation existing between each of them and the railway company. No case has been cited to us in which such an act of a servant in the business of his master has been held to be nonfeasance." Warax v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. (1896) 72 Fed. 637.

Car inspectors are liable for placing a car with a board projecting from its roof in a yard in such a position that persons working on their trains are likely to come into contact with it. Hukill v. Maysville & B. S. R. Co. (1896) 72 Fed. 745. The court says: "It is urged that nothing is charged against them but mere omission or nonfeasance in violation of their duty to their employer, and that, while this may subject the company to liability to the plaintiff for injuries suffered by him because of such nonfeasance, it gives him no right of action against them, for the reason that there is no relation of privity between him and them. Conceding the validity of the distinction by which a servant is held liable directly to a stranger only for positive conduct which the servant might reasonably anticipate would result in injury, and which did so while acting in the business of his master, and not for an entire failure to enter upon his master's business at all, the averments of the petition make it inapplicable here. The petition charges that the defendants (which includes the defendant car inspectors), with gross and wanton negligence, placed the car with the board projecting therefrom in a defective, unsafe, and dangerous condition, whereby the defendant was injured. This was misfeasance, because, but for their act in placing the car where it was, in its dangerous condition, the plaintiff would not have been injured."

An agent of the owner of a lighter, who, by his negligent instructions as to loading it, causes it to overturn, to the injury of an employee, cannot escape liability on the theory that he is only an agent. The court said he would be liable for requiring the master to do a dangerous thing which caused the injury. Chiarello Bros. Co. v. Pedersen (1917) 155 C. C. A. 258, 242 Fed. 482.

Where the servant in charge of construction of a building caused a trench to be dug at the bottom of the wall in such a manner that it fell and injured another servant at work on the building, it was contended that a servant was not liable for injuries happening through his negligence to a fellow servant, but the court said that it did not clearly perceive how it could well be that, in the little community of employees of the same master, upon the same general undertaking, the common duties of humankind in society generally should cease to exist, and, as a consequence, liability for breach of them. Hinds v. Harbou (1877) 58 Ind. 121.

One employee is liable for ordering another into a dangerous place to work, this being a misfeasance. Jewell v. Kansas City Bolt & Nut Co. (1910) 231 Mo. 176, 140 Am. St. Rep. 515, 132 S. W. 703.

In Republic Iron & Steel Co. v. Lee (1907) 227 Ill. 246, 81 N. E. 411, in which a servant was injured by reason of a negligent order given him by his superior, and sued him for the resulting injury, the court said that the superior, personally and individually, owed the injured servant the duty not to give him an order negligent in character. If the order was given by the superior, it was an affirmative wrong done by him in violation of his duty, and rendered him liable to suit.

A servant who directs a fellow servant to make use of an unsafe ladder, to the injury of the latter, will be liable for the injury. Steinhauser v. Spraul (1893) 114 Mo. 551, 21 S. W. 515, 859.

The action failed, however, on a subsequent appeal, on the ground of assumption of risk, although the opinion of Sherwood, J., contains a discussion not concurred in by a majority of the court, upon the distinction between nonfeasance and malfeasance, holding that, in this case, there was mere nonfeasance. Steinhauser v. Spraul (1895) 127 Mo. 541, 27 L.R.A. 441, 28 S. W. 620, 30 S. W. 102.

The act of a superintendent of a bridge company in refusing to adopt proper precautions to protect employees from injury when rolling iron bars along the uncovered beams of the bridge is one of misfeasance for which he is personally liable to an employee, injured by the fall of a roller between the beams. Kenney v. Lane (1894) 9 Tex. Civ. App. 150, 36 S. W. 1063.

A foreman having direct supervision of a mine, who knows the dangerous condition of overhead rock, and takes no steps to remedy it, to the injury of an employee, is personally liable for the injury. Gennaux v. Northwestern Improv. Co. (1913) 72 Wash. 268, 130 Pac. 495.

3. Acts of omission.

If one servant owes another a duty the failure to perform which will result in injury to such other, he will be liable for injury resulting from failure to perform such duty. The true reason of this liability is the failure to perform the duty owing; but some of the courts which have felt themselves hampered by the formula with respect to misfeasance and nonfeasance have held that the omission was a misfeasance, notwithstanding it was negative in character.

The foreman of a mine may be liable to an employee for neglect of a duty to examine the walls for the purpose of discovering whether or not there was loose material liable to fall and injure persons working in the mine. Evans Chemical Works v. Ball (1914) 159 Ky. 399, 167 S. W. 390.

"A car inspector, who, after inspection and approval, sends out a car which he knows, or, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have known, was defective, is liable in damages to a brakeman who, because of the defect, is injured in attempting to use it in the ordinary manner, in the absence of contributory negligence on his part." Ward v. Pullman Car Corp. (1908) 131 Ky. 142, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 343, 114 S. W. 754. The court says: "The petition here charges more than a mere nonfeasance. The cars could not go out on the road until they were inspected and passed inspection. When the inspectors inspected the cars and approved them, they went out on the road. Their approval sent the car out on the road for the use of the trainmen; if they sent a car out which was defective, and which they knew, or by ordinary care could have known, was defective, they are as fully liable to the brakeman who was injured by reason of this, as if they had with their own hands handed him a wrench, telling it was safe and proper to be used, when it was in fact in a dangerous condition; and they either knew this, or could have known it by ordinary care in such inspection as they were required to make. They did not deliver the car by their own hands to the brakeman, but they approved it, and their approval put the car in the hands of the brakeman. It is not a case of mere failure to act, but it is a case of one who was charged with the duty of seeing that the car was safe before delivering it to another to be used, with actual knowledge that, if it was unsafe, it would endanger his life; for they must be charged with knowing what they should have known by the exercise of ordinary care when they made the inspection and passed the car. If they had not inspected the car at all, and had not approved the car in any way, they would have done no positive act, and a different question would be presented."

In Southern R. Co. v. Miller (1907) 1 Ga. App. 616, 57 S. E. 1090, affirmed in (1907) 3 Ga. App. 410, 59 S. E. 1115, the crew of a train which had taken a switch to let another pass it, left the switch open, so that the oncoming train ran into it and collided with the standing train, to the injury of the former. Negligence was charged against them in leaving the switch open and failing to observe that it was open. These were claimed to be merely acts of nonfeasance, but the court says: "We do not so construe the acts of negligence set up. They really involve acts both of omission and commission. They present a case not where the agents failed to perform the acts which it was their duty to perform, but where they did actually perform them, but in a negligent manner. They were all co-operating in the running of the train, and in the specific acts of negligence in reference to the switch, and other acts charged which caused the injury to the plaintiff. 'Nonfeasance is the total omission or failure of the agent to enter upon the performance of a distinct duty or undertaking which he has agreed with his principal to do.'"

In Daves v. Southern P. Co. (1893) 98 Cal. 19, 35 Am. St. Rep. 133, 32 Pac. 708, 13 Am. Neg. Cas. 367, a judgment against a section foreman for leaving a switch open, by reason of which a section hand was killed, was affirmed.

Where the agent in charge of a sawing machine set an inexperienced hand to work upon it when the saw was insecurely fastened, so that the hand was injured, the question arose as to the liability for the injury. Greenberg v. Whitcomb Lumber Co. (1895) 90 Wis. 225, 28 L.R.A. 439, 48 Am. St. Rep. 911, 63 N. W. 93. The court says the principle is well settled that the servant or agent is responsible to third persons only for injuries which are occasioned by his misfeasance, and not for those occasioned by his mere nonfeasance. It further says that it was defendant's duty to have the machine safe. His neglect to do so was nonfeasance. But that alone would not have harmed plaintiff if he had not been set to work upon it. To set him to work upon the defective and dangerous machine was doing improperly an act which one might do in a proper manner. It was a misfeasance. The misfeasance was the efficient cause of the accident.

One operating a derrick to assist timbers to their place in a building is liable for injury to an employee receiving the timbers on the wall, by his negligent operation of the derrick, so that such receiving employee is thrown to the ground. Fox v. Sandford (1856) 4 Sneed (Tenn.) 36, 67 Am. Dec. 587.

One in charge as agent of the transferring of logs from one railroad company to another is liable for injury to an employee through the breaking of an unsafe chain which he furnishes for use of the employees. Malone v. Morton (1884) 84 Mo. 436. The court emphasizes, however, the fact that the injured employee did not know that defendant was a mere agent.

A foreman who, in erecting a derrick, himself selects the material and directs how and where the stays shall be located and fastened, is liable to a fellow servant for injuries caused by its proving insecure and falling, through his negligence. Atkins v. Field (1896) 89 Me. 281, 56 Am. St. Rep. 424, 36 Atl. 375. The court says: "The defendant calls our attention to a distinction made in some cases between the misfeasance and mere nonfeasance of a person in the situation of the defendant. Such a distinction cannot avail here. If the defendant had not undertaken to rig and set up the derrick, or, in so doing, had simply executed the will of a lawful superior as to details of mode and material, there might be said to be mere nonfeasance on his part. But he did undertake the work, and practically exercised his own discretion as to mode and material. He was then bound to act carefully in every respect, and his carelessness in any respect was a misfeasance."

In Camp v. Church of St. Louis (1852) 7 La. Ann. 321, where one engaged in the construction of a church was injured by the fall of a portion of the work, the court was evenly divided on the question whether or not the contractor was personally liable for the injury. The chief justice says the undertaker who puts up, to the danger of the public, a building defective in design, materials, or work, is liable in damages for its falling down. Indeed, a stronger moral responsibility exists on his part. The owner is rendered liable from the policy of the law alone. On the other hand, the undertaker is the responsible man.

A locomotive engineer is liable for injury to the fireman by his negligence in failing properly to protect a gauge which he installs in the engine. Brower v. Northern P. R. Co. (1910) 109 Minn. 385, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 354, 124 N. W. 10. The court says defendant undertook to execute the duty of replacing the gauge, and performed it negligently. Hence his act was one of misfeasance, and not of nonfeasance. Strictly speaking, the act of the engineer in failing to put on the guard was nonfeasance,—that is, not doing an act which he was required to perform. But the distinction between misfeasance and nonfeasance is sometimes fanciful.

In Hagerty v. Montana Ore Purchasing Co. (Hagerty v. Wilson) (1908) 38 Mont. 69, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 356, 98 Pac. 643, where the superintendent of a mine was sought to be held liable for injury to a miner because of the unsafe condition of a shaft, it was contended that, at most, he was guilty of nonaction, or omission of duty, in failing to have the shaft in working order, or in not forbidding its use, and that such omission or nonaction amounts only to nonfeasance, for which he is not liable to a third person, but, if liable at all, merely to his principal; and that the maxim "respondeat superior" applies. The court says: "If Wilson's misconduct in permitting the shaft to be out of repair, and in permitting its use while in such condition, amounts only to nonfeasance, then the contention of his counsel may be well founded. But we are not able to agree with them in their conclusion. . . . The courts and text-writers have not always been accurate, in defining the terms 'nonfeasance' and 'misfeasance,' or in discriminating between them. As applied in cases of this character, we think the term 'nonfeasance' refers to the omission on the part of the agent to perform a duty which he owes to his principal by virtue of the relationship existing between them; but, whenever the omission on the part of the agent consists of his failure to perform a duty which he owes to third persons, then, as to such third persons, his omission amounts to 'misfeasance,' for which he is responsible."

In an action to hold employers and their foremen liable for death of an employee, due to the falling of a platform, the necessary repair of which the foremen had been instructed to look after, the court held that the question of liability for nonfeasance had not been properly raised, but proceeded to state: "The agent or servant is himself liable as well as the master, where the act producing the injury, although committed in the master's business, is a direct trespass by the servant upon the person or property of another, or where he directs the tortious act. In such cases the fact that he is acting for another does not shield him from responsibility. The distinction is between misfeasance and nonfeasance. For the former the servant is, in general, liable; for the latter, not. The servant, as between himself and his master, is bound to serve him with fidelity and to perform the duties committed to him. An omission to perform them may subject third persons to harm, and the master to damages. But the breach of the contract of service is a matter between the master and servant alone, and the nonfeasance of the servant, causing injury to third persons, is not, in general, at least, a ground for a civil action against the servant in their favor." Murray v. Usher (1889) 117 N. Y. 542, 23 N. E. 564.

A mine superintendent who is required by statute to examine the working conditions of the mine each day is personally liable for injury to an employee through his failure to perform the duty so imposed upon him. Durkin v. Kingston Coal Co. (1895) 171 Pa. 193, 29 L.R.A. 808, 50 Am. St. Rep. 801, 33 Atl. 237. The court says that with the knowledge of the conditions with respect to overlying rock he did nothing to protect employees from the consequences of its fall; and continues: Whether his conduct be considered with reference to the statute or regardless of it, his failure to do what he must have known to be necessary was a neglect of duty such as should render him liable to his fellow servant who has suffered by it.

Other cases in which the servant has been held liable after a discussion of the doctrine of nonfeasance are found infra, V. c. 1.

V. Nonfeasance.

a. Absence of duty to third person.

Notwithstanding the fact that a discussion of the question of the distinction between misfeasance and nonfeasance upon the servant's liability is found in very many of the cases in which actions have been brought against the servant, the cases in which the action has failed are comparatively few. As has already been suggested the fundamental question which must ultimately furnish the rule of decision in this class of cases is whether or not a servant owes a duty to the person injured. If he does, he is liable; if he does not, he is not liable. Some of the cases have made this test the rule of decision, as will appear from the following citations:

Where a man, as agent for his wife, impounds cattle trespassing on her land, and places them in her possession, he is not answerable for injuries caused by failure to mark them. Kimbrough v. Boswell (1903) 119 Ga. 201, 45 S. E. 977. The court says that while an agent is personally liable to those injured by his misfeasance, he is ordinarily not liable for mere nonfeasance.

A laborer employed to dig a ditch in a public highway is not personally liable for injuries caused by failure to properly guard it at night, since that duty rests upon his employer. Jessup v. Sloneker (1891) 142 Pa. 527, 21 Atl. 988.

The agent of the owner of the property, who, under a permit from the city, constructs a covering over the sidewalk while improvements are in progress on the property, is not liable for injury to a passer-by through its collapse. Scheller v. Silbermintz (1906) 50 Misc. 175, 98 N. Y. Supp. 230. The court says the agent owed no duty to plaintiff, and unless a servant is guilty of actual misfeasance or tort, he cannot be held liable with his master. If he neglects duty which the master owes to third persons, the remedy is against the master alone.

Where an action was brought against a railroad company for delay in shipment of freight due to a strike of engineers of the road, the court, as a reason for holding the railroad company liable, said the engineers owed no duty to the shipper which the law can recognize. If they had committed a positive tort or trespass upon the property, the owner might pass by the principal and hold them responsible; but for a nonfeasance, or simple neglect of duty, they were only answerable to their employers. The maxim "respondeat superior" applies. Blackstock v. New York & E. R. Co. (1859) 20 N. Y. 48, 75 Am. Dec. 372.

In Hill v. Caverly (1834) 7 N. H. 215, 26 Am. Dec. 735, where, by direction of the owner of a dam, his agent kept the gates shut until an unsafe head of water had been raised, so that the dam gave way, to the injury of a lower riparian owner, the court held the servant not liable, saying that no action can be maintained against a servant unless he can be considered as a wrongdoer. He is never liable for a neglect of his master. The court stated that the shutting of the gates was no wrongful act to anybody. The owner had a right to raise a head of water as high as the dam would safely bear. If the gate ought to have been raised sooner, that was the business of the owner, and not of the agent. He had no authority to raise it except when directed so to do. The case discusses no wrongful act, no breach of duty in the agent, no negligence which can render him liable to the lower owner. The case was evidently decided as one of fact, but it is submitted that the court took too narrow a view of the duties of the servant to a third person. Can it properly be said that an agent can co-operate in raising a head of water behind a defective dam with the knowledge that it is merely a question of the height to which the water rises when the dam will give way and devastate property along the stream below, without personal liability for the act? It would seem that the servant, under such circumstances, owed some duty to the lower owners, and if they were injured, he could not shield himself behind the directions given him by the employer. The court argued that the agent, who was under contract to follow directions of the owner in everything relating to the stoppage or flowage of the water, cannot be held personally liable for damages to lower proprietors, caused by the breaking away of the dam, although it may have been imprudent and improper to raise such a head of water with such a dam. That he had no authority from his master to raise the gate except when directed to do so. Such reasoning is certainly peculiar. If the master had directed the servant to load and aim a gun at the neighbor's house and attach to it a time clock which would discharge the gun at a given hour, and then watch to see that nothing interfered with the prepared mechanism, could it be possible that the servant would not be liable for the injury caused by the discharge of the gun merely because he was obeying the master's orders, and had no authority from the master to interfere with the mechanism which had been set in operation?

An agent in charge of a mill, who had nothing to do with the erection of the dam, is not personally liable for setting back the water onto upper wheels merely because he maintains the dam in the condition and at the height intended by the owner. Levi L. Brown Paper Co. v. Dean (1877) 123 Mass. 267. The court says, in respect to his liability, that he had no such control as would authorize him to change or remove any such structure erected upon the premises by the owner. It is very plain, therefore, that he could not be liable to other persons for failing to do what he had no right to do.

Where a building the raising of which was being superintended by an architect, fell and injured a workman, the architect was held liable for the injury. Lottman v. Barnett (1876) 62 Mo. 159. The court said defendant is not assumed to be held responsible for omissions of duty to his employers. He is held responsible only for positive misfeasance, for negligence in the work which he undertook and carried out, but in which he failed to exhibit the care and skill which the law imposed upon him. For this want of care and skill,—in other words, for negligence,—he is responsible to persons injured by reason of his acts.

Where a foreman whose duty it was to see to the repair of the rolling stock of a railroad put into an engine a sight tube which was furnished by the railroad company, but which was alleged to have been of an improper kind, so that it burst, to the injury of an engineer, and he was made a party to an action for the injury, the court said: "Can a servant be made liable to one of another grade for the master's failure to provide safe and suitable machinery, although it was the superior servant's duty to look after the condition of the machinery? For such servant's careless or negligent act, which is called a 'misfeasance,' he is liable to anyone injured thereby. In its nature it is or becomes a trespass. And the fact that he is acting for another, or even under the positive directions of another, will not excuse him. But where the injury results to some third person because the servant failed to act,—that is, because of his nonfeasance,—it is held upon authority that generally the servant is not personally liable, though his master is. . . . Whether this doctrine, in its fullest extent, can be sustained in sound reason, it is unnecessary for us to examine. Whether the nonfeasance of Brown was a negative act, in that it was a failure to do what he had undertaken to do, and therefore had done it imperfectly, we are relieved from considering by the state of the pleadings and of the records; for it is not charged that Brown had it in his power to do anything other than exactly what he did. To hold him liable in this state of case would be to hold that every servant is personally charged with the same liability as his master, although the sole fault was that of the master, over whose action the servant, of course, had no control. Such a rule would be unreasonable." Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Robertson (1903) 115 Ky. 858, 74 S. W. 1061.

In an action by the owner of cotton against the agent of a factor to recover damages because of his failure to transmit to the factor the owner's instructions as to the disposal of the cotton, which resulted in a substantial loss to the owner, the court said it was conceded at the argument that the agent is not liable for damages to a third person resulting to him from nonperformance or neglect of a duty which the agent owes to the principal. The court says that by statute, where a tort is for a violation of any private obligation, that obligation results from the relations of the parties, created by contract, express or implied. Reid v. Humber (1873) 49 Ga. 207. Now, what relations existed between the plaintiff and defendant in this case, created by contract, either express or implied? To constitute a legal contract, there must be a consideration. Was there any here? A party shipped his cotton to his factor; he then told the agent of that factor, who was at another depot from where the cotton was shipped, that he did not wish the cotton sold until further orders. Was there a legal obligation on that agent towards the shipper to transmit his directions to the factor? From what did it spring? The agent was bound to his principal, and would have been responsible to him for any damages recovered against the principal, on account of the agent's failure. And the shipper may have been entitled to recover against the principal, either for the neglect of the agent in not forwarding the instructions, or for the violation of them by the principal, if that had been communicated. But we cannot see that there was any such relation between the agent and the shipper to render the agent liable to him for the neglect. Had the shipper made the agent his own agent in the matter for a consideration, the case would be different.

"An agent who has charge of the renting of a building owned by a nonresident, and promises a tenant that he will pay for connecting a drain with a sewer, but expressly refuses to take any responsibility in directing the work, and says that authority must be obtained from some other source, is not liable for the negligence of the tenant in leaving an ungraded excavation in the street while doing the work." Crandall v. Loomis (1884) 56 Vt. 664.

It seems probable that the result reached in some of the above cases was influenced by the idea that the servant was not liable for omission to perform duties owing his master, the court reasoning that if the delict was with respect to a duty owing the master, there would be no delict towards a third person; and it may be that the decision might have been changed had the question of duty to the person injured been considered with the mind free from the misfeasance-nonfeasance formula.

b. Cases denying liability for nonfeasance.

A few cases have adopted and made a rule of decision the principle that the servant is not liable for nonfeasance. That principle being without foundation to support it, the decisions on the facts in the respective cases were merely fortuitous, and may or may not have been right, according to whether or not a duty was owing to plaintiff by defendant. The following cases have held that a servant was not liable to a stranger for mere nonfeasance:

United States.—Carey v. Rochereau (1883) 16 Fed. 87; Cheatham v. Red River Line (1893) 56 Fed. 248, reversed on other grounds in (1894) 60 Fed. 517; Burch v. Caden Stone Co. (1899) 93 Fed. 181; Kelly v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1903) 122 Fed. 286; Bryce v. Southern R. Co. (1903) 125 Fed. 958; Floyd v. Shenango Furnace Co. (1911) 186 Fed. 539; Plunkett v. Gulf Ref. Co. (1919) 259 Fed. 968.

Iowa.—Williams v. Dean (1907) 134 Iowa, 216, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 410, 111 N. W. 931; Minnis v. Younker Bros. (1908) — Iowa, —, 118 N. W. 532; Cramblitt v. Percival-Porter Co. (1916) 176 Iowa, 733, L.R.A.1917C, 77, 158 N. W. 541; Wendland v. Berg (1919) 188 Iowa, 202, 174 N. W. 410.

Kentucky.—Dudley v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1907) 127 Ky. 221, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1186, 128 Am. St. Rep. 335, 96 S. W. 835.

Louisiana.—Delaney v. Rochereau (1882) 34 La. Ann. 1123, 44 Am. Rep. 456.

Mississippi.—Feltus v. Swan (1884) 62 Miss. 415.

Missouri.—Bissell v. Roden (1863) 34 Mo. 63, 84 Am. Dec. 71; O'Neil v. C. Young & Sons' Seed & Plant Co. (1894) 58 Mo. App. 628.

New York.—Denny v. Manhattan Co. (1846) 2 Denio, 115, affirmed in (1846) 5 Denio, 639; Phinney v. Phinney (1859) 17 How. Pr. 197;

Burns v. Pethcal (1894) 75 Hun, 437, 27 N. Y. Supp. 499; Van Antwerp v. Linton (1895) 89 Hun, 417, 35 N. Y. Supp. 318, affirmed in (1899) 157 N. Y. 716, 53 N. E. 1133; Potter v. Gilbert (1909) 130 App. Div. 632, 115 N. Y. Supp. 425, affirmed in (1909) 196 N. Y. 576, 90 N. E. 1165.

Ohio.—Stevens v. Little Miami R. Co. (1850) 1 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 335; Chambers v. Ohio L. Ins. & T. Co. (1857) 1 Disney, 327; Henshaw v. Noble (1857) 7 Ohio St. 226.

Tennessee.—Erwin v. Davenport (1871) 9 Heisk. 44; Drake v. Hagen (1902) 108 Tenn. 265, 67 S. W. 470.

Texas.—Labadie v. Hawley (1884) 61 Tex. 177, 48 Am. Rep. 278; Morrison v. Ashburn (1893) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 21 S. W. 993.

In Bissell v. Roden (Mo.) supra, which was an action against a subcontractor by the property owner for injury to the property by negligent performance by the subcontractor of his contract, the court sets out the section of Story's Agency relating to the servant's liability for misfeasance and nonfeasance, and declares that the case comes within the operation of the principle thereby set out, and that there is no liability.

In O'Neil v. C. Young & Sons' Seed & Plant Co. (Mo.) supra, which involved the question of liability of an officer of a corporation, the court says it is only where the agent has been guilty of active negligence—that is, of some act of misfeasance—that he can be made to answer to third persons.

Where an action was brought against transfer agents of a foreign corporation because of their refusal to transfer stock on the books of the corporation, which were in their possession for that purpose, the court held that if the plaintiff had a cause of action against anyone, it was against the principal, and not the agents, saying that for a neglect to discharge this duty they were answerable to their principal, and to no one else. If third persons are injured by the negligence of a known agent, the rule is respondeat superior. Denny v. Manhattan Co. (N. Y.) supra.

Employees of a bank are not personally liable for turning over to a third person money, where the bank had agreed with the depositor not to turn over such money until such person signed a certain receipt, which he had not done when the money was turned over. Morrison v. Ashburn (Tex.) supra. The court says the attempt is merely to hold them liable for failure to perform a duty to the bank as its agents.

An agent for the rental of real estate, who permits the tenant to place a cooking range on the property, is not personally liable for injuries to neighboring property by operation of the range when its use proves to be a nuisance. Labadié v. Hawley (Tex.) supra. This ruling is placed upon the doctrine of nonliability for nonfeasance. The court, as a preliminary to the discussion, however, states that neither the construction of the range nor failure to move it caused the injury, which resulted solely by the manner in which the range was operated. Therefore, the liability must rest, if at all, upon the ground that he had not done something which he might have done. The court then cites with approval various textbooks which have laid down the rule of nonliability for nonfeasance.

Where agents for the care of property were sued because of injury to a tenant by the unsafe condition of the property rented by them, the court disapproves of the contention that their act was one of misfeasance instead of nonfeasance, saying: "An agent, while obeying the command or performing the service of the principal, is not justified in committing a tort, and if he does, not only the principal, but the agent, may be made to answer in damages therefor. But where a duty rests on the principal, and not on the agent, its nonperformance by the latter creates no liability against him, if injury results. True, he may owe a duty to the principal to faithfully discharge his duties as agent, but he owes no duty to others except that, in the performance of those duties, he shall not do anything which will cause injury to them. If the agent fails to perform a duty which he owes to the principal, and by reason of such nonperformance or neglect of duty a third person sustains injury, no action can be maintained against the agent by such third person on account thereof." Dean v. Brock (1894) 11 Ind. App. 507, 38 N. E. 829. The court further says the case cannot be said to be one of malfeasance, because the agents were under no legal duty to keep the property in repair and safe for use. They simply neglected to perform for their principal the duty which he owed to his tenant. Their failure to do this was merely a nonfeasance, and not a misfeasance.

In Cramblitt v. Percival-Porter Co. (1916) 176 Iowa, 733, L.R.A.1917C, 77, 158 N. W. 541, it appeared that contractors for the wiring of an apartment house left an improperly protected hole in a passage during the progress of the work, and a tenant of the building was injured and sought to hold agents of the building liable for the injury. There was nothing to show that they had anything to do with the work, the contract having been let by the owner, and the agents having no notice of the defect in the passageway. There was, therefore, no ground on which they could have been held liable, but the court, in disposing of the case, said that the most that can be said of these defendants is that they neglected to perform some affirmative duty which they owed to the owner. It is a case of nonfeasance, and not of malfeasance, on the part of these defendants, as to anyone. No liability can be predicated by this plaintiff upon the failure of these agents to discharge a contractual duty which they owed to the property owner. The court says: "The general rule is that an agent is not liable to a stranger simply for nonfeasance,—for a failure to discharge some duty which he owes to his master or principal,—even though the master and principal owes that duty to the person injured. The agent may be liable as for a breach of contract, but only to his principal. Such breach, however, is not a tort of which a stranger may complain. In the instant case, if these defendants owed any duty to keep this building in safe repair, it was a duty which they owed to the owner, growing out of some relationship existing between them. If they assumed to discharge this duty, and were guilty of some active negligence to the hurt of the plaintiff, they would be clearly liable to her as for tort; but a mere failure to discharge the obligations assumed under the contractual relationship with the owner,—a mere failure to perform those duties,—was a breach of the contractual duty to the owner of which the owner might complain, but of which no stranger to such contractual relationship could complain."

Agents for the care and rental of property who had no knowledge of the danger are not liable for injuries to a tenant by the caving of a covered well thereon. Wendland v. Berg (1919) 188 Iowa, 202, 174 N. W. 410. The court says an agent may be held personally liable for wrongful acts of misfeasance committed by him. But when a charge of negligence against an agent is based upon mere nonfeasance, quite a different question is presented. Negligence by nonfeasance can occur only by failure to perform some duty owing to the injured person. It is the general rule, recognized in this state, that the agent is not personally liable to a third person for mere nonfeasance.

In Chambers v. Ohio L. Ins. & T. Co. (1857) 1 Disney (Ohio) 327, which was an action for injury to a passer-by through the fall of a cornice into the street, which was brought against the owner of the building, the court, in the course of its argument, said: It is proper to advert to a distinction which has been noticed in one of the cases, that if the act itself be unlawful, if it could not be done otherwise than in an unlawful manner, if it be a wrong and trespass, then it may well be that he who orders or procures it to be done, and he who does it, will be responsible; but if the thing to be done is lawful and proper, and the wrongful act which causes injury is neglect on the part of those actually employed, then their principal is responsible to third persons, and those acting as servants or agents are not responsible.

Where an agent in charge of property for leasing failed to repair the defective covering of a drain, or to inform an incoming tenant of the defect, so that the tenant fell through the covering and was injured, the court held that it was a mere act of nonfeasance on the part of the agent, and that he was not liable for the injury. Drake v. Hagan (1902) 108 Tenn. 265, 67 S. W. 470. The court says that an agent is not liable to third persons for injuries received by them in consequence of his not performing some duty he owes his principal.

In Williams v. Dean (1907) 134 Iowa, 216, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 410, 111 N. W. 931, which was an action against directors of an agricultural society for injuries to a patron of a ball game because of insufficiency of the back stop, the court says the defendants were agents of the society. If liable at all it was because of what they did. If they were guilty of some misfeasance or trespass, as distinguished from mere nonfeasance, then they are liable, and cannot shield themselves by saying that they were acting as agents for the society. On the other hand, no agent is liable to a stranger simply for nonfeasance; that is to say, for failure to do some act which his principal commits to his charge. He may be liable for breach of contract to his principal, but not to a stranger for a tort.

Where ice formed on the pavement in front of property for the care and rental of which defendants were agents, an action was brought against them for injury caused by a fall on the ice. There was nothing to show that the agents were in any way responsible for the ice, or had knowledge of it. The court says the defendants were guilty of no misfeasance, and it is the rule of Iowa that an agent is not liable unless he is guilty of misfeasance. Minnis v.

Yunker Bros. (1908) — Iowa, —, 118 N. W. 532.

In Erwin v. Davenport (1871) 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 44, the court held that subordinate agents of the state were liable for their positive wrongs to third persons to the same extent as private agents. They were responsible for misfeasance, but not for nonfeasance.

While an architect may be liable for the fall of a building, due to defects in the plans prepared by him, he is not liable for injury to a third person by his failure to comply with his contract with the owner to supervise the erection of the building, so that unsafe or insecure work gets into it. This is merely nonfeasance, for which he is not responsible to third persons. Potter v. Gilbert (1909) 130 App. Div. 632, 115 N. Y. Supp. 425, affirmed in (1909) 196 N. Y. 576, 90 N. E. 1165. The court says: "The architect may owe a duty to the owner to visit and inspect the work hourly, daily, or weekly, but he owes no duty to the employees of the contractor to remain on the ground any given length of time, or to inspect the work at given intervals, to see that the plans and specifications, which fully and definitely prescribe materials and dimensions and quantities, are followed by the contractor, who is presumed to be competent, or to employ a superintendent or foreman competent to follow them. It was the duty of the employer of the decedent, under his contract with the owner, to follow the plans and specifications. The supervising power conferred upon the architect was to insure this result for the protection of the owner. If the architect were guilty of an affirmative act which contributed to the accident, as by directing a departure from the plans or specifications, or the use of improper materials, or knowingly suffering such departure from the plans or specifications, or such use of improper materials, or failing to condemn improper work, he would doubtless be liable; but there is no such charge made in the complaint." The dissenting judge, however, said: "I think the complaint states a cause of action, because it charges the defendant with misfeasance, and all of the authorities agree that for that an agent may be held liable to a third party. It alleges that the defendant undertook to supervise the construction of the building; that he had supervision of the work when the wall fell, which was occasioned by the negligent manner in which he performed his work; that the improper construction of the wall was known to him, or would have been if he had exercised reasonable diligence in the performance of his duties. The negligent performance of his contract with Graves, not mere nonperformance, is what is alleged. This is equivalent to a charge of misfeasance, and not nonfeasance."

Negligence of a committee appointed by a corporation owner of exhibition grounds to construct a stand for the use of patrons of a game to be played on the grounds, in failing to see that it is safe for the use to which it is to be put, is mere nonfeasance for which they are not personally responsible. Van Antwerp v. Linton (1895) 89 Hun, 417, 35 N. Y. Supp. 318, affirmed in (1899) 157 N. Y. 716, 53 N. E. 1133. The court says: "In this state an agent or servant is not liable to third persons for nonfeasance. As between himself and his master he is bound to serve him with fidelity; and for a breach of his duty he becomes liable to the master, who, in turn, may be charged in damages for injuries to third persons occasioned by the nonfeasance of the servant. For misfeasance the agent is generally liable to third parties suffering thereby. The distinction between nonfeasance and misfeasance has been expressed by the courts of this state as follows: 'If the duty omitted by the agent or servant devolved upon him purely from his agency or employment, his omission is only of a duty he owes his principal or master, and the master alone is liable. While if the duty rests upon him in his individual character, and was one that the law imposed upon him independently of his agency or employment, then he is liable.' . . . Appellant urges that although these individual defendants were charged by the corporation with the duty of erecting this stand, and the acts complained of consisted in omitting to provide for a construction of sufficient strength to withstand the strain to which it was subjected, nevertheless they were guilty of misfeasance rather than nonfeasance."

The contention, however, was disallowed in Feltus v. Swan (1884) 62 Miss. 415, in which it was alleged that a levee had been built by the owners of two adjacent plantations for protection against high waters, and that it had always been the custom for the owner of one to have the water from his plantation drain through the other, and that it was the duty of the owner of the latter to keep open a drain on his property for the purpose of such drainage. Neglect of the performance of this duty by the owner of the servient plantation and his manager was alleged, to the injury of the dominant estate. There is nothing to show the foundation of the duty or its extent, but the court disposes of the case by saying that the manager, being a mere agent, was not liable for an omission of duty except to his principal. The charge against him was only that he failed to do, and not that he had done anything mischievously, and for nonfeasance, or omission to act at all, the agent is answerable only to his employer.

In an action by a passenger against the railroad company and the engineer and conductor, for injuries caused by the derailling of a train, the court says an agent or servant is not always personally liable to third persons for negligence. When he is charged with negligence, the facts must be stated wherein the negligence exists,—whether in the omission of an act he should have done, or in the commission of an act he should not have done. For the former, he will not be liable. Bryce v. Southern R. Co. (1903) 125 Fed. 958.

"For mismanagement of an estate by an agent he is responsible only to his principal, and not to other persons who may claim to be the rightful owners of the property." Phinney v. Phinney (1859) 17 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 197.

In Stevens v. Little Miami R. Co. (1850) 1 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 335, the court, in arguing in favor of the liability of a master for injury done by one servant to another, said that if the plaintiff had sued his fellow servant, he would have been turned out of court, on the ground that there was no privity of contract; and that as to negligence or nonfeasance, the servant is responsible to his master, and not to his fellow servant.

In an action by an employee against his master and a coemployee for injuries caused by the falling upon him of a derrick, the court says it is not shown that the coemployee was guilty of any wilful or intentional wrongdoing respecting the derrick or the operations of the corporation by which plaintiff was injured. In the absence of any statement that he was guilty of any wilful wrongdoing, or that he had control superior to that of plaintiff over the operations of the derrick, and in the absence of any statement connecting him with the operations of the derrick in any manner not directed by the principal, or not within the scope of his employment, no cause of action is shown against him. With respect to the servant, it is a case of negligence only; and mere negligence, however gross, would not render the servant liable unless it was wilful or malicious. Burch v. Caden Storage Co. (1899) 93 Fed. 181.

The failure of a yardmaster to perform his duty to inspect an engine, and permitting it to go out on the road, to the injury of an employee, is a mere act of nonfeasance or omission, and nothing more. The servant or agent is personally liable to third persons for doing something, i. e., committing a positive act, which he ought not to have done, but not for not doing something which he ought to have done. In the latter case he is liable only to his employer. Kelly v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1903) 122 Fed. 286.

Where a miner was injured by defects in a ladderway leading from one level to another, and sued the mine captain for damages on the theory that it was his duty to see that the way was safe, the court said the only negligence charged against him is simply nonfeasance, in that he failed to perform the positive duty of the master properly to inspect and repair the ladderway. Upon well-established principles of the common law he was not liable to third persons or coemployees for nonfeasance. For that he is liable only to his employer. Floyd v. Shenango Furnace Co. (1911) 186 Fed. 539.

Where a servant engaged in cleaning tar from a boiler or vat was badly scalded by a piece of false bottom splashing the tar, and brought an action against the superintendent of construction as well as the employer, alleging negligence in using a defective appliance, and failing to warn him of the danger, the court said the claim was that the superintendent was guilty, at most, of nonfeasance, and not of misfeasance, such as would make him, an employee, liable. Plunkett v. Gulf Ref. Co. (1919) 259 Fed. 968. The court says: "Taking this declaration altogether, the only possible wrong that can be charged to the defendant Plunkett is that, knowing the tar tank to have a false bottom, he failed to give the plaintiff notice thereof. The only thing, according to the declaration, which caused injury to the plaintiff, was the falling of the false bottom into the tar, causing it to splash on the plaintiff, severely burning him. . . . The most that the defendant Plunkett could be responsible for is for not telling the plaintiff of this false bottom and that it was likely to fall, and that is clearly nonfeasance. And it is well settled . . . by the authorities, that for mere nonfeasance an employee of a corporation will not be liable to a third person for injuries received."

of the water tanks and appliances was sued for injuries to a brakeman because of his alleged failure to remedy a defect to which his attention had been called. The court said that the evidence did not show what his authority over the structure was, whether he could have placed it further from the track or supplied different appliances, or that he had it in his power to do anything more than he had done. But the court says: "Assuming that it was the duty of Mitchell to keep these tanks and appliances in repair, and that the water pipe that struck appellant was hanging too low down, Mitchell could not be held liable to appellant, unless a servant, such as Mitchell was, is liable for nonfeasance, or for his failure to affirmatively take some action to remedy defects or dangerous appliances to which his attention may be directed." And the court, on the authority of the Robertson Case, held that the employee was not liable; but it will be remembered that in Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Robertson (1903) 115 Ky. 858, 74 S. W. 1061, the employee used in repair the materials which were furnished him, so that he was not in fact negligent; while in the Dudley Case, he did not do so, but left a known dangerous condition, to the injury of his coemployee. The case is explained, however, in Ward v. Pullman Car Corp. (1908) 131 Ky. 142, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 343, 114 S. W. 754, as resting upon the ground that the servant had done all that was in his power, and therefore was not negligent.

In Burns v. Pethcal (1894) 75 Hun, 437, 27 N. Y. Supp. 499, an action was brought to recover for the death of a laborer in a trench, against the foreman of the job, who was alleged to have been negligent in permitting the laborer to work at the place where the accident occurred, because of its dangerous condition. The court was of opinion that the evidence did not show any negligence on his part, but placed its ruling against the liability on the ground that the foreman was guilty of nonfeasance only, if negligent at all. The court says: "The conflict in the authorities upon this question is more apparent than real. It has arisen to a great extent from a failure to observe clearly the distinction between misfeasance and nonfeasance, and from an omission to point out the fact that while a servant is liable in the one case, he is not in the other. Disregarding this distinction, some judges and authors have stated in general terms that a servant is liable for his own negligence to a person injured thereby. Such a statement is inaccurate and misleading. Nonfeasance is the omission of an act which a person ought to do. Misfeasance is the improper doing of an act which a person might lawfully do. If the duty omitted by the agent or servant devolved upon him purely from his agency or employment, his omission is only of a duty he owes his principal or master, and the master alone is liable. While if the duty rests upon him in his individual character, and was one that the law imposed upon him independently of his agency or employment, then he is liable. . . . We are of the opinion that, as the defendant in this action was charged only with nonfeasance, and not with misfeasance, and as the evidence disclosed that the defendant was guilty only of an omission of duty which devolved upon him, if at all, purely from his employment, and not in his individual character, he was not, under the principle of the authorities cited, liable for the injury to the plaintiff's intestate, and that the court erred in refusing to grant the defendant's motion for a nonsuit."

In Cheatham v. Red River Line (1893) 56 Fed. 248, reversed on other grounds in (1894) 9 C. C. A. 124, 23 U. S. App. 19, 60 Fed. 517, which was in the Federal court in Louisiana, an action was brought against the master and owners of a vessel for death of a deck hand alleged to have been killed through the negligent handling of the boat. The court said it did not think the action would lie against the master. He was acting avowedly as the agent of others and within the scope of his authority, and he was guilty of no wilful or malicious act. His acts are, therefore, by the well-settled principles of law, those of his principal alone.

In Carey v. Rochereau (1883) 16 Fed. 87, there was nothing in the report of the case to show what the delict on the part of the agent was, but the court says an agent is liable only to his principal for nonfeasance. At common law, this proposition is not disputed. The same is true under the law of Louisiana. It is very doubtful if the agent per se is liable to a third person on any account. A person acting as agent for another is liable for his own misfeasance, but this results not from the agency, but in spite of it.

In Henshaw v. Noble (1857) 7 Ohio St. 226, which was an action against owners, contractors, and servants, for negligently excavating on property adjoining that in which plaintiff's goods were stored, so that the building was thrown down, to the injury of such goods, it was objected that an action on the case for negligence could not be maintained by a third person against an agent, where the negligence consists of omission of duty imposed. The court says: "The agent is . . . personally liable to third persons for his own misfeasance and positive wrongs. But he is not, in general, liable to third persons for his own nonfeasances or omissions of duty in the course of his employment. His liability in these latter cases is solely to his principal, there being no privity between him and such third persons; the privity exists only between him and his principal. And hence the general maxim, as to all such negligences and omissions of duty, is, in cases of private agency, 'respondeat superior.' . . . A mere nonfeasance, or neglect to perform a duty, however wrongful such negligence may be, cannot constitute a technical trespass, which is a positive act of misfeasance, accompanied with force. For such acts of misfeasance, all the agents, and those under whose authority they act, are jointly and severally liable. If, therefore, the injury for which the plaintiff sues in this case was occasioned by the digging in the street, or upon the adjacent premises leased to Curtis and Brown, we apprehend trespass would not be the proper remedy. Curtis and Brown might lawfully dig a cellar upon their own premises, and they might lawfully dig in the street, by the license of the proper authority. Neither of these acts is a direct, forcible invasion of the plaintiff's premises. Their wrongful character arises solely from the careless and negligent manner in which they were performed; from a want of such precautionary measures as the law demanded under the circumstances, in order to prevent consequential injury to the plaintiff's property. For this want of care and consequential injury, the remedy is by action on the case; and the liability of the defendants must be determined by the rules governing cases of negligence, and not by those applicable to trespass."

In Delaney v. Rochereau (1882) 34 La. Ann. 1123, 44 Am. Rep. 456, agents of a nonresident owner of a building permitted the gallery in front of it to become out of repair and dangerous. They permitted the property to stand vacant, and one evening, without their knowledge, third persons gained admission to it and proceeded to hold a party, during which the gallery fell, precipitating guests of the party to the sidewalk, and killing one, for whose death the agents were sought to be held liable. There is nothing to show any liability whatever to the persons who had taken possession of the property, because they were plainly trespassers; but the court says the theory on which the suit rests is that the agents are liable to third persons injured for their nonfeasance. The court says: "At common law, an agent is personally responsible to third parties for doing something which he ought not to have done, but not for not doing something which he ought to have done; the agent, in the latter case, being liable to his principal only. For nonfeasance, or mere neglect in the performance of duty, the responsibility therefor must arise from some express or implied obligation between particular parties standing in privity of law or contract with each other. No man is bound to answer for such violation of duty or obligation except to those to whom he has become directly bound or amenable for his conduct. Everyone, whether he is principal or agent, is responsible directly to persons injured by his own negligence, in fulfilling obligations resting upon him in his individual character, and which the law imposes upon him, independent of contract. No man increases or diminishes his obligations to strangers by becoming an agent. If, in the course of his agency, he comes in contact with the person or property of a stranger, he is liable for any injury he may do to either by his negligence in respect to duties imposed by law upon him in common with all other men.

An agent is not responsible to third persons for any negligence in the performance of duties devolving upon him purely from his agency, since he cannot, as agent, be subject to any obligations towards third persons other than those of his principal. Those duties are not imposed upon him by law. He has agreed with no one, except his principal, to perform them. In failing to do so, he wrongs no one but his principal, who alone can hold him responsible."

c. Cases recognizing liability for nonfeasance.

1. In general.

The numerical weight of authority as well as of reason ignores the fact that the delict of the agent was a mere nonfeasance toward his master, and tests the question by the duty which the servant owes to the person injured.

It will be noticed that the above list contains citations from two or three states which appear in the list in the preceding subdivision. This may be accounted for, perhaps, by the fact that the cases may be distinguished on the facts; but if not, the cases upholding the liability are the more recent, so that they must be regarded as representing the present rule in those states.

Where an action was brought against the managing agent of a corporation which had contracted to construct a building adjacent to a sidewalk, for injury caused to a passer-by by a brick which fell from the top of the building, the court said: "If the proof had shown that the injury resulted from culpable negligence in the construction of the wall, the agent in control, by whose orders it was thus constructed, would be guilty of misfeasance, and jointly liable with the contractor. We think all the authorities are to this effect. . . . The second count charges the defendants with neglect, in their failure or omission to erect scaffold or guards so as to prevent brick from falling to the ground. On this proposition the defendant Thompson invokes the doctrine that an agent or servant is not liable for a mere omission or nonfeasance. . . . The principle upon which the rule is founded, as declared by Story, is that there is no privity between the servant or agent and third persons, but the privity exists only between him and the master and principal. This relation of privity is that from which arises the maxim 'respondeat superior.' The liability of the principal or master to third persons does not depend upon any privity between him and such third persons. It is the privity between the master and servant that creates the liability of the master for injuries sustained by third persons on account of misfeasance and nonfeasance of the servant or agent. It is difficult to apply the same principles which govern in matters of contract between an agent and third persons to the torts of an agent which inflict injury on third persons, whether they be of misfeasance or nonfeasance, or to give a sound reason why a person who, acting as principal, would be individually liable to third persons for an omission of duty, becomes exempt from liability for the same omission of duty because he was acting as servant or agent. The tort is none the less a tort to the third person, whether suffered from one acting as principal or agent; and his rights ought to be the same against the one whose neglect of duty has caused the injury. . . . We hold that the mere relation of agency does not exempt a person from liability for any injury to third persons, resulting from his neglect of duty, for which he would otherwise be liable." Mayer v. Thompson-Hutchison Bldg. Co. (1894) 104 Ala. 611, 28 L.R.A. 433, 53 Am. St. Rep. 88, 16 So. 620.

In Haynes v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. (1911) 145 Ky. 209, 140 S. W. 176, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 719, which was an action for death of a fireman because of alleged negligence of the engineer, the court held that the evidence did not show that he was negligent, but said: "If the accident had been caused by either misfeasance or nonfeasance amounting to a breach of duty on the part of the engineer, we would hold him liable. In some jurisdictions the servant is not held accountable to third persons for nonfeasance, but is for misfeasance; but a contrary rule, and one that is in accord with the weight of modern authority, prevails in this state. We do not recognize any distinction, so far as the accountability of the servant is concerned, between acts of misfeasance and nonfeasance. . . . If a servant performs in an unlawful manner an act that results in injury to a third person, or if a servant fails to observe a duty that he owes to third persons, and injury results from his fault of omission, he is liable in damages. There is no reason for making a distinction between acts of commission and omission, when each involves a breach of duty. The servant is not personally liable in either case because the breach of duty was committed by him while acting in the capacity of servant, but responsibility attaches to him as an individual wrongdoer, without respect to the position in which he acts, or the relation he bears to some other person. It is the fact that the servant is guilty of a wrongful or negligent act amounting to a breach of duty that he owes to the injured person that makes him liable. It is not at all material whether his wrongful or negligent act is committed in an affirmative or wilful manner, or results from mere nonattention to a duty that he owes to third persons, and that it is entirely within his power to perform or omit to perform. There are innumerable situations and conditions presented in the everyday affairs of life that make it the duty of persons to so act as not to harm others, and when any person, whatever his position or relation in life may be, fails, from negligence, inattention, or wilfulness, to perform the duty imposed, he will be liable."

In Rising v. Ferris (1919) 216 Ill. App. 252, where the manager of a theater was sought to be held liable for negligence in leaving an unguarded electric switchboard where a child, taking part in a performance on the stage, came in contact with it and was injured, liability was resisted on the ground that the manager was not liable for mere nonfeasance. The court held that the statements of nonliability under such circumstances were too broad, in that they seemingly failed to recognize the fact that an agent may, in some cases, owe a duty to third persons at the same time that he owes a duty to his principal; and that the common duty to guard the rights of others is none the less binding upon a person because he happens to be, at the time, an agent. And the court held the manager guilty of such negligence as to render him personally liable.

pole across a highway, to the injury of a passer-by, he contended that his negligence, at most, was mere nonfeasance, and that a servant is not answerable for mere nonfeasance,—that failure to perform his duty made him answerable only to his employer. And the court said that it was not his position as servant, but his relation as an individual wrongdoer to the person injured, which fixed his liability. 'It was this defendant's duty to inspect and maintain the poles. He owed travelers an affirmative duty, in the exercise of reasonable care, to inspect and maintain the poles in safety. For his negligent failure to perform this duty, whether it be called nonfeasance or misfeasance, liability attaches to him in favor of one injured by it. Murray v. Cowherd (1912) 148 Ky. 591, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 617, 147 S. W. 6.

In Southern R. Co. v. Sewell (1916) 18 Ga. App. 544, 90 S. E. 94, special attention is directed to a statement found in 31 Cyc. 1559, that while an agent is not responsible to third persons for injury resulting from nonfeasance, the meaning of the term "nonfeasance" in this connection is confined to the omission by the agent to perform a duty which he owes solely to his principal by reason of his agency. In other words, if the injuries arise on account of the failure to perform a duty which he has undertaken to perform by virtue of a contract with his principal, but which nevertheless (when once undertaken) involves an obligation on his part to third persons or to the public generally, he must perform the duty, which is not in that case solely to his master, in such a way that injury may not result to third persons on account of negligent, reckless, or wanton failure on his part to carry out and perform the duty he has so undertaken to perform.

Where a gas company under contract to supply gas to a city for illuminating purposes, and to keep the service pipe in repair, was sued for injuries to occupants of abutting property because of gas escaping from a defective pipe, it contended that its duty was merely to the city, whose agent it was, and any neglect to perform it could be regarded only as a nonfeasance for which it would not be liable to third persons. Consolidated Gas Co. v. Connor (1910) 114 Md. 140, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 809, 78 Atl. 725. The court says: "The distinction between these two classes of negligence has been frequently considered, and it is well settled that nonfeasance is the nonperformance of a duty for which the agent is liable only to his principal, while misfeasance is the improper performance of a duty for which the agent is liable to third persons injured by such negligence. If, for example, the gas company in this case had failed to supply gas to the city lamps, in accordance with its contract, this would have been a nonfeasance, for which the company would have been responsible only to the city. But when, in carrying out the contract, it distributes the gas through defective pipes, and thus permits it to escape into the streets and houses of the city, there is manifestly involved an affirmative element of negligence amounting to misfeasance, and for this the company is liable to anyone who may suffer in consequence."

A demurrer to a declaration to hold persons who had contracted to furnish heat to a mill liable for injury to goods of a tenant of the basement of the mill through the bursting of water pipes in the mill, due to failure to furnish the heat, was overruled in Pittsfield Cottonwear Mfg. Co. v. Pittsfield Shoe Co. (1902) 71 N. H. 522, 60 L.R.A. 116, 53 Atl. 807, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 363. The court says the ground of defendant's liability to others is explained upon the analogy of the liability of a servant to third persons. As a general rule, a servant or agent who has contracted to perform a duty owed by his master or employer is liable only to his employer for his mere failure to perform such duty, and is not liable to third persons. So long as the servant does nothing, his contract creates no liability to third persons; but the moment he enters upon the work, the obligation of care arises. He cannot create a dangerous situation and suddenly abandon the work without care for the danger to others.

An insurance company which, upon insuring a steam boiler, takes upon itself the duty of inspection and management of the boiler, is liable to a stranger injured by explosion of the boiler, due to its failure properly to perform its obligation. Van Winkle v. American Steam Boiler Co. (1890) 52 N. J. L. 240, 19 Atl. 472. The court says: "In all cases in which any person undertakes the performance of an act which, if not done with care and skill, will be highly dangerous to the persons or lives of one or more persons, known or unknown, the law, ipso facto, imposes as a public duty the obligation to exercise such care and skill. The law hedges round the lives and persons of men with much more care than it employs when guarding their property, so that, in this particular, it makes, in a way, everyone his brother's keeper; and therefore it may well be doubted whether, in any supposable case, redress should be withheld from an innocent person who has sustained immediate damage by the neglect of another in doing an act which, if carelessly done, threatens, in a high degree, one or more persons with death or great bodily harm."

In New York & W. Printing Teleg. Co. v. Dryburg (1860) 35 Pa. 298, 78 Am. Dec. 338, which involved the question of the liability of a telephone company to a sendee for missending the message, it was contended that there was no liability, because the corporation was the agent of the sender, and was therefore not liable to the sendee for negligence. The court says: "For nonfeasance, I agree, the agent is responsible only to his employer, because there is no privity of consideration betwixt the agent and a third party. The remedy in such cases must be sought in the maxim 'respondeat superior;' but, even to this rule, there is an exception in the instance of masters of ships, who, although they are the agents or servants of the owners, are also, in many respects, deemed to be responsible as principals to third persons, not only for their own negligences and nonfeasances, but for those of subordinate officers and others employed under them." And the court held that the company was guilty of misfeasance for which the action would lie.

One who, having been employed to haul logs, obtains permission to go through a neighbor's property on condition that the gate be kept shut to prevent escape of hogs pastured there, is liable for loss of hogs, due to his failure to keep the gate shut. Horner v. Lawrence (1874) 37 N. J. L. 46. The court says the loss was due to his own misfeasance, for which he cannot claim exemption as agent, against the claim of the person injured.

Where the conductor of a vestibule train refused to open the door to relieve a passenger whom he knew was clinging to the handrails in a perilous position, so that he fell from the train and was injured, the court said: "The conductor was under contract to operate the train of the railway company between certain points on its line, on certain days or during certain periods. Had he failed altogether to take charge of the train on any particular day or date, as required by his contract with the railway company, and in consequence of his failure to perform his contractual obligation the train had departed on its journey in charge of some flagman or other underling, through whose incompetency injury resulted to passengers thereon or to the general public, or if, on account of a breach of his contract, the departure of the train was delayed and damage thus resulted to any patron of the railway company, the persons injured would have no right of action against him, but the master alone might call him to account for the breach of his contract. He would be guilty of nonfeasance, in that he had failed to perform a duty which he owed solely to the master; that is, the duty of running and operating the train of the master in accordance with the contract between himself and the master. On the other hand, where a conductor undertakes to operate the train in compliance with his obligation to his master, but in its operation neglects to observe that degree of care and caution required of him, or improperly performs some duty, and injury results to a third person thereby, the injured person has a right of action against him as well as against the master, because the negligent performance of the duty undertaken amounts to more than nonfeasance, and may properly be characterized either as misfeasance or malfeasance. . . . While running the train, the conductor was in the performance of a duty which exacted from him a due regard for the rights and safety of the public; and it cannot be said that he would incur no personal or individual liability if, on account of his failure to perform his duty towards the general public, injury resulted to one of that public, even though the injured person was at fault." Southern R. Co. v. Sewell (1916) 18 Ga. App. 544, 90 S. E. 94.

Where a locomotive engineer negligently injured a track hand, it was contended that he was not liable to third persons for mere omission of duty, but the court said: "This contention overlooks the theory that a servant owes duties to third persons as well as to his master. A servant or employee of a corporation cannot well escape liability for the nonperformance of a duty which he owes to an injured third party. . . . If it were granted that Johnson was not liable for mere nonfeasance, he would nevertheless be liable for the negligence charged against him in appellee's petition. The allegation is that he carelessly and recklessly ran down and injured appellee with an engine of which he was in charge. This amounts to a charge of violating his duty to appellee and of doing something to the latter's injury. Johnson's act was something more than a breach of contract with his master or an omission of duty to the railway company. It was a positive wrong to appellee,—a misfeasance,—and he cannot be relieved from liability for it because of his contract relation with his master." Dowell v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1910) 83 Kan. 562, 112 Pac. 136. This proposition was approved by the United States Supreme Court in (1913) 229 U. S. 102, 57 L. ed. 1090, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 684.

In an action against a section boss for injuries arising to a traveler on the highway by falling into a trench which he had dug across the highway for drainage purposes and failed to cover, it was contended that the petition charged only an act of nonfeasance. The court said it must be remembered that misfeasance may be negligence only. The section boss would be guilty of misfeasance if the ditch were improperly dug or improperly guarded, or if, without regard to the rights of others, it was negligently left in such a condition as to endanger the public or passers-by. Misfeasance is the omission to do an act as it should be done. The court summarizes by saying misfeasance is the improper doing of an act which the agent might lawfully do. Where the agent fails to use reasonable care or diligence in the performance of a duty, he will be personally responsible to a third person who is injured. His liability in such cases is put upon the ground that he is a wrongdoer, and, as such, responsible. Southern R. Co. v. Rowe (1907) 2 Ga. App. 557, 59 S. E. 462.

"It is doubtless true that if an agent never does anything towards carrying out his contract with his principal, but wholly omits and neglects to do so, the principal is the only person who can maintain any action against him for the nonfeasance. But if the agent once actually undertakes and enters upon the execution of a particular work, it is his duty to use reasonable care in the manner of executing it, so as not to cause any injury to third persons which may be the natural consequence of his acts; and he cannot, by abandoning its execution midway and leaving things in a dangerous condition, exempt himself from liability to any person who suffers injury by reason of his having so left them without proper safeguards. This is not nonfeasance, or doing nothing; but it is misfeasance,—doing improperly." Osborne v. Morgan (1881) 130 Mass. 103, 39 Am. Rep. 437.

2. Management of property.

A situation which brings out very clearly the inadequacy of the formula that an agent is liable for misfeasance, but not for nonfeasance, to solve the question of liability, is that where an agent having charge of property, with authority to care for and rent it, permits it to become out of repair by a mere act of nonfeasance, so that someone is injured by its defective condition. Here, he owes a duty to the property owner to keep the property in repair; but having sole charge of it, and being, perhaps, the only one to whom the public can look for redress in case of injury, because of nonresidence of the property owner, there is a strong tendency on the part of the courts to hold the agent personally liable.

Thus, an agent having absolute control and management of property for rental purposes is liable for letting the property with a rotten and unsafe railing to the veranda, which gives way, to the injury of the tenant. The contention was that defendant was not liable, because his act was a mere nonfeasance, but the court says: "The reason assigned to sustain this rule is that the responsibility must arise from some express or implied obligations between the particular parties standing in privity of law or contract with each other. If this be true, it is difficult to see what difference there is in the obligation of their principal between the commission of an act by the agents which they are bound to their principal not to do and the omission of an act which they have obligated themselves to their principal to do. They certainly stand in privity of law or contract with their principal exactly as much in the one instance as in the other, for the obligation to do what ought to be done is no more strongly implied in the ordinary contract of agency than is the obligation not to do what ought not to be done. This reason for the rule not being tenable, and no other reason being obvious, the rule itself ought not to obtain; for jurisprudence does not concern itself with such attenuated refinements. It rests upon broad and comprehensive principles in its attempt to promote rights and redress wrongs. If it takes note of a distinction, such distinction will be a practical one, founded on a difference in principle, and not a distinction without a difference; and there can be no distinction in principle between the acts of a servant who puts in motion an agency which, in its wrongful operations, injures his neighbor, and the acts of a servant who, when he sees such agency in motion, and when it is his duty to control it, negligently refuses to do his duty, and suffers it to operate to the damage of another. . . . If the omission of the act or the nonfeasance does not involve a nonperformance of duty, then the responsibility would not attach. If it does involve a nonperformance of duty to such an extent that the agent is liable to the principal for the damages ensuing from his neglect, there is no hardship in compelling him to respond directly to the injured party. . . . Instances in the ordinary transactions of life might be multiplied almost without end, the very statement of which shows conclusively the fallacy of the rule. . . . The obligation, whether for misfeasance or nonfeasance, does not rest in contract at all, but is a common-law obligation devolving upon every responsible person to so use that which he controls as not to injure another, whether he is in the operation of his own property as principal, or in the operation of the property of another as agent." Lough v. John Davis & Co. (1902) 30 Wash. 204, 59 L.R.A. 802, 94 Am. St. Rep. 848, 70 Pac. 491.

An agent in charge of property of his nonresident principal, who rents the property with knowledge that it is unsafe, is personally liable for injuries caused by the defects. Baird v. Shipman (1890) 132 Ill. 16, 7 L.R.A. 128, 22 Am. St. Rep. 504, 23 N. E. 384. The court says: "An agent is liable to his principal only for mere breach of his contract with his principal. He must have due regard to the rights and safety of third persons. He cannot, in all cases, find shelter behind his principal. . . . It is not his contract with the principal which exposes him to or protects him from liability to third persons, but his common-law obligation to so use that which he controls as not to injure another. That obligation is neither increased nor diminished by his entrance upon the duties of agency, nor can its breach be excused by the plea that his principal is chargeable."

In an action to hold the agent of a building liable for negligence in permitting the fastening of an elevator door to become out of order, so that the door stood open and plaintiff fell into the well, where it was objected that the negligence was mere nonfeasance for which the company was not liable, the court said: "The real ground, as we see it, for the application or nonapplication of the rule as to liability, is not one of agency, but a question of the duty imposed by general principles of law upon the owner, or those in control of property for him, to so use or manage the property as not to injure the property of another by its negligent use, or to injure the person of another who is where he has a right to be, or is in the use of property, for which use he pays. There is a privity in law, by virtue of which everyone in charge of property is under obligation to so use it as not to injure another. It is a duty imposed by law, it is true, but privity arises from the obligation to those in a situation to insist upon its respect, and the neglect of performance must, in order to render the agent liable, be neglect of performance of a duty which he owes third persons, independent of and apart from the agency, which arises from contract. . . . In the case at bar, even upon the theory of an agent not being liable for nonfeasance, but for misfeasance or malfeasance only, the nonfeasance was not inspecting or not keeping the elevator apparatus in repair, and the misfeasance in causing it to be operated in that condition. If . . . nonfeasance is held to apply only to cases where the agent fails to enter upon the performance of his contractual obligations, and not to cases where he has entered upon such performance, but neglected his duties in some respects, the confusion would not arise. That is to say, that for failure to perform his contractual obligations to his principal, a third person cannot hold him liable; but for negligence of omission or commission, after he has undertaken performance, he is liable under common-law rules. The violation of a duty giving rise to injury and a cause of action arises as much and as frequently from omission to do a thing which ought to be done in the discharge of his duty to his principal,—nonfeasance,—as in doing it in the discharge of that duty, in such a manner as to injure another,—misfeasance." Tippecanoe Loan & T. Co. v. Jester (1913) 180 Ind. 357, L.R.A.1915E, 721, 101 N. E. 915.

In Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co. (1873) 62 Me. 552, 16 Am. Rep. 503, where the agents in charge of a wharf to which the public were invited let it become out of repair, so that one going there on business fell through a hole in the planking, the court said that the agents were in no better position than their principal. It was the actual personal negligence of the agents that constituted the constructive negligence of the principal. When the acts or neglect of the agents result in injuries to third persons, they are equally responsible with their principals.

An agent having charge of the erection of a building is personally liable for failure to replace a walk in front of it, which was torn up by workmen so as to render it unsafe for passers-by. Ellis v. McNaughton (1889) 76 Mich. 237, 15 Am. St. Rep. 308, 42 N. W. 1113. The court says he was bound to use reasonable care in the erection of the building so as not to cause injury to third persons. "To say that he only was guilty of a nonfeasance—an omission of duty to his principal—does not cover the case. He not only omitted a duty he owed to the traveling public, but by his acts he increased the danger, and every day committed a wrong and was guilty of a misfeasance in keeping this walk torn up, and using it as a driveway, in the execution of a particular work which he had entered upon, and of which he had complete superintendence and control. Irrespective of his relation to his principal, he was bound, while doing the work, to so use the premises, including this sidewalk, as not to injure others. Misfeasance may involve, to some extent, the idea of not doing; as where an agent, while engaged in the performance of his undertaking, does not do something which it was his duty to do under the circumstances; as, for instance, when he does not exercise that care which a due regard for the rights of others would require. This is not doing, but it is the not doing of that which is not imposed upon the agent merely by his relation to his principal, but of that which is imposed upon him by law as a responsible individual in common with all other members of society. It is the same not doing which constitutes negligence in any relation, and is actionable."

In Orcutt v. Century Bldg. Co. (1907) 201 Mo. 424, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 929, 99 S. W. 1062, an agent having entire charge of a building was held personally liable for injuries caused by negligent operation of an elevator in it. The court says: We concede that for mere nonfeasance, pure and simple, the agent or servant is not liable to third persons. But when the agent undertakes the management of the building, it undertakes to do for the principal a particular work; and after it enters upon the performance of the work, any act which it does, whether by omission or commission, is misfeasance. After making this contract, had it stood aloof and refused to take the management of the building, and in so doing thereby failed to do something which resulted in injury to a third person, it would not have been liable, because we would thus have had mere nonfeasance. But after it assumed the management and thereby commenced to do the work it contracted and agreed to do, then acts of omission or commission constituted misfeasance, or failure properly to do things which it had, in the line of its duty, commenced to do.

Where the agent in charge of a tenement building, in constructing a walk along a common passage, left a hole in it, into which a tenant fell and was injured, the court says: "All hold that the agent is liable to a third party for misfeasance and for acts of positive wrong. . . . A difficulty often arises to determine, under the facts and circumstances of the case, whether the act of the agent was misfeasance or mere nonfeasance. Plaintiff insists that the making of the hole in the court common to all the tenants occupying the premises, and leaving it open, in the circumstances shown in the evidence, exposed the tenants to danger and was a positive wrong,—a misfeasance. Defendant, on the contrary, argues that the making of the hole was a necessary improvement, and leaving it open was a mere omission of duty, and therefore should be classed as nonfeasance. . . . Defendant directed and superintended the construction of the hole or trap, had exclusive control of and supervision over the premises; and plaintiff's evidence tends to show he left the hole uncovered, and thus exposed the tenants to danger. In these circumstances, the omission to cover the hole was not mere nonfeasance, but a violation of the duty defendant owed the plaintiff and other tenants; it was a positive wrong for which he is liable." Carson v. Quinn (1907) 127 Mo. App. 525, 105 S. W. 1088.

Executors who, as such, care for and lease property belonging to the estate, are personally liable for injuries to a pedestrian, due to the unsafe condition of a coalhole in the sidewalk in front of the property. Belvin v. French (1887) 84 Va. 81, 3 S. E. 891. The court says it was the duty of the defendants to keep the cover in a safe and secure condition, and this duty, without any sufficient excuse, they failed to perform. A fiduciary ought not to be permitted to manage a trust estate in his hands in such manner as to injure others with impunity so far as any personal liability on his part is concerned, and to hold that defendants are not personally liable in this case would be as inconsistent with natural justice as with the well-settled principles of the common law.

An agent for the care and rental of property is liable to a tenant when he employs an incompetent person to repair a walk on the premises, and falsely informs the tenant that the walk is repaired and safe. Wells v. Hansen (1916) 97 Kan. 305, L.R.A. 1916F, 566, 154 Pac. 1033, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 230.

Where an agent in charge of city property employs men to make an excavation in the sidewalk in front of it, he is personally liable in case the excavation becomes a nuisance, and a passer-by is injured by falling into it. The court said that he is guilty of a misfeasance. McNaughton v. Elkhart (1882) 85 Ind. 384. But in that case the court held that it agreed with counsel that there are cases where the agent employed about his master's business, and acting under his direction, is not liable to third persons for mere omissions.

One employed to repair a walk on leased premises is liable for injury to the tenant if he makes insufficient repairs, but reports to the tenant that the walk is safe and ready for use. Wells v. Hansen (Kan.) supra.

In Bannigan v. Woodbury (1909) 158 Mich. 206, 133 Am. St. Rep. 371, 122 N. W. 531, which involved the liability of an administrator for injury caused by the dangerous condition of property under his control, the court says an agent in the control of property is responsible for his own tortious acts. And judgment in favor of plaintiff was reversed on a second appeal in that case for admission of incompetent evidence, but the court does not seem to question the soundness of the rule as above laid down. (1911) 166 Mich. 491, 132 N. W. 77.

The cases which have not held those intrusted with the care of buildings liable for injuries caused by their failure to keep them in repair are as follows:

ELMER F. BURROWS, Admr., etc., of Mabel E. Burrows, Deceased,
v.

GLADYS T. BURROWS, Appt.

Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court — March 2, 1922.

(— Mass. —, 134 N. E. 271.)

Gift — by check — validity.

1. Delivery by the drawer of his personal check to the payee does not constitute a valid gift inter vivos or causa mortis, but it is revocable at any time before presentation to the drawee, and is revoked by death of the drawer.

Assignment — of funds in bank — effect of check.

2. That a check is for the whole amount which the drawer has on deposit does not take it out of the operation of a statute providing that a check does not operate as an assignment of the funds to the credit of the drawer until accepted by the bank.

Gift — accompanying check with pass book — effect.

3. That a gift of a check on a commercial bank is accompanied by the drawer's pass book does not make it valid.

— effect of permitting bank to pay checks.

4. A gift of a check not collected before death of the drawer is not validated by a statute permitting the bank to pay checks during a specified time after the drawer's death.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Appellate Division vacating the finding of the Superior Court for Suffolk County (Murray, J.) in her favor and ordering judgment for plaintiff, in an action brought to recover the proceeds of a check claimed by defendant as a gift from plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Toye, Halligan, & Murray, for appellant:

The bank "transferred" the "account to the defendant's own name," without notice of the drawer's death, within ten days after her death. This it had a right to do under the statute.

E. 245; Schuler v. Laclede Bank, 27 Fed. 424.

This was a valid gift inter vivos, but if this fails it is a valid gift causa mortis.

Pierce v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank, 129 Mass. 425, 37 Am. Rep. 371; Grover v. Grover, 24 Pick. 261, 35 Am. Dec. 319.

The delivery was as complete as the donor and donee could make it. The donor parted with ownership, and left nothing essential to be done in the future.

Moore v. O'Hare, 224 Mass. 283, 112 N. E. 863.

Messrs. Herbert L. Pratt and Francis J. Geogan, for appellee:

Delivery of the pass book gives no title.

Chase v. Redding, 13 Gray, 418; Mitchell v. Pease, 7 Cush. 350; Harmon v. Osgood, 151 Mass. 501, 24 N. E. 401.

Crosby, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by the administrator of the estate of Mabel E. Burrows to recover the proceeds of a check, drawn by the intestate on the Commonwealth Trust Company, and payable to the order of her daughter, who is the defendant. The husband of the intestate is the plaintiff. The circumstances respecting the making and delivery of the check, briefly stated, are as follows:

The intestate, who had been in poor health, went to Florida, where she stayed from December, 1919, until April, 1920. She was accompanied by the defendant. The latter testified that on April 12, 1920, they boarded a train in Florida to return to their home in Scituate in this commonwealth; the next morning, while on the train, the mother complained of being ill; that she then told the defendant to get her check book, pen, and bank book, and bring them to her; that her mother then made the check in question, dated April 16, 1920, payable to the order of the defendant in the sum of $700, and said to her, "Gladys, this is for you. I want you to have it. You are young and you will need it," and handed her the check, together with her pass book issued by the trust company. She further testified that her mother died on the night of April 13, 1920, while on the train; that she kept the check and pass book until she cashed the check at the trust company on April 16, 1920; that the money on deposit with the company was money her mother had earned and saved and deposited in her own name.

The question is whether the defendant is entitled to retain the proceeds of the check, or is bound to account therefor to the administrator of her mother's estate.

There is no evidence which would warrant a finding that there was any valuable consideration for the delivery of the check. Although the defendant's counsel contends that the trial judge may have found that the defendant, being of full age, did not accompany her mother to Florida and minister to her wants without expecting to be paid for her services, there is no evidence to support that contention. The claim that the delivery of the check to the defendant was a valid gift, either inter vivos or mortis causa, cannot be sustained, nor can it be held to be a valid equitable assignment of the "entire deposit."

of funds in bank

General Laws, chap. 107, § 208, defines a check as follows: "A check is a bill of exchange drawn on a bank payable on demand." Section 212 provides that "a check of itself does not operate as an assignment of any part of the funds to the credit of the drawer with the bank, and the bank is not liable to the holder unless and until it accepts or certifies the check."

See Carr v. National Security Bank, 107 Mass. 45, 9 Am. Rep. 6; Beauregard v. Knowlton, 156 Mass. 395, 31 N. E. 389.

The circumstances that the check was for a sum equal to or in excess of the whole amount of the deposit due the intestate, instead of for a part of it, does not render the provision of § 212 inapplicable. As the check of itself did not operate as an assignment of any part of the funds, it did not so operate as to the whole of them; in other words, § 212 applies to the whole fund on deposit as well as to part of it. The general rule is well established, in this and many other jurisdictions, that the mere delivery of a donor's personal check or promissory note of itself does not constitute a valid gift, as it is revocable at any time before its presentation for payment, and is revoked by the death of the donor. Parish v. Stone, 14 Pick. 198, 25 Am. Dec. 378; Pierce v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank, 129 Mass. 425, 37 Am. Rep. 371; Gerry v. Howe, 130 Mass. 350; Re Bartlett, 163 Mass.

509, 514, 515, 40 N. E. 899; Mason v. Gardner, 186 Mass. 515, 71 N. E. 952; Re Beak (1872) L. R. 13 Eq. 489, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 470, 26 L. T. N. S. 281.

The delivery by the donor to the defendant of the bank pass book with the check did not make the gift valid. By delivery of a savings bank book a gift may be shown, and may be proved by the presentation of the bank book unaccompanied by an assignment. The reason for this is because of the peculiar character of such a bank book, as was pointed out in Pierce v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank, 129 Mass. 425, 37 Am. Rep. 371; Foss v. Lowell Five Cents Sav. Bank, 111 Mass. 285. An ordinary pass book, however, stands upon a different footing. Its production is not necessary to the withdrawal of funds; the presentation of a check or other order being required for that purpose. The production of the pass book will not entitle a depositor to withdraw any part of his deposit.

The death of the drawer before the check was presented for payment operated as a revocation of the order, and rendered it invalid either as a gift inter vivos or a gift mortis causa. Cases which relate to gifts by a donor of promissory notes or other choses in action of third persons stand upon a different footing and have no application to the facts in the case at bar. Grover v. Grover, 24 Pick. 261, 35 Am. Dec. 319; Slade v. Mutrie, 156 Mass. 19, 30 N. E. 168.

General Laws, chap. 107, § 17, protects a bank from liability by permitting it to pay a check or demand draft drawn on it by a depositor having funds on deposit to pay the same, notwithstanding his death, —effect of permitting bank to pay checks. upon presentation within ten days after its date; this statute does not effect the rights of the parties in the case at bar.

The order of the Appellate Division vacating the finding of the trial judge and ordering judgment for the plaintiff for $689.83 must be affirmed.

So ordered.

ANNOTATION.

Donor's own check as subject of gift.

I. Scope, 177.

II. Rules in general:

- a. Majority rule, 177.
- b. Minority rule, 182.
- c. Where contest is between donee and the public, 184.

I. Scope.

The annotation does not, in general, include cases involving checks on savings banks, where presentation of the pass book is essential to cashing of the check, these cases being for the most part distinguishable from ordinary checks and turning largely upon the pass-book feature. As making a distinction, see, for example, the reported case (BURROWS v. BURROWS, ante, 174).

The annotation is limited to checks, except that one or two cases are cited

III. Where check is for entire amount of deposit, 184.

IV. Where check is presented but not paid during donor's lifetime, 185.

V. Payment during donor's lifetime, 187.

VI. Miscellaneous, 188.

where the order was on a third person, and not on a bank. But cases of notes or bills of exchange generally are not included. The note also includes only those cases where the intended gift was of the donor's own check, and not the check of a third person. As to gifts of bills or notes of third persons, see annotation following Parker v. Moot, — A.L.R. —.

II. Rules in general.

In those states holding that a check does not operate as an assignment of the fund, it is clear that the donor's check, before payment or acceptance, cannot constitute a valid gift; delivery or consummation of the contract, placing it beyond the power of revocation by the donor, being an essential of such a gift; and a mere promise to make a gift being unenforceable. The difficulty with respect to a gift of the donor's check, if the check does not operate as an assignment, is that the mere delivery of the check to the donee, or to some other person for him, does not place the gift beyond the donor's power of revocation, prior to payment or acceptance. And there is the further consideration, if there is no assignment, that the death of the drawer works a revocation of the check; so that where the check is intended as a gift causa mortis and the donor dies before payment or acceptance, the death ordinarily revokes the gift. Whether the gift is inter vivos or causa mortis does not always appear, and, indeed, does not seem to be a material circumstance so far as the present question is concerned, although the point is for the most part preserved in the subsequent statement of the cases.

It may be noted that in most of the states in which the above cases were decided, the courts, in cases not within the scope of the annotation, have rejected the theory that a check constitutes an assignment of the fund. On this question, it appears that there was a conflict of authority before adoption of the Negotiable Instruments Law. The great weight of authority, however, was against the assignment theory, at least, if the check was not for the whole amount of a particular fund, in the absence of acceptance by the drawee. The Negotiable Instruments Law expressly provides that a check of itself does not operate as an assignment of any part of the funds to the credit of the drawer with the bank, and the bank is not liable to the holder unless and until it accepts or certifies the check. As to the effect of this law upon the theory of operation of a check as an assignment of the drawer's funds, see annotation following McClain & Norvet v. Torkelson, 5 A.L.R. 1667. It does not appear that the Negotiable Instruments Law settles the question whether a check of the donor may constitute a valid gift under the assignment doctrine. It is stated in the annotation above referred to that the provision of the law relating to a check operating as an assignment does not clearly indicate whether all the results that were ordinarily held to depend upon the assignment theory were intended to be affected, or only the one as to the holder's right to sue the bank.

It has been held immaterial whether the intended gift of the donor's check was a gift inter vivos or causa mortis, so far as regards the validity of the gift if the check is not accepted or paid prior to the drawer's death, the gift being invalid in either case because lacking a complete delivery. Pennell v. Ennis (1907) 126 Mo. App. 355, 103 S. W. 147; Pullen v. Placer County Bank (1902) 138 Cal. 169, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19, 66 Pac. 740, 71 Pac. 83.

"It is well settled that a gift cannot be effected by the delivery of a check upon an ordinary bank of deposit where the drawer's account is good for the amount. The reason is that until the check is cashed the drawer may stop payment. In such a case the donative purpose may be absolute when the check is given, and ten minutes, or ten hours, or ten days later, at any time before the check has been cashed, such donative purpose may be wholly changed and abrogated. The fundamental principle of the law of gifts is that the gift, to be effective, must place the thing donated beyond the control of the donor." Provident Inst. v. Sisters of the Poor (1916) 87 N. J. Eq. 424, 100 Atl. 894, affirmed on opinion of lower court in (1917) 88 N. J. Eq. 349, 102 Atl. 1053.

The death of the alleged donor was held in the reported case (BURROWS v. BURROWS, ante, 174) to effect a revocation of the alleged gift of a check not presented for payment until after such death, notwithstanding a statute protecting the bank from liability in case of payment of checks after death of the depositor, within a certain time. And the delivery of the pass book with the check was held not to change the result, the court distinguishing between an ordinary pass book, as in this case, where the production of the book was not necessary to the withdrawal of funds, and a savings bank book.

And in Re Beak (1872) L. R. 13 Eq. (Eng.) 489, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 470, 26 L. T. N. S. 281, where the check was given to the donee, together with the pass books of the drawer, who was then in his last illness, but the check was not presented for payment until after the death of the drawer, when payment was refused, the court held that the pass book was not the equivalent of a deposit note, and did not affect the rule that the drawer's estate is not liable for the amount of the check given to another but not presented for payment until after the donor's death.

A check delivered to the payee, but not payable until after the death of the maker, is not valid as a gift inter vivos. * Foxworthy v. Adams (1910) 136 Ky. 403, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 308, 124 S. W. 381, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 327.

And the delivery to the drawer's sons, of checks payable four days after his death for part of the funds in his name in banks, was held not a valid gift, in Curry v. Powers (1877) 70 N. Y. 212, 26 Am. Rep. 577, so as to be enforceable against the estate of the drawer after his death, since the drawer had the right to make other checks and thus retain control of the fund until his death, and there was no delivery essential to an executed gift. Although this was a savings bank case, and the pass-book feature was involved, the case appears to be authority for the above rule, independent of this element in it.

So, in Waynesburg College's Appeal (1886) 111 Pa. 130, 56 Am. Rep. 252, 3 Atl. 19, the delivery of a check made payable six months after the maker's death, to a payee named therein as trustee, was held not to be a valid gift. The court said that it was within the maker's power to control the gift or cancel and destroy the check; and that the facts were not sufficient to establish a gift inter vivos or to create a trust which equity would enforce.

And where an ordinary form of check printed on the back of a deposit note was signed by the depositor, and delivered to a donee, for a part of the fund, which, however, could not be withdrawn until seven days after notice, and during this period the drawer died, it was held in Re Mead (1880) L. R. 15 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 651, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 30, 43 L. T. N. S. 117, 28 Week Rep. 891, that the case came within the rule that the gift of a check on a bank, which is not payable during the donor's life, is not a valid gift causa mortis.

It was said in Re Bernard (1911)

2 Ont. Week. Notes, 716, 18 Ont. Week. Rep. 525, that the authorities are clear that a check not paid, either actually or constructively during the lifetime of the drawer, is not capable of being the subject of donatio mortis causa. And in this case where the check, which was delivered to a third party for safe-keeping, was accompanied by a written instruction that it was to be presented one month after the donor's death, the court, in disallowing the claim of the payee against the drawer's estate, said: "A check is not a chose in action, but merely a direction to someone who may or may not have in his possession funds of the drawer authorizing him to pay to the payee a certain sum of money. Death of the drawer before presentation revokes such authority. Thus, in this case, the claimant is met with two difficulties, each fatal to her claim, one being that the check, not having been acted upon by acceptance or payment, never lost its primary character of a mere check, which is not a chose in action, and is not the subject of donatio mortis causa; and the other being that the testatrix's death revoked the banker's authority to pay the check. It is not necessary to deal with the further question, whether there ever was any active or constructive delivery of the check."

In Harris v. Clark (1849) 3 N. Y. 93, 51 Am. Dec. 352, the donor's own draft upon a third person in favor of the donee was held not a valid gift causa mortis.

Attention is called, also, to Gerry v. Howe (1881) 130 Mass. 350, in which it was held that a written order or direction to one having charge of the donor's funds in the bank, to draw a certain amount and hand it to a certain person, is not a sufficient gift, where the direction is not obeyed.

The enforcement of a check as a gift against the donor himself is denied in Cloyes v. Cloyes (1885) 36 Hun (N. Y.) 145, where a check was given by husband to wife as a wedding present, and after its dishonor she brought an action against him thereon.

A similar decision was rendered in Easton v. Pratchett (1835) 1 Crompt. M. & R. 798, 149 Eng. Reprint, 1302, where the enforcement as a gift of a bill of exchange against one who drew the same in his own favor and indorsed it to the plaintiff was denied.

In Bainbridge v. Hoes (1914) 168 App. Div. 870, 149 N. Y. Supp. 20, where one contemplating suicide made out and mailed a check for substantially all of his deposits to his fiancée, payment of which after his death by suicide was refused, it was held that there was no valid gift either inter vivos or causa mortis.

And in Pullen v. Placer County Bank (1902) 138 Cal. 169, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19, 66 Pac. 740, 71 Pac. 83, where a father delivered his check to his son, stating that he wished the latter would not present the check until after the father's death, the son complying with this wish and not presenting the check and receiving payment until the day after the father's death, of which the bank had notice, it was held that there was no completed gift at the time of the father's death, and the bank was liable to his estate for the amount so paid out. The court said that a gift vests the donee with the absolute property in the thing given, and it is no longer subject to the control of the donor; but if, on the other hand, the thing given remains under the control of the donor, the gift is not complete.

It was said in McLellan v. McLellan (1911) 23 Ont. L. Rep. 654, affirmed in (1911) 25 Ont. L. Rep. 214, 20 Ont. Week. Rep. 673, that the law is well settled that the delivery of the donor's check, which is not presented before the donor's death is not a good donation mortis causa, because the death is a revocation of the authority to pay.

In Hewitt v. Kaye (1868) L. R. 6 Eq. (Eng.) 198, 37 L. J. Ch. N. S. 633, 16 Week. Rep. 835, where one in extremis gave a check for a charity, but died before it was possible to present the check, it was held that there was no completed gift causa mortis, and that the donee was not entitled to the fund. The court said the check was worth nothing until acted upon, and the authority to act upon it was withdrawn by the donor's death; and by way of illustration the court supposed a case where one directed another to bring money in a desk, stating that he would give the other person the money, but died before it was brought, in which case there would be no gift.

There is no doubt of the correctness of the contention, said the court in Nelson v. Diffenderfer (1914) 178 Mo. App. 48, 163 S. W. 271, that a gift of a check is not complete until the check is paid, and if the same is without consideration it may be revoked at any time before actual payment.

The death of the maker of a check, given by him to another without any consideration, revokes the gift, and the payee cannot recover the amount from the maker's estate. Cox v. Walker (1910) 140 Ky. 172, 140 Am. St. Rep. 367, 130 S. W. 984.

The proposition that a check drawn on the drawer's general account in a bank will not constitute a gift to the payee of the amount of the check, if it is neither accepted nor paid prior to the death of the drawer, rests on the ground that a complete delivery is essential to a valid gift, and the check of the donor is no more than a promise to give the amount specified. Pennell v. Ennis (1907) 126 Mo. App. 355, 103 S. W. 147.

See also Oldfield's Estate (1919) 72 Pa. Super. Ct. 340, involving an alleged gift of a check on a savings bank, in which the court said that it was universally conceded that there was no such thing recognized by the law as an executory gift; that this was for the simple reason that a mere promise to make a gift, being unsupported by a valuable consideration, is revocable at the pleasure of the prospective donor, and such a promise would clearly be revoked by operation of law by the death of the promisor.

Burke v. Bishop (1875) 27 La. Ann. 465, 21 Am. Rep. 567, contains a dictum to the effect that where a check is a gift, the death of the donor revokes the check because the demise revokes "the mandate to his agent, the bank."

b. Minority rule.

But although the prevailing rule is that above indicated, there are several cases which support the doctrine that one's check or draft may be the subject of a valid gift by the maker. Carter v. Greenway (1922) — Ark. —, 238 S. W. 65; First Nat. Bank v. O'Byrne (1913) 177 Ill. App. 473; May v. Jones (1893) 87 Iowa, 188, 54 N. W. 231; Lawson v. Lawson (1718) 1 P. Wms. 441, 24 Eng. Reprint, 463; Rolls v. Pearce (1877) L. R. 5 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 730, 46 L. J. Ch. N. S. 791, 36 L. T. N. S. 438, 25 Week. Rep. 899. (See also cases under III. infra, holding that a check of the entire amount of the donor's deposit in the bank may be the subject of a valid gift, since it constitutes an assignment of the fund.)

In Lawson v. Lawson (1718) 1 P. Wms. 441, 24 Eng. Reprint, 463, supra, a draft by a husband intended as a gift causa mortis, drawn upon his goldsmith in favor of his wife, was held good as an appointment, although it was not paid during the donor's life.

And in Rolls v. Pearce (Eng.) supra, a check intended as a gift causa mortis was held valid although not presented to the bank on which it was drawn until after the donor's death. The check was given in a foreign country, where it was put into a bank by the donee, the donor's wife, and money obtained by her thereon was used, in part, to pay the donor's debts. The court held that the donor must have anticipated from the circumstances of the case that the check would pass through various hands before reaching the bank on which it was drawn; and therefore must have intended it to be valid even if he died before it was paid.

See also Tate v. Hilbert (1793) 2 Ves. Jr. 111, 30 Eng. Reprint, 548, 2 Revised Rep. 175, where a bill in chancery to enforce the gift of a check drawn to self or bearer, and intended as an immediate gift, was dismissed without prejudice to a suit at law, the Lord Chancellor saying: "I do not think it so clear as it seems to have been taken that an action will not lie by the holder against the executor."

In Iowa the doctrine was adopted that the giving of a check drawn upon a general deposit fund in a bank amounts to an equitable assignment pro tanto of such fund,—see, for example, Kuhnes v. Cahill (1905) 128 Iowa, 594, 104 N. W. 1025. And in accord with this view, it has been held that the donor's check may be the subject of a valid gift. May v. Jones (1893) 87 Iowa, 188, 54 N. W. 231. The court said: "It is said that as a check was designed to be a mere gift, payment was required to give it effect, and that the death of the donor before it was paid operated to revoke the authority of the bank to pay it, and, therefore, the gift was never perfected, and the check, if not a means of carrying out the provisions of the will, should be treated as a nullity.

Some authorities hold that a gift by check is not complete until the check is paid, on the ground that it is not an appropriation of money of the drawer in bank, but a mere request or order on the bank to pay the amount specified when the check is presented, which may be revoked before acceptance. . . . It may be true that a check cannot be regarded as an assignment of 'funds' within the ordinary meaning of that term, but it transfers to the payee a right to recover its amount of the bank on which it is drawn, if the drawer have a sufficient deposit when it is presented, and that right vests when the check is delivered. Some authorities distinguish between cases where the checks are drawn for a valuable consideration and where they are mere gifts, the holding of such authorities being that in the former class of cases death does not revoke the checks, and that in the latter it does. . . . But when the delivery is coupled with an intent to transfer a present interest in the money represented by the check, and no revocation is attempted, it seems to us the intent of the donor should be given effect, and the transaction is held to transfer a present interest, and a right to the payment of the check after the death of the drawer, as well as before. . . . Whether the check in controversy should have been paid by the bank, or by the legal representative of decedent, we need not determine, as that question is not discussed, and, in view of the fact that the check has been paid, it is not material in this case."

In First Nat. Bank v. O'Byrne. (1913) 177 Ill. App. 473, although the check was for a greater amount than the donor had on deposit, and was held, therefore, to operate as an assignment of the deposit to the donee, the court was of the opinion that in any event a check signed by the donor and delivered to the donee should operate as a valid gift, on the ground that it was not a mere promise to pay as was a promissory note. The court said: "The authorities generally hold that a promissory note signed by the donor to the donee, and delivered to the donee as a gift, is void, because it is merely the delivery of a promise to give instead of a delivery of the thing promised to be given. It has been held, apparently for the same reason, that a check signed by the donor and delivered to the donee is void; that is to say, that it is not the subject of a valid gift. We do not regard the reasoning for such holding as sound, and think that the modern decisions do not sustain it. . . . It must be apparent that if in any case a check is delivered as a transfer and delivery of a bank fund and as a gift, and the gift is invalid because of an insufficient delivery, it is because the donor cannot or did not make a delivery of a bank fund by his check, so as to surrender and divest himself of all right and dominion over the subject of the gift, and not because the check is a promise to pay or to make a gift by the donor. . . . The question of whether or not there was a consideration for the check ought not, of itself, to settle the question of an assignment or transfer of the fund. More evidence, perhaps, should be required in any case to establish an assignment or a delivery of a bank deposit in the case of gifts, than in those cases where there is a valuable consideration moving; but we are not willing to subscribe to the doctrine that an assignment or a delivery of a bank deposit cannot be made in any case of an attempted gift by a check or order for the entire deposit."

And although it appears that the checks were for the entire amount of the maker's deposit in the bank, and the case might, therefore, have been decided under the doctrine of the decisions holding that under such circumstances there is an assignment of the fund (see III., infra), yet it seems that the conclusion reached in the recent case of Carter v. Greenway (1922) — Ark. —, 238 S. W. 65, is not based especially on that ground but upon the broad proposition that the better rule is that there may be a valid gift of a check causa mortis where the rights of creditors are not involved. In this case two checks payable to different parties were drawn by the depositor aggregating the total amount of the deposit; the checks were delivered in a box with other papers to one of the payees; the maker was at the time in ill health, signed the checks only several days after being informed of his serious condition, and died about four months after the delivery of the checks, which, after the maker's death, were presented at the bank and certificates of deposit issued to the payees. In holding that the payees were entitled to the money as against heirs of the maker of the checks, the court said: "It is earnestly insisted by counsel for appellants that a check cannot be made the basis of a gift causa mortis. There is some conflict and confusion in the authorities on this question. But we think that the better reasoning and the trend of our own authorities, where the rights of creditors are not involved, is that, when the delivery of the check is coupled with an intent to transfer a present interest in the money, and no revocation is attempted, the intent of the donor should be given effect, and that the donee has the right to the payment of the check after the death of the drawer as well as before."

c. Where contest is between donee and the public.

Even though the check is not for the entire amount of the maker's account in the bank, the position has been taken that it should operate, as an assignment pro tanto, so as to sustain the check as a gift causa mortis, where the contest is between the state and the donee. Phinney v. State (1904) 36 Wash. 236, 68 L.R.A. 119, 78 Pac. 927. In this case the donor had standing to his credit in the bank approximately $4,400, and the amount of the check was $4,000. Payment of the latter was refused by the bank because of the maker's death before it was presented for payment. In holding the gift valid as a gift causa mortis, as against the state's claim of escheat, the court said: "The modern authorities almost universally hold that the greatest latitude ought to be given to carry out the expressed intent of the donor, and that, in cases like the one at bar, where there are no conflicting interests by creditors or other assignees or donees of the deceased, the giving of the check is an assignment of the interest. Many of the courts, it seems to us without any sufficient reason, have undertaken to make a distinction between cases where the check given was for the whole of the fund, and where it was only for a portion of the fund. In the case at bar, we think it may be justly concluded that it was the intention of the donor to give to his friend the whole of his estate. He evidently did not know the exact amount that he had in the bank, and, while there were a few hundred dollars over and above the $4,000, he felt that he was going to die soon, and, according to his expressions, as shown by the testimony, it was evidently his intention that all his fortune should go to the appellant. But, in any event, there seems to be no reason why the giving of the check for a portion of the deposit should not be an assignment pro tanto of the deposit."

III. Where check is for entire amount of deposit.

Ark. —, 238 S. W. 65, under II. b, supra.

It has been held in several cases that, if a check intended as a gift is drawn for the full amount of the donor's deposit, it will be regarded as an assignment of the fund. First Nat. Bank v. O'Byrne (1913) 177 Ill. App. 473; Aubrey v. O'Byrne (1914) 188 Ill. App. 601; Varley v. Sims (1907) 100 Minn. 331, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 828, 117 Am. St. Rep. 694, 111 N. W. 269, 10 Ann. Cas. 473; Taylor's Estate (1893) 154 Pa. 183, 18 L.R.A. 855, 25 Atl. 1061.

In Varley v. Sims (1907) 100 Minn. 331, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 828, 117 Am. St. Rep. 694, 111 N. W. 269, 10 Ann. Cas. 473, the court held that a check on a bank for the entire amount of the drawer's credit therein, delivered to one as a gift of the money, though unaccepted by the bank, operates as an assignment of the fund; and if so delivered and intended by the donor, in anticipation of death from an impending peril from which he subsequently dies, it is valid as a gift causa mortis.

And it was held, also, that it was unnecessary that the check should disclose on its face that it covered the entire bank credit; this fact being provable dehors the instrument. Ibid.

In First Nat. Bank v. O'Byrne (Ill.) supra, a check intended as a gift causa mortis, for the greater amount than the donor had on deposit (the donor, being unable to find her bank book, made the check in such sum as would insure the payee's obtaining the entire deposit), was held to operate as an assignment of the deposit to the donee, and its validity as a gift was sustained. (See this case, also, under II. b, supra.)

A similar conclusion was reached in Aubrey v. O'Byrne (Ill.) supra, an action apparently by the same donee to recover from the executor of the estate of the donor, money which the donor had deposited in another bank, and which was claimed by the donee as a gift causa mortis under a check executed by the donor and delivered to the donee for an amount exceeding that on deposit. The check was held to constitute a completed gift causa mortis of the amount of the deposit, and to entitle the donee to maintain an action against the executor to recover the same, where the latter wrongfully withdrew it from the bank.

Other cases, however, are opposed to the above. Thus, it has been held that, although the check is for the entire amount of the maker's deposit in the bank, it will not operate as an assignment of the fund, so as to constitute a valid gift causa mortis of the check, payment of which can be enforced by the donee against the bank after the maker's death. Second Nat. Bank v. Williams (1865) 13 Mich. 282.

Also, in Re Smither (1883) 30 Hun (N. Y.) 632, a check directing payment of "the amount of my deposit," payment of which was refused on presentation after the drawer's death, was held not valid as a gift causa mortis, the court applying the general doctrine that delivery of a check or order for the payment of money is not of itself sufficient to effectuate a gift of the fund upon which it is drawn. The court held that the delivery of the check was not an equitable assignment of the fund, citing authorities to the effect that a valuable consideration is an essential element of an equitable assignment, and that the doctrine of equitable assignment does not apply to uphold an unexecuted or imperfect gift.

And in the reported case (BURROWS v. BURROWS, ante, 174) the court held that the delivery of the donor's check to her daughter was not a valid gift either inter vivos or causa mortis, even though it was for a sum equal to or in excess of the whole amount of the deposit, since the check did not operate as an assignment, by reason of the express terms of the Negotiable Instruments Law, this provision applying to the whole fund on deposit as well as to a part of it. It may be observed, however, that even before the adoption of the Negotiable Instruments Law, the Massachusetts court seems not to have accepted the assignment theory. See, for example, Bullard v. Randall (1854) 1 Gray (Mass.) 605, 61 Am. Dec. 433; and Dana v. Third Nat. Bank (1866) 13 Allen (Mass.) 445, 90 Am. Dec. 216, the check in the former of these cases was for less than the amount of the general fund from which it was payable, and in the latter case the check greatly exceeded the amount of the fund.

Also, in Bainbridge v. Hoes (1914) 168 App. Div. 870, 149 N. Y. Supp. 20, the check was for substantially all of the fund, but it was held not a valid gift either inter vivos or causa mortis.

And it may be observed that in Simmons v. Cincinnati Sav. Soc. (1877) 31 Ohio St. 457, 27 Am. Rep. 521, the check was apparently for the whole amount of the deposit, but the court held that the gift was not complete until payment or acceptance of the check by the bank; that the check being the mere order to the payee to draw the money, without consideration, was subject to revocation while it remained unacted upon in the hands of the payee, and that the death of the drawer operated as a revocation of the check; so that the payee could not recover from the bank, which had paid the money to the administrator of the drawer.

Generally, the cases hold that if the check is not paid during the drawer's lifetime it does not constitute a valid gift, even though it has been presented for payment prior to his death; and this appears to be the rule, although payment is refused for an erroneous reason.

Thus, where the drawee bank refused payment on the ground that the signature on the check was incorrect, which was afterwards found to be a mistake, it was held that the subsequent death of the drawer before payment prevented the intended gift of the check from being complete before the donor's death, and the check could not be enforced by the payee against the donor's executor. Edwards v. Guarantee Trust & Sav. Bank (1920) — Cal. App. — 190 Pac. 57.

And in Roney v. Dunleary (1906) 39 Ind. App. 108, 79 N. E. 398, where the check, which was given as a gift to a servant of the maker, was presented for payment to the bank on which it was drawn, during the lifetime of the maker, but payment was refused, although the drawer had sufficient funds on deposit to pay the same, the court held that the execution of the check was not sufficient to constitute a gift inter vivos or causa mortis, and that its presentation for payment in the lifetime of the drawer, with the bank's refusal of payment, did not change its character in this regard; that there was no right of action under it on behalf of the payee or holder against the bank; and that, without a valuable consideration, the check could not constitute the foundation of an action against the drawer in his lifetime, or of a claim against his estate.

Also, in Zehner v. Zehner's Estate (1920) — Ind. App. — 129 N. E. 244, where the payment of the check, which was presented during the lifetime of the drawer, was refused on account of insufficient funds to pay the same, it was held that, there being no valuable consideration, no action could have been maintained against the maker in his lifetime, and that it was not a valid claim against his estate. It was contended in this case that the court should give effect to the provision of the Negotiable Instruments Act that "every negotiable instrument is deemed prima facie to have been issued for a valuable consideration." But the court held that while there was no direct allegation that the check was delivered as a gift, the facts alleged—that the check was delivered under instructions to use the money to educate the payee's son, with the remainder, if any, to be divided between the son and other children of the payee—showed conclusively that it was delivered as a gift.

And it was held that there was no valid gift causa mortis, where one who was very ill, and in expectation of death, executed a check which was delivered to the payee and presented at the bank for payment, but, the account being overdrawn and the signature being questioned by the bank, the latter required confirmation of the signature before payment, and before that confirmation was obtained the drawer died. Re Beaumont [1902] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 889, 71 L. J. Ch. N. S. 478, 50 Week. Rep. 389, 86 L. T. N. S. 410. It did not clearly appear whether payment was declined because of doubt as to the signature, or because the account was overdrawn; but the court found that the bank intended to "lend" the money for payment of the check if the signature was found to be correct. The court said that, even if the account had not been overdrawn, the drawee would not have obtained any right to the property, although it distinguished a possible situation where payment is declined because of the locking up of money for the day with a promise to pay the next day, in that, under the latter circumstances, if the donor died during the night, it might well be there would be an appropriation by the undertaking to answer the check, and it would be a good donatio mortis causa. The court said that the present case did not come up to that supposed, there being no promise in the case before it to pay, but only to lend, and that was insufficient.

Although a savings bank case, attention is called also to Provident Inst. v. Sisters of the Poor (1916) 87 N. J. Eq. 424, 100 Atl. 894, affirmed on opinion of lower court (1917) 83 N. J. Eq. 349, 102 Atl. 1053, where a check for part of the drawer's account in a savings bank was delivered to the payee, with the pass book, and the bank refused payment pending investigation; and it was held that the subsequent death of the drawer revoked the gift and it could not be enforced against her estate. The court held that there was a mere loan of the pass book, which it was necessary to present in order to cash the check; and that it was immaterial what delayed or prevented the cashing of the check.

But in Bromley v. Brunton (1868) L. R. 6 Eq. (Eng.) 275, 37 L. J. Ch. N. S. 902, 18 L. T. N. S. 628, 16 Week. Rep. 1006, the gift of a check inter vivos was held valid, although it was not paid before the donor's death, where it had been presented and payment delayed merely to ascertain the genuineness of the signature.

V. Payment during donor's lifetime.

The gift of the donor's check may be operative and unassailable as a completed transaction, if the payee has turned the same into cash before the drawer's death.

In Strang's Estate (Pa.) supra, the gift of the check was sustained as a completed transaction through the transfer, before the drawer's death, of the money from the drawer's account to the personal credit of the payee.

And in Bangs v. Browne (Mich.) supra, it was held that acceptance would be presumed, so as to support a valid gift, where a check signed by the donor was presented to the bank and the funds transferred to an account opened in the name of the donee, whose pass book was kept by the bank subject to call by her, although she did not know of the gift until after the donor's death. As to presumption of acceptance, see also Varley v. Sims (Minn.) under VI. infra.

It was held in Picksley v. Starr (N.

Y.) supra, that a Christmas gift of a check to an employee, according to a habit of previous years, although it was made in forgetfulness of the fact that the salary had been increased during the year, and was charged to his account a few days later,—without giving him notice of that fact, however, for several months,—could not be avoided by the donor on the ground of mistake. The court said: "In answer to the argument of the appellant, that the delivery of the donor's check did not make a valid gift of the sum of $2,500, it is sufficient to say that it is not like the making of a promise, such as would be the donor's promissory note, where the gift is not consummated until the delivery of the thing promised and remains revocable until such delivery. The delivery of a check is the delivery of something which represents a certain sum of money which the drawer of the check intends that the payee shall, in fact, have. What the defendant gave to the plaintiff, while in form his own check, in fact was an order upon the bank to pay to him the sum of money represented by it. That the transaction was complete, by the payment of the check to the plaintiff, is amply evidenced, if by nothing else, by the very direction of the defendant to his bookkeeper to charge its amount to the account of the plaintiff in his books."

In Sharpe v. Sharpe (S. C.) supra, where the check was given as a gift causa mortis to a third person, who, prior to the donor's death, cashed it and placed the amount to his own account in the bank, afterwards giving the donee a check for the money, which the bank refused to pay, it was held that there was a sufficient delivery to sustain the gift.

In Bouts v. Ellis (Eng.) supra, a gift of the donor's check to a third person for the donor's wife, which was paid before the donor's death, was held a valid gift, although a check given by the third person to her was worthless because unstamped and postdated, where a valid check was given her in exchange therefor after the donor's death.

In De Pouilly's Succession (1870) 22 La. Ann. 97, supra, the gift of one's own check was held to be that of a corporeal movable, and to constitute a manual gift, needing no other formality than delivery, under a provision of the Code.

In Fate v. Leithead (1854) 1 Kay, 658, 69 Eng. Reprint, 279, 23 L. J. Ch. N. S. 736, 2 Week. Rep. 630, the question was as to a check which had been collected before the maker's death, and it was held not to be a gift causa mortis, but a trust by virtue of certain memoranda on the check showing that intent.

VI. Miscellaneous.

The doctrine that a check cannot be the subject of donatio mortis causa unless presented and paid in the lifetime of the donor was held inapplicable in Whitehouse v. Whitehouse (1897) 90 Me. 468, 60 Am. St. Rep. 278, 38 Atl. 374, on the ground that, in this instance, there was no gift, but a contract founded on a sufficient consideration, where the maker of the check, who had been engaged to the plaintiff, and caused a postponement of the marriage, agreed that if she consented to a renewal of the engagement he would provide her with sufficient means of support in case he died before the marriage took place, and the check was given in carrying out this agreement, although it never was delivered to the payee, the circumstances showing, however, a constructive delivery to a third person as trustee.

It is assumed in the annotation that the transaction is merely a gift, so that the question as to what will amount to a consideration so as to sustain the check and render it enforceable is not covered.

In Philpot v. Temple Bkg. Co. (1908) 3 Ga. App. 742, 60 S. E. 480;

Re Dillon (1890) L. R. 44 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 76, 59 L. J. Ch. N. S. 420, 62 L. T. N. S. 614, 38 Week. Rep. 369, and in McDonald v. McDonald (1903) 33 Can. S. C. 145, among possibly other cases of the kind, the gift of a certificate of deposit was held to be valid, though a check or order for the payment thereof was also given, and the same was not presented for payment until after the death of the donor.

In McKenzie v. Downing (1858) 25 Ga. 669, the attempted gift of a check by the maker was held invalid because there was no delivery, the check remaining in the custody of the drawer until after his death.

It was held in Varley v. Sims (1907) 100 Minn. 331, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 828, 117 Am. St. Rep. 694, 111 N. W. 269, 10 Ann. Cas. 473, that the delivery of a check as a gift causa mortis to a person other than the donee, but for his use and benefit, and with instructions to deliver the same to the donee, is a sufficient delivery to pass title although it does not reach the hands of the donee until after the donor's death; that the person to whom the delivery is made is presumed, in the absence of a contrary showing, to be the trustee of the donee; and that acceptance by the latter, where the gift is beneficial and imposes no burdens, will be presumed. The feature of the case, apart from the above point as to the sufficiency of the delivery of the check, was that it constituted an assignment of the fund, being for the total amount thereof. (See the case under III. a, supra.) As to the presumption of acceptance, see also Bangs v. Browne (Mich.) under V. supra.

The above holding was approved in Hillman v. Young (1912) 64 Or. 73, 127 Pac. 793, 129 Pac. 124, a case involving the sufficiency of the delivery of notes.

PETER HOFFMAN, Respt.,
v.

E. R. ROEHL, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

Montana Supreme Court — November 14, 1921.

Master and servant — scope of employment — permitting stranger to drive automobile.

One sent by an automobile dealer to demonstrate a car to a prospective customer acts within the scope of his employment in acceding to the suggestion of the customer to permit an inexperienced member of his family to drive the car, so as to render the employer liable for injury caused to a pedestrian by the driver losing control of the car and colliding with the pedestrian, where the agent sat beside and directed the driver, and had his hand on the steering wheel when the accident happened.

APPEAL by defendant Roehl from a judgment of the District Court for Fergus County (Briscoe, J.) in favor of plaintiff, and from an order overruling a motion for new trial in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's servant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Belden & De Kalb and Gunn, Rasch, & Hall, for appellant:

Even if defendant Roehl himself, the owner of the car, had been present and had turned the car over to Martha Bean for her use in making the trip to Judith place, as was done by Leedy, his employee, there would be no liability.

Steele, 52 Mont. 300, 157 Pac. 575; Herlihy v. Smith, 116 Mass. 265; Wollaston v. Park, 47 Pa. Super. Ct. 90; Beville v. Taylor, 202 Ala. 305, 80 So. 370; Mangan v. Foley, 33 Mo. App. 250; Cooper v. Lowery, 4 Ga. App. 120, 60 S. E. 1015; Hills v. Strong, 132 Ill. App. 174.

The defendant Roehl could not be held in damages, even if Leedy, instead of Martha Bean, had been operating the car.

Plaintiff not only failed to make a case against the defendant Roehl, but there was a like failure of showing negligence on the part of Leedy in connection with the operation of the car.

Messrs. E. K. Cheadle and Wheeler & Baldwin, for respondent:

Proof that the driver of an automobile was, at the time of the injury resulting from the use thereof, in the employ of the owner as a chauffeur, raised the presumption that his use of the car on that occasion was within the scope of his employment.

Ownership of the car being established, that makes out a prima facie case that the operator of the car was engaged in the owner's service, and the burden is upon the owner to show that such is not the fact.

The evidence shows that at the time of the injury defendant Roehl was the owner of the car, and that the same was actually proceeding under the control of his agent, and, under this condition, the law presumes that the car was being driven for the owner, Roehl, and that in driving the same the defendant Leedy was acting within the scope of his employment.

Galen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages on account of personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff by reason of having been run into by a Ford automobile belonging to the defendant E. R. Roehl, driven at the time on Main street, in the city of Lewistown, by one Martha Bean, the daughter of Daniel Bean; the latter at the time having been negotiating with Roehl for the purchase of the car. E. R. Roehl and Joseph Leedy, employee, were jointly made defendants. It appears that Daniel Bean wanted to buy a Ford automobile, and approached the defendant Roehl, an automobile dealer in Lewistown, and inquired whether he had any bargains in Ford cars. Roehl replied that he had one which he would sell for $250, but that the engine had to be overhauled and the motor cleaned. Bean told Roehl to have the work done, "prove that the car would run uphill," and he would buy it. Three or four days subsequently, on November 21, 1916, Bean visited Roehl's place of business, and Roehl then and there said that the car was cleaned and in readiness to make a "go out." Bean asked Roehl whom he would send out with the car, to which he replied, "Joe Leedy." At the time Roehl was in his office, and Bean went therefrom into the workroom adjoining, and upon inquiry found Joe Leedy. Leedy cranked the car, and both Leedy and Bean got into the car and went away. At Bean's suggestion, Leedy drove the car to Bean's residence, several blocks distant from the starting point, in order that Bean might show it to his wife and daughter. After arriving at Bean's house, his wife and daughter came out and looked at the car. His daughter Martha was accompanied by a friend, Miss Christopher, and both had their hats and wraps on, as Martha was intending to go across town to Judith place, in order to make delivery of a dress to a lady for whom she had made the same. Bean invited the girls to get into the car, and requested Leedy to let Martha drive, saying: "She will be my chauffeur if I get it, so let her be the first to run it." Martha got in, took the wheel, and Leedy sat in the front seat alongside of her; Mr. Bean and Miss Christopher getting into the rear seat. The car was then driven by Martha across town to Mrs. Taft's residence, where she stopped the car and made delivery of the dress. She then started the car again, and proceeded up Main street to the intersection of Fourth avenue, where traffic was greatly congested. At or near that point a speedy motorcycle caused two men to jump out of its way and into the path of the car driven by Miss Bean, in consequence whereof she lost control of the car and Leedy grabbed hold of the wheel, and the car was steered upon the sidewalk, striking and seriously injuring the plaintiff. Leedy testified: "I have resided in Lewistown, Montana, since January, 1914, continuously. On the 21st day of November, 1916, I had been engaged in the automobile business as an employee of E. R. Roehl since January, 1914. I saw Daniel Bean for the first time on November 21, 1916. On said date I took a certain Ford automobile from the garage of E. R. Roehl, at Lewistown, Montana, for the purpose of exhibiting or demonstrating the car to the said Daniel Bean, at the direction of Mr. Roehl. I first met Martha Bean on that day."

At that time the plaintiff was employed by the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railroad, as an engineer, and was earning from $150 to $175 per month. He was in good physical condition, thirty-five years of age, and married.

Issue being joined, the cause was tried to a jury and resulted in a verdict and judgment against the defendant Roehl in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $16,800. At the close of plaintiff's case, the defendant Roehl moved for a directed verdict, which motion was denied, and the case went to the jury without any evidence being offered in defense. Appeal is prosecuted by the defendant Roehl from the judgment and order overruling defendant's motion for a new trial.

Several errors are assigned, involving but one principal question, solution of which is determinative of the case, viz., the liability of the defendant Roehl for damages on account of plaintiff's injuries, in application of the doctrine of respondeat superior.

The rules applicable have been crystallized into statute in this state. Section 5442, Rev. Codes, provides: "An agent represents his principal for all purposes within the scope of his actual or ostensible authority, and all the rights and liabilities which would accrue to the agent from transactions within such limit, if they had been entered into on his own account, accrue to the principal."

And § 5450 reads as follows: "Unless required by or under the authority of law to employ that particular agent, a principal is responsible to third persons for the negligence of his agent in the transaction of the business of the agency, including wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as a part of the transaction of such business, and for his wilful omission to fulfill the obligations of the principal."

These statutory provisions are merely declarative of the common law, and in their application to the facts in the case before us the liability of the employer is clear. The employee, Leedy, was directed by his employer to take the automobile from the garage "for the purpose of exhibiting or demonstrating the car" to Daniel Bean, a prospective purchaser; and in such position, and acting under such direction of his employer, the object and purpose of the employee was necessarily to bring about accomplishment of the sale in contemplation. In acceding to the wishes of Martha Bean to go across town to Judith place to make delivery of the dress, and to the request of her father that she be permitted to drive the car, we think Leedy acted within the scope of his employment. The agent took his place in the front seat of the automobile, alongside of Martha Bean, showed her how to control the car, how to start it, what pedals to use, and the like. Miss Bean testified: "Mr. Leedy said that I was doing very good, and I told him that I had never driven a car in town before and that I wouldn't drive it if he hadn't been with me. I told him to pay particular attention to me and see that nothing happened, to be ready to help me if anything should happen, because I didn't feel exactly safe on Main street. That was the first time I had ever attempted to drive a car in the business section of any town."

As applicable to this case, we quote with approval the language used by Mr. Justice Young, speaking for the supreme court of New Hampshire, in Danforth v. Fisher, 75 N. H. 111, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 93, 139 Am. St. Rep. 670, 71 Atl. 535, as follows: "The test to determine whether a master is liable to a stranger for the consequences of his servant's misconduct is to inquire whether the latter was doing what he was employed to do at the time he caused the injury complained of. If he was, the fact that he was not doing it in the way expected is immaterial [citing cases]. But, if at the time he did the act which caused the injury he was not acting within the scope of his employment, the master is not liable."

And this view is entirely consistent with the provisions of our statute and in accord with the views expressed by this court in Lewis v. Steele, 52 Mont. 300, 157 Pac. 575.

The decisive question in every instance is whether the agent or employee was, at the time of negligent injury, acting within the scope of his employment. If he acted independently of his employer, or was upon missions or purposes of his own, then the employer is not to be held accountable in damages. Necessarily, in most instances, the question is one of fact. It becomes one of law, however, whenever it appears that the given deviation was made for the purpose of doing something which had no connection with the servant's duty.

"In determining whether a particular act is done in the course of the servant's employment, it is proper first to inquire whether the servant was, at the time, engaged in serving his master. If the act is done while the servant is at liberty from service and pursuing his own ends exclusively, there can be no question of the master's freedom from all responsibility, even though the injury complained of could not have been committed without the facilities afforded to the servant by his relation to his master." Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 6th ed. § 147.

The employer or principal is liable for the negligent acts of his employee while acting as his representative, and the purpose of the act rather than its method of performance is the test of the scope of his employment. 26 Cyc. 1534.

Defendant has cited many cases in support of his contention of non-liability, but they are all distinguishable from the case under consideration. In those cases the missions of the servant were outside the scope of his employment and pertained primarily to the employee's personal pleasure, business, or affairs, or were instances where the employee had surrendered control of the automobile to a third person for a purpose independent of and not connected with the business of the employer.

We concede the law as contended for by the defendant, that where the servant steps aside from his master's business, if but for a short space of time, and does an act not connected with the business, which is harmful to another, the master is not liable, the reason being that the relation of master and servant does not at the time exist; but here the servant continued about the business of his employer, adopting methods deemed expedient, resulting in a third person's injury, and the employer is liable. 18 R. C. L. p. 796.

In this case the proof neither shows an independent mission by the employee for purposes of his own outside the scope of his employment, nor the surrender of control of the operation of the car to a stranger. In making exhibition and demonstration of the car to the prospective purchaser, Leedy permitted Miss Bean to operate the car; and at the time of the accident he was by her side on his master's business, grabbed the wheel, and the accident complained of resulted. There was no break in the continuity and purpose of the mission, and the hand of the servant was physically on the steering wheel of the car at the time of the accident. It is plain that the accident occurred through the negligence of the agent in the transaction of the business of the agency, and in consequence of the principal is liable.

By legal intentment the act of the employee became the act of the employer; the individuality of the employee being identified with his employer. The latter is deemed to have been constructively present, and the act of the employee that of the employer, and thus the latter becomes accountable for his own proper act or omission. 18 R. C. L. p. 786.

"He who expects to derive advantage from an act which is done by another for him must answer for any injury which a third person may sustain from it," said Lord

Chief Justice Best in Hall v. Smith, 2 Bing. 156, 130 Eng. Reprint, 265.

We are not unmindful that the application of the rule may, and often does, work hardships, and that in the case before us a hardship is undoubtedly worked upon the employer; however, the rule is founded on reason and looks to the protection of third persons. The verdict might be considered excessive in view of the evidence, but, as no contention is made in this respect, the subject is passed without further notice.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Who is responsible for injury by car during demonstration or instruction by dealer.

As to liability of employer for injuries inflicted by automobile while being driven by or for salesman or collector, see annotation in 17 A.L.R. 621.

As to liability of owner for injury by automobile while being operated by repair man, see annotation in 18 A.L.R. 974.

Although an automobile, at the time an injury occurred, was being driven by a prospective purchaser, or his representative, the owner may be held liable if the act of his employee sent to give instructions, in allowing the prospective purchaser or representative to drive, was within the scope of his employment and in furtherance thereof. HOFFMAN v. ROEHL (reported herewith) ante, 189; Wooding v. Thom (1911) 148 App. Div. 21, 132 N. Y. Supp. 50; Holmboe v. Morgan (1914) 69 Or. 395, 138 Pac. 1084.

It will be observed that in the reported case (HOFFMAN v. ROEHL) it was decided that one sent by an automobile dealer to demonstrate a car to a prospective purchaser acted within the scope of his employment in acceding to the suggestion of the customer to permit his inexperienced daughter to drive the car, so as to render the employer liable for an injury to a pedestrian by the driver losing control of the car, where the agent sat beside and directed the driver, and had his hand on the steering wheel when the accident occurred.

And in Wooding v. Thom (1911) 148 App. Div. 21, 132 N. Y. Supp. 50, affirmed in (1913) 209 N. Y. 583, 103 N. E. 1185, where the owner of an automobile who wished to sell it sent his chauffeur to demonstrate it, and the latter permitted an employee of a prospective purchaser to drive it, the owner was held liable for an injury caused to a pedestrian by the negligent operation of the car by the employee of the prospective purchaser. The court said: "In the present case the master's business upon which Simmons was engaged was demonstrating the capabilities of the car with a view to commending it to a possible purchaser. The evidence clearly shows that the act of Simmons, who was in sole control, in permitting Eglit to drive the car, was because he (Simmons) conceived that to be a good way to demonstrate the quality of the car. It was an act performed in furtherance of his employment. It is not important that he had not been instructed to permit anyone but himself to drive; for, as was said by Judge Grover in Cosgrove v. Odgen (1872) 49 N. Y. 255, 10 Am. Rep. 361: 'The test of the master's responsibility for the act of his servant is not whether such act was done according to the instructions of the master to the servant, but whether it was done in the prosecution of the business that the servant was employed by the master to do.' If the owner himself had undertaken to demonstrate the car, and as a part of such demonstration had permitted Eglit to drive it, no one would have any doubt as to such owner's liability. The case here is no different. Simmons was authorized to demonstrate the car; that was his employment. In the course of that employment, as a part of the demonstration, he permitted Eglit to drive. This, I think, fastens upon Simmons's employer liability for the negligence which resulted in plaintiff's injuries."

And in Holmboe v. Morgan (Or.) supra, where an injury was inflicted by an automobile while it was being operated with the consent of the seller's demonstrator, by the purchaser, at the latter's request, a verdict against the seller was affirmed. The court said: "It is contended that Morgan insisted on driving the car at the time of the accident, and therefore should be held liable for damages. It appears that Robinson was out with Morgan for the express purpose of demonstrating the car and of teaching Morgan how to run it; that Morgan knew nothing about it or how to run it, had run it only 3 or 4 miles the day before, under Robinson's direction, and, at the time of the accident, was at the wheel for the second time only, under Robinson's control and immediate supervision. The question of whether Morgan or Robinson was the efficient cause of the accident, or whether they were jointly liable, was squarely and plainly presented to the jury for decision, and was the only question so submitted. All of the facts were before it, and we should not disturb its findings upon that matter. Although the defendant Howard contends that Robinson requested Morgan to let him (Robinson) drive the car when they came to the crowded streets of the city, that did not relieve Robinson of the control of the machine. He was in charge of the car and was to instruct Morgan as to running it, and, if he thought they were in a locality where the car should be in the hands of an expert, he should have taken control."

And in Samson v. Aitchison [1912; P. C.] A. C. (Eng.) 844, 82 L. J. P. C. N. S. 1, 107 L. T. N. S. 106, 28 Times L. R. 559, the owner of an automobile was held liable for an injury caused by its negligent operation by a prospective purchaser of the car who was driving, at the owner's suggestion, to test its qualities; it appearing that the latter accompanied the driver, and had given directions as to the operation of the car.

And a dealer in automobiles is liable for an injury to a prospective purchaser, sustained while attempting to crank the car at the implied invitation of the one sent to demonstrate it, who allowed the customer to get out of the car and attempt to crank it without warning him of the danger of cranking, although he knew that the purchaser was ignorant of such dangers. Martin v. Maxwell Brisco Motor Vehicle Co. (1911) 158 Mo. App. 188, 138 S. W. 65.

But in Keck v. Jones (1916) 97 Kan. 470, 155 Pac. 950, where an automobile was ordered by a dealer for a customer, supplied with gasoline, etc., and inspected and tested before noon of a certain day, and the customer called and paid for it in the afternoon, and declined assistance in operating it because he had had experience, and drove it away, but returned, after driving about a short time, and asked for someone to go with him and listen to the working of the car and make any necessary adjustments, it was held that the dealer was not liable for an injury to the plaintiff which occurred while it was being driven by the purchaser, accompanied by a machinist sent solely to observe the working of the car and adjust it, since the purchaser was not the agent of the dealer, and since he desired someone to accompany him, not to operate the car, but merely to observe its mechanical operations.

And one who purchased an automobile under a conditional bill of sale for another, to whom it was delivered, is not liable for an injury caused by the car while the latter was being driven in it by a chauffeur whom she hired when she wanted to ride, although the one who purchased the car told the chauffeur to take good care of the person to whom it was delivered, and to teach her to run it and instruct her; it appearing that he had never hired the chauffeur to perform such service, or paid him. Michael v. Pulliam (1919) — Mo. App. —, 215 S. W. 763.

And it was held in the Michael Case that, even if it could be said that the one who purchased the car had made the chauffeur his agent to teach the one to whom the car was delivered to run it, he would not be liable for the injury, since it appeared that the chauffeur was not teaching her to drive the car at the time, but was merely taking her for a ride and acting as her chauffeur.

It has been held that a chauffeur sent by an automobile dealer with an inexperienced customer, to take a car which the customer had purchased through the crowded part of the town, and turn it over to him when the business streets were passed, might, while en route, be found to be acting for the dealer, so as to render him liable for injuries caused by negligent driving, although, by direction of the purchaser, they stopped at various places to do errands for the latter. Dalrymple v. Covey Motor Car Co. (1913) 66 Or. 533, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 424, 135 Pac. 91.

But in Janik v. Ford Motor Co. (1914) 180 Mich. 557, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 294, 147 N. W. 510, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 669, it was held that an automobile manufacturer who, after selling a car, delegates one of his employees, at the purchaser's request, to drive the car to the city limits, from which place the purchaser, who is an experienced automobilist, is to drive it to the destination, is not answerable for an injury by the driver to a person on the street, where the purchaser is in the car at the time of the accident, although he has given no directions except as to the route as to which he wishes to travel.

In Hammons v. Setzer (1913) 72 Wash. 550, 130 Pac. 1141, the evidence was held sufficient to warrant a finding that an employee of a storekeeper was acting as the latter's agent, where there was evidence that a seller of automobiles agreed to demonstrate a car in delivering goods; that the defendant told the demonstrator to show the man sent on the car all about it, and that after they had driven around some the defendant's employee took the wheel, and while he was driving an accident occurred.

And in Hiroux v. Baum (1908) 137 Wis. 197, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 332, 118 N. W. 533, a finding was held justified that the son of the defendant was the latter's servant, and not the servant of the one who sold the car to the defendant, where there was evidence that the car was purchased with the understanding that the son should learn to operate it, and that the seller had agreed to teach the defendant's son to operate the car, and that the son, for the purpose of learning to run it, was driving it, accompanied by the seller, at the time the plaintiff was injured.

But a prospective purchaser who has instructed his employee merely to examine the engine of the car, and stated that he would arrange for a demonstration if the report was favorable, is not liable for his employee's negligence, since he was acting outside the scope of his employment in driving the car. Wooding v. Thom (1911) 148 App. Div. 21, 132 N. Y. Supp. 50, affirmed in (1913) 209 N. Y. 583, 103 N. E. 1135.

And where a manufacturer of automobiles sells a number of machines to the defendant for use in its business, and agrees to furnish chauffeurs to instruct its employees in the operation of the machines for a certain time, the defendant is not liable for an injury inflicted by one of the machines which was being driven by the manufacturer's chauffeur to the defendant's store where the instruction was to begin, since the operator was not the agent or servant of the defendant. In Tornroos v. R. H. White Co. (1915) 220 Mass. 336, 107 N. E. 1015.

And an employer is not liable for an injury if it occurs while its employee is using the employer's motor truck after business hours to take things to his own home, although there was evidence that he had been instructed by his employer to learn to operate the truck as soon as possible, and that he was accompanied by the chauffeur furnished by the seller of the truck to instruct him in operating it. McGrath v. Wehrle (1919) 233 Mass. 456, 124 N. E. 253.

In Buick Auto. Co. v. Weaver (1914) —Tex. Civ. App. —, 163 S. W. 594, it was held that a peremptory instruction in favor of the seller of an automobile, in an action by the purchaser for injuries, was properly refused, where there was evidence that the seller agreed to furnish a chauffeur to drive the car to the purchaser's home and teach him to operate it, and that while the latter was negligently operating the car the plaintiff was injured, it being held that the fact that the car belonged to the plaintiff was not determinative, the master being liable for the servant's tortious acts done in furtherance of the master's business, and the instrumentality by which they are committed being immaterial.

In Burnham v. Central Auto. Exch. (1907) — R. L. —, 67 Atl. 429, where the purchaser of a motor car claimed to have received an injury while riding in it, by reason of the reckless driving of a chauffeur furnished by the seller to teach the former to operate the car, the court refused to disturb a verdict against the seller, although the latter claimed the accident was caused by a break in the machinery due to the purchaser's previous reckless operation of the car, and not to the negligence of the chauffeur, as under the evidence the question of liability was held properly submitted to the jury. v.

GUNLEK A. BERGLAND, Plff. in Err.

(216 Mich. 380, 185 N. W. 819.)

Negligence — duty to give notice of change of condition in rollways.

1. The owner of a log rollway in a lake is not bound to give notice to licensees who are in the habit of fishing from it, of its changed condition due to the removal of logs for use in his mill, failure to do which will render him liable for injury to a fisherman when he attempts to fish from the rollway.

Water — riparian right to use submerged land.

2. An owner of land on a lake has a right to use the submerged land in front of his property for storing logs so long as he does not interfere with the public right of navigation.

3. The public has a right to fish in the waters of a navigable lake which has been stocked with fish by the public.

[See 11 R. C. L. 1030, 1033; see also note in 5 A.L.R. 1056.]

—right to use riparian land.

4. The right to fish in the waters of a navigable lake does not include the right to trespass upon the fast land of a riparian owner or use his dock or rollway of logs for that purpose.

Negligence — invitee — showing one where to fish.

5. The mere fact that a riparian owner points out to a person using his rollways as a fishing ground, where the owner thinks that fish may be caught, does not make the fisherman an invitee so that the riparian owner will be bound to exercise toward him the care due such person.

[See 20 R. C. L. 64.]

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Ontonagon County (Driscoll, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries received while fishing from defendant's log rollways, for which he was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

Statement by Fellows, J.:

Defendant owns and operates a sawmill at Bergland, on the shore of Lake Gogebic. The lake is navigable and of considerable proportions, being 17 miles in length and 3 miles in width at certain places. The village of Bergland has a population of about 400. It is sustained by defendant's mills, most of the inhabitants being his employees and their families. It is located on the Duluth, South Shore, & Atlantic Railroad. A spur track has been built out into the lake several hundred feet. In the winter months defendant gets in his supply of logs for the summer operations. They come in on the railroad, and the cars are run out on the spur track running into the lake, and the logs are unloaded and put in rollways on the ice. As the weight of the rollways increases with the addition of logs the ice breaks and the rollways settle in the water and rest on the bottom; the water being from 6 to 8 feet deep at this place. After the ice has gone out in the spring, and during the summer months, the rollways are broken up and the logs taken to the mill to be manufactured into lumber. In breaking up the rollways it was customary to pick out the key logs, and the wind and waves would then more readily cause the breaking up of the rollways. To prevent the logs floating away on the lake a boom was constructed.

For nine seasons prior to that of 1915 plaintiff spent the summer months at Bergland. While there he indulged in fishing, sometimes from a boat and sometimes from the rollways of defendant. Others, mostly defendant's employees, also fished from these rollways. Plaintiff came to Bergland for the season of 1915. On June 28th, after supper, he went to the rollways to fish. He stepped on a log, and, finding it insecure, stepped on another rollway, and remained there a short time, when it likewise gave way, resulting in serious injuries to him. He recovered a judgment in the court below, which is here reviewed by defendant.

Messrs. Van Slyck & Walsh for plaintiff in error.

Mr. James A. O'Neill for defendant in error.

Fellows, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There can be no serious question as to defendant's right as riparian owner to the beneficial use of the subaqueous land ^{Water-riparian right to use submerged land.} adjoining his premises so long as he does not interfere with the public rights in this navigable lake. Rice v. Ruddiman, 10 Mich. 125. We do not understand plaintiff's counsel to controvert this proposition. He bases plaintiff's right to recover here upon his right to fish in the navigable waters of the state, upon his rights as an invitee, and upon his rights as a licensee, and discusses these rights at length. We shall take them up in their order.

1. Lake Gogebic is a navigable lake. It has been stocked with fish, which are there found in abundance. There can be no question of plaintiff's right to fish in its waters. But ^{—right to fish.} that is not the precise question here involved. Plaintiff is not a riparian owner on this lake, so far as this record discloses. In order to exercise his right to fish, he must pass over the premises of a riparian owner, either those of defendant, the railroad company, or someone else. The question here is: Was plaintiff a trespasser in going across and upon premises of defendant for the purpose of exercising the right of fishing? Plaintiff's counsel insists that this question must be answered in the negative on the authority of Marsh v. Colby, 39 Mich. 626, 33 Am. Rep. 439. There is language used in that opinion which gives color to counsel's contention. This has prompted us to examine the record and briefs in that case to see if the question of trespass to the fast land of plaintiff was there involved. We find it was not. The testimony only showed that defendant went over plaintiffs subaqueous land in a boat, and plaintiff's counsel in that case conceded that defendant entered the lake from the land of one Arnold, another riparian owner; so that the question of trespass to fast land was not involved. In Beach v. Hayner, 207 Mich. 93, 5 A.L.R. 1052, 173 N. W. 487, we expressly recognized the right to fish in the navigable waters of the state when lawfully upon them. And in Giddings v. Rogalewski, 192 Mich. 319, 158 N. W. 951, we held (quoting from the syllabus):

"The right of the state, under its police power, to enforce the fish and game laws upon the lands of a private owner, does not take away the owner's right to maintain trespass against those who invade his close without permission for the purpose of fishing.

"Every unauthorized intrusion upon private lands is a trespass for which the owner has a right of action, and is entitled to at least nominal damages."

Plaintiff, being lawfully on the lake, no doubt would have the right to row his boat over the subaqueous lands of defendant and fish there, but he would not have the right to appropriate defendant's boat for that purpose if he found it tied to defendant's dock, nor could he, without license from defendant, use his dock or rollways of logs for that purpose. Plaintiff's right to fish in the water of Lake Gogebic did not carry with it the right to trespass upon the fast land of defendant, or to appropriate his property in the exercise of such right.

2. Was plaintiff an invitee? The testimony shows that plaintiff, his wife, and others fished off these rollways. On one occasion defendant pointed out to plaintiff's wife where he thought she could catch a fish. We think this testimony established license at most, and did not establish that plaintiff was an invitee. In Benson v. Baltimore Traction

Co. 77 Md. 535, 20 L.R.A. 714, 39 Am. St. Rep. 436, 26 Atl. 973, the principal of the training school, Mr. Saville, had written to the president of the defendant for permission to the graduating class to visit its power house. The permission was granted, and some thirty or more of the scholars and teachers went to the power house and were shown through the plant. Part of the time they were accompanied by a guide, but in his temporary absence plaintiff fell into a vat of hot water used by defendant in its business, and received serious injuries. It was insisted on behalf of plaintiff that under the circumstances he was an invitee, and defendant's duty towards him was measured by the standard of such relation. The court declined to accept this view, held that he was a licensee, and, after reviewing the authorities, said: "And so in this case we are compelled to say that there is nothing in the declaration, supplemented with the request of Mr. Saville and the assent of the appellee, to justify the conclusion that the appellant was in any manner invited or induced, by any act of the appellee, to visit its power house, but he went there solely for his own personal benefit and pleasure, and he must accept the consequences, unfortunate though they be."

We are persuaded that, at most, plaintiff can claim no greater rights than those of a licensee.

3. This brings us to the crucial question in the case: Has the defendant been guilty of failure of any duty he owed plaintiff as licensee? The theory advanced by plaintiff's counsel to sustain this judgment is that, if we assume

Negligence—invitee—showing one where to fish.

—right to use

plaintiff was a licensee, still defendant owed him the duty not to so change the character of the premises as to render them dangerous without notice to him and to the public generally, and that defendant's agents, by undermining the rollway in the work of tearing it down and getting out the logs, had changed its condition from a place of safety to one of danger, and for such action the defendant is liable, and counsel relies most strongly on Morrison v. Carpenter, 179 Mich. 207, 146 N. W. 106, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 319, to sustain such contention. But that case involved a way, a path, and the text-writers and courts generally, including this court, have recognized that a different rule applies to the license to use a way or a path which has been openly and notoriously held out to the public for use, from a license to go upon premises generally. In 29 Cyc. 449, it is said: "The rule is well settled that an owner of premises owes to a licensee no duty as to the condition of such premises, unless imposed by statute, save that he should not knowingly let him run upon a hidden peril, or wantonly or wilfully cause him harm. The licensee enters upon the premises at his own risk, and enjoys the license subject to its concomitant perils. There is a class of cases, however, which stand on a ground peculiar to themselves. They are where defendant by his conduct has induced the public to use a way in the belief that it is a street or public way which all have a right to use, and where they suppose they will be safe. The liability in such a case is coextensive with the implied invitation."

And in 20 R. C. L. 64, it is said: "While an invitation to go upon premises will not be implied, ordinarily, from the fact that the owner or occupant has acquiesced in or tolerated trespasses thereon; many decisions have recognized an exception in case of a way across lands or structures thereon. If the owner or occupant has permitted persons generally to use or establish a way under such circumstances as to induce a belief that it is public in character, he owes to persons availing themselves thereof the duty due to those who come upon premises by invitation."

Mr. Justice Stone, who wrote the opinion in the Morrison Case, very clearly laid down the rule where a way, a path, was involved, and, by pointing out the distinction between the case then before us and Habina v. Twin City General Electric Co. 150 Mich. 41, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1126, 113 N. W. 586, to which we shall presently refer, pointed out the distinction we must recognize between the Morrison Case and the one now before us. He said: "In other words, if the licensee has been using a defined path for a length of time with the knowledge and permission of the licensor, then, if the licensor interferes with said path by making it more dangerous, he should give notice to the licensee, or guard the dangerous place so made. We think this doctrine is clearly recognized by this court in Habina v. Twin City General Electric Co. 150 Mich. 41, at page 49. In that case a child had been injured; but, unlike this case, it did not appear that any path or way was shown to have existed at or over the land where the ditch in which the child was injured was opened. In that case it was distinctly found that it did not appear that the plaintiff ever traveled over the premises in a path or way in a direction used by anyone else, or that she twice pursued the same way herself, but that she and others had been in the habit of roaming over the entire premises."

The early case of Hargreaves v. Deacon, 25 Mich. 1, has been frequently cited by this and other courts. A child of tender years had fallen into a cistern on the premises of defendant and been drowned. Mr. Justice Campbell, who wrote for the court, first pointed out that no question of way existed, and then proceeded to determine the rights of plaintiff's decedent as a licensee. In the course of the opinion he said:

"But where injury arises to a person from the neglect of one, in doing his lawful business in a lawful way, to provide against accident, the question arises at once whether he was under any legal obligation to look out for the protection of that particular person, under those particular circumstances. For the law does not require such vigilance in all cases, or on behalf of all persons. . . .

"Cases are quite numerous in which the same questions have arisen which arise in this case, and we have found none which holds that an accident from negligence, on private premises, can be made the ground of damages, unless the party injured has been induced to come by personal invitation, or by employment which brings him there, or by resorting there as to a place of business or of general resort held out as open to customers or others whose lawful occasions may lead them to visit there. We have found no support for any rule which would protect those who go where they are not invited, but merely with express or tacit permission, from curiosity or motives of private convenience, in no way connected with business or other relations with the occupant."

The authorities are reviewed at considerable length, and the opinion concludes with the following: "We cannot help feeling much sympathy for the sad case of a child who was only following the natural and innocent curiosity of his age when he met with the accident which caused his death. But there is nothing to indicate any wanton or inhuman disposition in the defendants, and no illegality in their management of their business, and they have violated no right of the plaintiff or his intestate."

Habina v. Twin City General Electric Co. supra, was not a case of a way. The premises had, however, been used sufficiently by the public to make plaintiff a licensee. In crossing them plaintiff fell into a ditch which contained hot water coming from defendant's plant, and was injured. There, as here, it was insisted that defendant had changed the conditions without notice to the public, but it was held that to entitle plaintiff to recover, the change must be such as indicated a reckless and wanton disregard of the safety of plaintiff and others. There, as here, the change in conditions was the result of the necessities of the business, and we denied liability. It was there said: "But assuming, as the trial judge did, that she belonged to the class known to the law as naked licensees, 'about the least favored in the law of men who are not actual wrongdoers' (Pollock, Torts, pp. 424, 425), her position, assuming further that she exercised proper care, is not improved, unless it should be said that defendant's conduct in opening the ditch and leaving it unguarded at the point where plaintiff fell into it was such a change in the condition of the premises, such creating of a new danger by its active conduct, as indicated a reckless and wanton disregard of the safety of plaintiff and others. Here, again, we come to the proposition that, if in the conduct of its business it became necessary to change the condition of the surface of its premises, defendant could change them in no place, in the 45,000 square feet occupied, without giving notice of such change."

The instant case is not distinguishable upon principle from this case.

In the case of Clark v. Michigan C. R. Co. 113 Mich. 24, 67 Am. St. Rep. 442, 71 N. W. 327, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 194, the plaintiff tripped on a wire used by defendant to operate its semaphore. In denying liability it was said by Mr. Justice Hooker, speaking for the court: "Whether these persons were trespassers or naked and gratuitous licensees (which last we do not mean to intimate) is unimportant. In neither case had they the right to expect the defendant to forego a reasonable use of its land, in which respect it stood on the same plane as a private person."

In Gramlich v. Wurst, 86 Pa. 74, 27 Am. Rep. 684, it was said: "Gramlich was in the lawful occupancy of the lot on which Wurst was killed, and was engaged in an employment that was entirely legitimate. In the absence of evidence to show the existence of exceptional hazards, he was not required to provide exceptional safeguards. An owner of land may improve it in his own time and in his own way, so that he violates no duty that he owes to any adjacent owner or to the public. . . . The law fully recognizes the right of him who, having the dominion of the soil, without malice, does a lawful act on his own premises, and leaves the consequences of an act thereby happening where they belong, upon him who has wandered out of his way, though he may have been guilty of no negligence in the ordinary acceptance of the term."

While the declaration alleges that defendant improperly piled rollways, there is no proof to support this claim. The proof, and all of it, showed that the rollways were properly piled, and that they were broken up in the usual, customary, and economical way. While plaintiff claims he did not know how they were broken up, for nine years he had seen, must have seen, as the seasons progressed, one after another of these rollways broken up and the logs floated to the mill. He was upon the premises where the accident occurred for his own convenience; had no business with the owner; he was, at most, a licensee. Defendant, in the usual and customary manner, used these premises in the conduct of his business. In the conduct of such business, and to get logs for the mills, he broke up these rollways, which were but temporary, and this he did in the usual and customary manner. Defendant has breached no duty he owed the plaintiff, and is not liable in this action.

ANNOTATION.

Duty of owner to licensee as to changing condition of premises.

I. General rule.

The general rule is that where the owner or occupant of premises, with knowledge, and for a long period of time, permits the public to use the premises without objection, for the purpose of traveling across the same on a well-established and safe path or highway, he cannot, without giving notice, render the premises unsafe to the injury of those who have used such highway, and have no notice of the changed condition, without being responsible for the resulting injury.

The requirement of such a duty toward a licensee is justified on the ground that the creation of a danger on premises known to be used by licensees, of which no notice is given, constitutes "putting traps or pitfalls in the licensee's way." Nashville, C.

So, in Morrison v. Carpenter (1914) 179 Mich. 207, 146 N. W. 106, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 319, it was said: "We think the rule may be stated that after granting a license to use the premises, the owner cannot lawfully, by his affirmative action, change the premises so as to make them more dangerous, without notifying the licensee of that fact, or warning him of the added danger."

Similarly, it was said in Phipps v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. (1908) 161 Fed. 376: "The view founded in natural justice, which seems to have approval of many authorities, is that one who knowingly, and for a long period of time, permits the public to use his premises, without objection, for the purpose of traveling across the same upon a well-established and safe path or highway, cannot, without giving notice, render the same unsafe to the injury of those who have used such highway, and have no notice of the changed condition, without responding in damages for resulting injury."

II. Application of rule.

A failure to give notice of new obstructions of a dangerous nature on premises across which persons are accustomed to pass by license renders the owner of the premises liable for an injury to licensees passing over the premises. *Corby v. In The Ansonia v. Sullivan (1917) 152 C. C. A. 284, 239 Fed. 296, it appeared that a hotel company, desirous of preventing the use at night of a runway leading to its delivery entrance, stretched a chain across the same in the evening, removing it in the morning. A person desiring to make a delivery of goods to the hotel at night was injured by the chain. The court held that the hotel company was negligent in failing to give warning, by a light or otherwise, of the obstruction. A similar result was reached in Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Blackwell (1918) 201 Ala. 657, 79 So. 129, wherein it appeared that a railroad company stretched a rope across a roadway which had previously been used by the public by license.

III. Limitation of rule.

In a number of cases it has been held, without directly questioning the general rule heretofore stated, that the mere passive acquiescence of the owner of premises in their use by other persons for their own convenience and pleasure does not render him liable for injuries to them caused by his failure to give notice of changes in the premises, where there is no invitation, express or implied, to use the premises.

In the reported case (DOUGLAS v. BERGLAND, ante, 197) the general rule is held, distinguishing Morrison v. Carpenter (1914) 179 Mich. 207, 146 N. W. 106, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 319, supra, to be applicable only to changes in premises used by licensees as a way. It is accordingly held in that case that the owner of a log rollway, sometimes used by licensees to stand on while fishing, is not liable for an injury resulting from a failure to give notice of the removal of the key logs for the purpose of allowing the rollway to break up.

The owner of premises is not liable where a licensee wanders from the usual way and falls into a ditch recently dug on another portion of his premises. Etheredge v. Central of Georgia R. Co. (1905) 122 Ga. 853, 50 S. E. 1003. W. A. S.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Municipal Court of Chicago (Trude, J.) in favor of defendant in a suit brought to recover a penalty for violation by him of an ordinance of the city regulating the business of movers. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Samuel A. Ettelson, Louis P. Piquett, Daniel Webster, and Rupert F. Bippus for appellant.

Messrs. Brady, Rutledge, & Devaney for appellee.

Dunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of Chicago sued the Heb-ard Express & Van Company in the municipal court for a violation of an ordinance of the city by moving for hire certain household furniture and personal property from No. 855 Ainslee street, in the city of Chicago, without thereafter filing in the office of the bureau of statistics and municipal reference library of the city of Chicago the statement required by § 1 of the ordinance. The court, on a trial without a jury, rendered judgment for the defendant, and the city appealed to this court; the judge having certified that the validity of an ordinance was involved, and the public interest required that the appeal should be taken directly to this court.

The first three sections of the ordinance are as follows:

"Sec. 1. Every person, firm or corporation owning or operating any moving van, furniture car, transfer wagon, express wagon, delivery wagon, or any other vehicle engaged in moving or hauling for hire in the city of Chicago, shall keep a record of the place from which and the place to which he or it moves the household goods or personal property, or any of them, of any person who is, or persons who are, removing or vacating any dwelling, house, flat, apartment, room, rooms or place of residence or abode or place of business in the city of Chicago, which record shall show the name and address of the mover, the name of the person for whom the moving was done, the name of the person who was the owner or ostensible owner of the said household goods or personal property moved, the address from which in the city of Chicago and to which in the city of Chicago, or outside of the city of Chicago, as the case may be, such moving was done, and the name and address of the common carrier to whom such household goods or personal property were delivered, with the date of such removal or delivery, and the character of the articles moved.

"Sec. 2. Every person, firm or corporation owning or operating any of the vehicles aforesaid, and any person, firm or corporation not engaged in moving or hauling for hire in the city of Chicago but in control or possession of any of the vehicles aforementioned, who shall, for a valuable consideration or otherwise, move the household goods or personal property, or any of them, of any person who is, or persons who are, removing or vacating any dwelling, house, flat, apartment, room or place of residence or abode or place of business in the city of Chicago, shall, not later than Monday following the date of such moving, file in the office of the bureau of statistics and municipal reference library of the city of Chicago, or send by registered mail to such bureau, a full and correct statement of all such hauling or moving done, containing the information as required in § 1 hereof. Upon receipt of such statements the head of such bureau of statistics and municipal reference library shall keep a register of all such transactions in a book or books, or other suitable form of maintaining records, to be used for that purpose, with an alphabetical index of the names of the persons for whom such hauling has been done. Said register shall not be open to the inspection of the public, but the head of such bureau shall furnish to any person inquiring therefor, information as to any particular change or removal, for which a charge of 50 cents shall be made for information concerning each change or removal: Provided, that no fee shall be charged for any such information furnished to the department of police.

"Sec. 3. Upon request of the person, firm or corporation owning or in charge or in control of the vehicle in which said household goods or personal property, or any of them, are to be removed, the person for whom such moving is being done shall give to said owner or person in charge or in control of any vehicle, all information necessary to enable him to make and keep such record or statement. It shall be unlawful for any person to give to said owner or person in charge or in control of any vehicle hauling or moving said household goods or personal property, or any of them, a fictitious name or to deceive him, or to make knowingly any false statement concerning any of said information requested by said owner or person in charge or in control of said vehicle, the obtaining of which is necessary to enable him to make and keep said record or statement."

The sixth section provides for a fine not exceeding $200 for any violation of the ordinance.

It was stipulated on the trial that the appellee is engaged in the city of Chicago in the business of moving and hauling for hire; that it moved the property of Hobart Merrifield from No. 855 Ainslee street, in the city of Chicago, to some other point in the city, and did not file the statement required by the ordinance. The appellee proved that in its business it had in the course of a year approximately 5,000 moving jobs, and moved anywhere within a radius of 300 or 400 miles, where the roads permitted; that 80 to 90 per cent of the moving is done within the city of Chicago, about 9 per cent from Chicago to places outside the city, in the state of Illinois, and about 1 per cent to places outside the state.

The appellee contends that the ordinance is invalid because the legislature did not confer power upon the city to adopt it, because it is unjust, unreasonable, and oppressive, and because it is in conflict with the state and Federal Constitutions.

No provision of the state Constitution is referred to in the brief or argument of the appellee, and no provision of the Federal Constitution except that which declares that interference—regulation of draymen.

Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the several states.

The ordinance does not violate this provision. An ordinance adopted in the exercise of the police power, for the protection of the community, may extend, incidentally, to the operation of a carrier in its interstate business, provided it does not subject that business to unreasonable demands and is not opposed to Federal legislation. Barrett v. New York, 232 U. S. 14, 58 L. ed. 483,

The appellant contends that authority to the city to pass the ordinance is found in clauses 42 and 66 of § 1 of article 5 of the Cities and Villages Act (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1919, chap. 24, § 62), which are as follows:

"Forty-second. To license, tax and regulate hackmen, draymen, omnibus drivers, carters, cabmen, porters, expressmen, and all others pursuing like occupations, and to prescribe their compensation.

"Sixty-sixth. To regulate the police of the city or village and pass and enforce all necessary police ordinances."

Under these clauses the city has the right to regulate persons engaged in the business mentioned in the ordinance; that is, moving or hauling for hire. The reasonableness of an ordinance passed by a municipal corporation in the exercise of a power given by the legislature expressly to pass the particular ordinance is not a subject for judicial inquiry, but when the power to legislate on a particular subject is conferred and the particular manner of its exercise is not prescribed, then the question whether it by the municipal corporation is a question of law for the determination of the court. While in the latter case an ordinance which is clearly unreasonable, unjust, and oppressive will be held void, the presumption is in favor of the validity of an ordinance passed in pursuance of statutory authority, and the burden is on the person questioning it to show clearly that it is unreasonable. Lake View v. Tate, 130 Ill. 247, 6 L.R.A. 268, 22 N. E. 791; Hawes v. Chicago, 158 Ill. 653, 30 L.R.A. 225, 42 N. The ordinance is clearly not a reasonable ordinance regulating the business. The information required to be furnished has no relation to any purpose of regulating the business of moving.

The language of clause 42 indicates the purpose of the legislature, in giving the power of regulation to a city council, to be the fixing of compensation and to regulate the business so as to prevent extortion, imposition, and wrong to persons compelled to employ carriers of the classes mentioned in the statute, in having their property or persons carried from one part of the city to another. The information here required would be of no assistance to the city in accomplishing this purpose, and therefore the ordinance requiring it is unreasonable if the ordinance is to be referred only to the exercise of the power conferred by clause 42.

It is contended, however, that the power may be referred to clause 66, and the ordinance held valid as an exercise of the police power, and it is claimed that the information obtained is made use of by the police for the purpose of looking up persons wanted for crime, or under suspicion, or missing, and is of material assistance in the suppression of crime. It is also claimed that the information is important to the department of health in tracing and locating cases of contagious disease in the city. The ordinance is not limited to these purposes, even if possibly it may be incidentally of some value for such purposes, but provides for the sale of the information to any person inquiring as to any particular change or removal. This provision, of course, has no reference to the suppression of crime or the discovery of contagious disease, but authorizes giving the information for any purpose, public or private, to any person who may be willing to pay for it from any motive, friendly or unfriendly, malicious or merely curious. The ordinance requires the carrier to state the character of the articles removed, and § 3 requires the person for whom the moving is done to give the carrier all the information necessary to enable him to make the report, and imposes a penalty for refusal to do so upon request. The ordinance applies to every person who removes from any house, flat, apartment, or room in the city of Chicago to any other place in the city, and has his personal property removed. His personal property may be contained in one or more trunks or boxes, but, upon the request of the person moving the property, the owner is required by this ordinance to furnish for the use of the police department of the city of Chicago, or any other person who may see fit to inquire and is willing to pay a small fee for the information, a statement of the character of the property which he is having moved. The effect would be that every person changing his place of abode in the city of Chicago would be obliged to report for the benefit, not only of the police, but of every inquirer, the place from which he moved and the place to which he moved and the character of the property which he took with him. There are some businesses in which police regulation is peculiarly needed, such as those of pawnbrokers and the keepers of junk shops, because thieves frequently attempt to dispose of stolen goods at the places where such businesses are carried on, and the keepers not infrequently become fences for such goods, and therefore provisions for the strict regulation and supervision by the police of those engaged in those businesses and of their dealings have been sustained; but the same reason does not apply to the business of moving or to people generally who have their personal property moved.

The appellant cites Lawson v. Judge of Recorder's Court, 175 Mich. 375, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1152, 141 N. W. 623, in support of the validity of the ordinance. The ordinance in that case was limited to public moving van drivers, and required a report to the police commissioner, only, of the place from and to which household furniture was moved, and the name of the person for whom moved. It required no information from the owner of the property or the person from whom it was moved, and imposed no penalty or requirement of any kind on them. Even if we were disposed to agree with that case, it affords no support for the broad and sweeping terms of the ordinance here in question. An ordinance more nearly resembling that in question here was sustained by the supreme court of Missouri in Wagner v. St. Louis, 284 Mo. 410, 12 A.L.R. 495, 224 S. W. 413, but we do not agree with that case. It would not be a reasonable exercise of the police power for the city to require any person occupying temporarily or for an indefinite time a home or room in the city to procure a permit from the chief of police before he could remove to another house or room and have his baggage or property moved. Neither is it reasonable to require him to report such removal to the police department.

Without regard to any constitutional question, the ordinance is an unreasonable, inquisitorial interference with the liberty of individuals to move from place to place and have their property moved without interference, and is void.

The judgment will be affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Validity of statute or ordinance in relation to moving vans and moving operations.

Earlier cases will be found in the annotation in 12 A.L.R. 499.

Aside from the reported case (CHICAGO v. HEBARD EXP. & VAN Co. ante, 206), no additional cases have been found, since the earlier note, that have considered the question.

CHICAGO v. HEBARD EXP. & VAN Co., it will be observed, while recognizing generally the right of the municipality to regulate persons engaged in moving operations, holds that the ordinance in question was not a reasonable ordinance, in that the information required to be furnished has no relation to any purpose of regulating the business of moving, criticizing Wagoner v. St. Louis, to which the earlier annotation is attached, which upheld an ordinance somewhat similar to the one under consideration in the reported case.

It will be further observed that it is held in the reported case that the ordinance under consideration does not violate the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. J. H. B.

W. T. BRITTIAN.

North Carolina Supreme Court—December 21, 1921.

(182 N. C. 676, 110 S. E. 82.)

Auction — right to recover commission from one who refuses to comply with bid.

An auctioneer cannot recover damages for loss of commissions from one who, after the property has been knocked down to him, refuses to comply with his bid because of a misunderstanding and is released by the owner.

[See note on this question beginning on page 214.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for McDowell County (Shaw, J.) sustaining a motion for nonsuit of an action brought to recover damages for loss of commissions. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Pless, Winborne, & Pless, for appellant:

A broker can hold a third person with whom he has no contract for commissions liable for his commissions upon the failure of said third person to complete the sale as previously agreed to.

Messrs. Avery & Ervin for appellee.

Stacy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The following statement of the case will suffice for our present decision:

Plaintiffs auctioneers, by agreement with the owner of the property, were to receive, as their compensation for conducting the sale, a given per cent, of the selling price of the lands. The defendant was present and became the last and highest bidder of the lots in question, and signed memoranda containing the following stipulation: "This is to certify that I have this day bought of R. Williams through Gibson Land Auction Company the following real estate as shown on the map of the R. Williams property, and on the terms and conditions announced at sale of said property."

The defendant refused to accept the deeds, which were tendered for the lots bid off by him, and declined to pay the purchase price, as per his agreement, because of some misunderstanding on his part; and in consequence of which the owner of the land afterwards released the defendant from his bid, and sold the lots to another or other parties.

The written contract between plaintiffs and the owner of the land contained a stipulation to the effect that plaintiffs should receive "a commission of 10 per cent for any sale or sales of any part or all of the property that may be sold by the parties of the second part, and confirmed by the parties of the first part."

The plaintiffs never had any contract with the defendant for their commissions, and the sale to him was not carried out. It is alleged, however, that by reason of the de-defendant's failure to take the property, according to his bid at the auction sale, the plaintiffs have suffered a loss to the extent of the value of their commissions, and that the defendant should be held liable in damages therefor.

Upon the foregoing facts being made to appear in evidence, his Honor granted the defendant's motion for judgment as of nonsuit, and the appeal presents for review the correctness of this ruling.

It will be observed that the plaintiffs had no contract with the defendant, but their commissions were to be paid by the owner of the land. The case, therefore, in principle, is not unlike Faison v. Marshburn, 108 S. E. 510, at the present term, where a recovery was denied to the broker, who had sued the prospective purchaser when he alone had a contract for his commissions with the owner. Here, as was the case there, an attempt is being made to hold the defendant responsible for violating his contract, not with the plaintiffs, but with a third party, who is a stranger to the suit. It is conceded that the plaintiffs have no interest in the land, and that they cannot sue upon the contract of purchase. They are unable to perform the contract as vendors, or to enforce its performance; hence they are not in position to maintain an action for its breach. The only contractual obligations which may be insisted on by reason of defendant's bid, so far as he is concerned, are those existing between the defendant and the owner of the land. The plaintiffs are neither parties nor privies to the contract of sale, and the defendant is neither party nor privy to plaintiffs' contract for commissions. So whatever rights, if any, the plaintiffs may have, as against the defendant, apparently are not contractual in their nature. On the other hand, there is no contention that the defendant has breached any extracontractual legal duty for which the plaintiffs may maintain an action in tort. In all events, if the plaintiffs be entitled to recover, they must recover in an action growing out of contract; and none has been shown with the defendant.

In all the cases called to our attention by the plaintiffs, seemingly in support of their position, there was a contract direct with the defendant, or a request by him for the broker's services; and, in each case, recovery was allowed on this contract, or upon an implied contract, for services rendered to the defendant, and not upon the contract of purchase, though the loss of commissions may have been fixed as the proper measure of damages. 4 R. C. L. 333.

In Atkinson v. Pack, 114 N. C. 597, 19 S. E. 628, a case chiefly relied on by plaintiffs, the above distinction is clearly drawn, the court saying: "There were plainly two contracts made by plaintiffs,—the one with defendant, the effect of which was that plaintiffs would provide a purchaser of the land at the agreed price, commissions to be paid by the purchaser; the other with the purchaser, that he would pay the plaintiffs' commissions upon the conclusion of the sale. If through the negotiation of plaintiffs the parties had been brought together and had concluded the trade between them, the plaintiffs would have been entitled to their commissions from Harding, the purchaser, according to the terms of their contract. But this action is for damages. The gravamen of the charge is that defendant committed the wrong and injury upon plaintiffs by a refusal, without cause, to comply with his contract with plaintiffs to sell the land to plaintiffs' principal, with the distinct understanding that plaintiffs were to be compensated by the purchaser. The natural effect and consequence of this refusal by defendant was the loss by plaintiffs of their commissions."

To like effect is the decision of the St. Louis court of appeals in the case of Cavender v. Waddingham, 2 Mo.

App. 551. There it was understood that the plaintiffs were to receive, as commissions, a certain percentage of the purchase price of the land, but it was stipulated that this should be paid by the vendors, and the plaintiffs would divide the same, when realized, with the defendant, allowing him one fifth part thereof. Plaintiffs consummated the agreement for the purchase in exact accordance with defendant's directions. The defendant then refused to accept the deed. Upon these facts, the court observed:

"The first question to which our attention is directed is whether, upon the facts stated, the plaintiffs had any right of action against the defendant? It is argued that they had none, because it was expressly stipulated that their commissions were to be paid by Messrs. Scudder, and not, in any event, by the defendant; that this is an attempt to hold a party responsible for violating his contract, not with the party suing, but with a third party—the defendant here having violated none except that made through the plaintiffs, Messrs. Scudder. But this argument ignores the prominent fact that there were two distinct contracts,—one was made by defendant, through his agents, in the purchase of the property; the other was made with the agents, in securing their services to bring about the purchase. The latter is the subject of the present suit.

"When the plaintiffs were employed by the defendant to effect a purchase for his benefit, they undertook to do so for a consideration, which was clearly understood. This was that, in the event of success, they were to be compensated, according to the usages of their business, by a percentage upon the amount of purchase money. The defendant said to them, in effect:

'You procure the consent of the property owners to sell to me upon the terms indicated. I undertake, on my part, to consummate the trade by paying the purchase money, so that you will realize your commissions.' The defendant's undertaking to take and pay for the property so that plaintiffs would get their compensation, was as emphatic and as binding as if he had agreed to pay the commissions himself."

Without prolonging this discussion, it may be stated that we have examined the following cases, cited by plaintiffs, and find them to be in support of, rather than in conflict with, what is said above: Livermore v. Crane, 26 Wash. 529, 67 Pac. 221, and cases cited in briefs as reported in 57 L.R.A. 401; Eells Bros. v. Parsons, 132 Iowa, 543, 109 N. W. 1098, and cases cited in note as reported in 11 Ann. Cas. 475; Ackerman v. Bryan, 33 Neb. 515, 50 N. W. 435; 4 R. C. L. 334, and cases there collected. See also Tinsley v. Dowell, 87 Tex. 23, 26 S. W. 946, and Thompson v. Kelly, 101 Mass. 291, 3 Am. Rep. 353.

But for a further reason the plaintiffs are not entitled to maintain this suit. The owner of the land, plaintiffs' principal, has voluntarily released the defendant from his contract of purchase; hence whatever obligations may have been incurred by the defendant's bid are now at an end. They have been surrendered and discharged with the consent of the owner, who alone was entitled to insist upon performance. There is no contract, now existent, of any kind, relating to this matter, to which the defendant is a party. Therefore upon the record we think the judgment of nonsuit must be upheld.

Affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Right of broker or auctioneer employed by owner as against prospective purchaser or bidder who refuses to complete purchase.

There is but little direct authority on the right of a broker or auctioneer to recover from a prospective purchaser who refuses to complete his purchase. In nearly all cases involving the right of a broker or auctioneer employed by the owner of land to recover compensation or commissions where the sale has not been completed, the suit has been brought against the owner on the broker's contract of employment, and not against the prospective purchaser. In the comparatively few cases considering the question the rule appears to be that, as there is no privity of contract between the parties, no right to recover against the purchaser exists in favor of the broker or auctioneer. Evrit v. Bancroft (1871) 22 Ohio St. 172; Tinsley v. Dowell (1894) 87 Tex. 23, 26 S. W. 946; Tinsley v. Anderson (1895) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 33 S. W. 266; Le Master v. Dalhart Real Estate Agency (1909) 56 Tex. Civ. App. 302, 121 S. W. 185. And see the reported case (GIBSON LAND AUCTION CO. v. BRITIAN, ante, 211). See also Jenkins v. Hollingsworth (1899) 83 Ill. App. 139. Compare Moscovitch v. Desambor (1914) 21 Rev. de Jur. (Can.) 81, 18 D. L. R. 230.

Thus, in Le Master v. Dalhart Real Estate Agency (1909) 56 Tex. Civ. App. 302, 121 S. W. 185, supra, the court said: "A mere selling agent or broker has no such interest in a contract for the purchase of land secured by him as authorizes a recovery of damages in the way of lost commissions from the proposed purchaser who has refused to comply with the contract."

In Evrit v. Bahcroft (Ohio) supra, it appeared that a real estate agent's agreement with his principal provided that he should receive for his services in selling the principal's farm all above a specified price. A contract of sale was entered into between the agent in his own name and prospective purchasers, who subsequently refused to complete the sale. In denying the right of the agent to recover as damages from the purchasers the amount of the difference between the sale price and the amount the principal had agreed with the agent to accept, the court said: "The claim which the plaintiff sought to enforce against the defendants consisted of the compensation to which he would have been entitled, under his agreement with his principal, if the agreement with the defendants for the sale of the farm had been performed. As his loss of this compensation resulted from the default, as he alleges, of the defendants, he claims the right to make them respond in damages to the extent that may be necessary to repair it. We think he has no such right. The defendants were not parties to the agreement providing for this compensation. Their liability is to be ascertained from their own agreement, and the rule of damages is the same whether the suit is brought in the name of the principal, or in the name of the agent as one of the contracting parties."

Similarly, in Tinsley v. Dowell (1894) 87 Tex. 23, 26 S. W. 946, it was shown that the owners of lands placed the same in the hands of a real estate broker, with the understanding that the latter was to receive for his services in making a sale, certain commissions and all the lands brought above a stipulated price. A contract was entered into by the agent and an intending purchaser, who subsequently failed to carry out his part of the contract. The agent brought suit to recover from him the amount he would have received above the stipulated price had the sale been consummated. The court held that no right of recovery existed against the purchaser, saying: "It would be remarkable as a legal consequence that a man who was not bound to convey land, and could not be held liable for a failure to comply with the contract.

might maintain a suit against the other party for a failure to complete the purchase. In this case Dowell could not have been made liable for the damages if the land had appreciated in value and Rogers had refused to convey in accordance with the contract. The subject-matter of the contract made between Tinsley and Dowell was the land which Rogers and wife authorized Dowell to sell. The question is, Did Dowell have any such interest in the land as would authorize him to maintain this action? If Dowell had any such interest, he must have acquired it by his contract with Rogers; and that, being an authority to sell land, did not by its terms confer any title upon Dowell; the power to convey was reserved by Rogers and wife. A vendor with no power to make a deed would be an anomaly in the law. It is clear that Dowell acquired no title by virtue of that contract. It must be borne in mind that the interest which the agent has must not be simply in the contract, or in the proceeds to be derived from the execution of the power; it must be an interest in the land itself. . . . A power to sell land or other property . . . and to receive a part of the proceeds as compensation for services to be rendered in the execution of the power does not carry an interest in the property . . . to the agent."

The foregoing decision was followed in Tinsley v. Anderson (1895) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 33 S. W. 266, wherein the court said: "This is a plain declaration on a contract to purchase land, and the liability of the appellant is based on his failure to carry out the terms of the contract. Appellee did not own the land, but was acting for the owners in the sale of it. It is neither alleged nor proved that appellee had been made and constituted the agent of the appellant to buy the land, and that he was to receive, as remuneration for his services, the sum of $35 per acre, but the written contract shows that it was a mere naked offer to buy land at a certain price. The contract must be looked to as the culmination of the wishes of the parties, and it certainly does not indicate that the relation of principal and agent existed between the parties. We can see no material difference between this case and that of Tinsley v. Dowell (1892) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 24 S. W. 928, reversed in (1894) 87 Tex. 23, 26 S. W. 946. . . . In the case before us, Dignowity and others owned certain land in the city of San Antonio, which Anderson was authorized to sell, and his compensation was to be all that he obtained in excess of $240 per acre. Anderson made a contract of sale with Tinsley at a price exceeding that fixed by the owners in the sum of $875. Tinsley failed to comply with his contract, although the owners of the land executed a deed to the land to him. Anderson sued for the excess over the price fixed by the owners of the land. In both cases there was nothing to indicate that the land at time of default was not of value equal to the value agreed to be paid by Tinsley. The Dowell Case is decisive of this, and to it we refer for the law applicable to the facts before us."

In the reported case (GIBSON LAND AUCTION CO. v. BRITTIAN, ante, 211), it is held that as there is no privity of contract between auctioneers employed by the owner of land to sell the same, and a purchaser at auction who repudiates his contract to purchase by refusing to accept deeds and by declining to pay for the land, the auctioneer cannot maintain an action for commissions against the purchaser.

The case of Moscovitch v. Desambor (1914) 21 Rev. de Jur. (Can.) 81, 18 D. L. R. 230, appears to be in direct conflict with the rule laid down in the foregoing cases. In that case it was held that an agent who, according to a landowner's promises, was to receive a commission for selling a parcel of land, was entitled to recover damages against a prospective purchaser refusing to complete his purchase, the terms of which had been accepted by the owner; although the agent might subsequently have earned the promised commission by securing another purchaser for the same parcel of land.

While not directly in point, the following analogous decisions are included in the note as being of possible value to the reader:

Faison v. Marshburn (1921) 182 N. C. 133, 108 S. E. 510, was a joint action by the owner of land and a real estate broker employed to sell the same against a prospective purchaser to recover the amount of the purchase price, out of which were to be paid the broker's commissions. Although the complaint alleged that the purchaser had failed and refused to carry out his agreement, it appeared that the owner had not insisted on or demanded performance. The court said: "We fully concur with his Honor below that, upon the evidence, J. J. Matthis is not entitled to recover of the defendant Marshburn, and further, that the complaint fails to allege facts sufficient to constitute a valid cause of action. It will be observed that J. F. Faison, the owner of the land, is not insisting or demanding that the defendant comply with his bid. No deed has been tendered, and he expressly states that he is not asking for any relief in this action. The broker is seeking to recover his commissions out of the prospective purchaser without any sale having been consummated. His agreement was with Faison, the owner of the land, not with the defendant."

In Hevia v. Wheelock (1914) 162 App. Div. 759, 148 N. Y. Supp. 165, the complaint alleged that the broker had been employed by a property owner to secure a loan on certain property to be conveyed to her according to a contract for an exchange of lands, and that by reason of the refusal of the defendant, who was the other party to the contract of exchange, to convey, he was deprived of the opportunity of earning his commission. The court held that the complaint did not state a good cause of action, as the defendant was not a party to the contract between the broker and property owner.

It appeared in Eells Bros. v. Parsons (1906) 132 Iowa, 543, 109 N. W. 1098, 11 Ann. Cas. 475, that a real estate broker entered into an agreement with a prospective purchaser of land under the terms of which the latter agreed to buy, if suited, land which the broker was to have him look at. The owners were to pay the broker's commissions in case of a sale. The land proving satisfactory, a contract of purchase was entered into between the owner and the purchaser, which the latter subsequently refused to carry out. On the broker's suit for damages for breach of the purchaser's contract, the court upheld the right to a recovery, saying: "The action is for breach of defendant's contract, and not for the commissions from the landowner. To the latter, plaintiff was not entitled, for the reason that through defendant's fault, as it alleged, it had not earned them. It is for damages for defendant's breach of contract to do as he agreed in purchasing and paying for the land which so well suited him that he entered into a contract for its purchase, which it is charged he, without cause, refused to perform. If plaintiff were attempting to recover a commission for the sale of the land he should be defeated, for defendant never promised him this. What he (defendant) did agree to do was to purchase the land which suited him, thus enabling plaintiff to earn his commission. The parties understood when they made the contract what plaintiff's damages would be in the event defendant failed to perform it. In other words, loss of plaintiff's commission was within the contemplation of the parties in the event of defendant's failure to perform." L. F. C.

ASHTABULA GAS COMPANY et al., Pffs. in Err.,
v.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION et al.

Ohio Supreme Court — March 2, 1920.

(102 Ohio St. 678, 133 N. E. 915.)

Public service corporation — rates — service charge.

Where a minimum charge for service to be rendered is made or prohibited by the ordinance under which a public utility is operated, the utility is not authorized to make a "readiness-to-serve" charge to be paid in addition to the just and reasonable rate fixed for the rendering of the service.

Headnote by the COURT.

ERROR to the Public Utilities Commission to review its order fixing the terms and rates which the gas company should be permitted to make for the service of gas to the city in a proceeding for modification of such order. Order set aside and cause remanded to commission with instructions.

Statement by Johnson, J.:

This is a proceeding which seeks the modification of an order of the Public Utilities Commission in an appeal proceeding before it, in which the plaintiff in error the Ashtabula Gas Company and others appealed from an ordinance of the city of Ashtabula passed September 14, 1914. The city intervenes by cross petition in error, also asking a modification of the order.

The order complained of fixed the terms and rates which the gas company should be permitted to make for the service of gas to the city.

Prior to 1901 the gas company furnished to the city artificial gas. During that year natural gas was discovered in the vicinity and the company secured a franchise from the city to lay pipes and furnish both artificial and natural gas for a period of twenty-five years.

In November, 1901, the Ashtabula Gas Company entered into an agreement with the Northeastern Oil & Gas Company, by which the latter agreed to furnish natural gas to the Ashtabula Company "as long as it has gas or can get it at a reasonable expense, the Ashtabula Company to pay the Northeastern Company two thirds of its gross charges for sale of gas."

In November, 1905, the Northeastern Company entered into a contract with the Clarion Gas Company. On July 5, 1904, the council of Ashtabula, supplementing the former franchise ordinance, passed a price ordinance granting to the Ashtabula Company the right to serve the citizens of Ashtabula, under the previous ordinance, at the price of 33 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, with a discount of 3 cents per 1,000 cubic feet if paid on or before the 10th of each month. This ordinance expired by its terms in July, 1914.

On the 19th of October, 1914, the council passed a renewal ordinance, fixing the price which the company should charge for gas for the ensuing ten years at the same rate as for the previous ten years. The ordinance provided that the company might collect as a "readiness-to-serve charge" for each meter each month such sum as, added to the net gas bill for such month, would make a total of 25 cents, but, if the net gas bill for gas registered by any meter amounted in any month to 25 cents, no "readiness-to-serve charge" should be charged for such meter during said month. The gas company notified the city that it would not accept this ordinance, and filed its schedule with the Utilities Commission, fixing the price for which it would furnish gas at 39 cents, less a discount of 3 cents per thousand if paid before the 10th of the month. The company appealed from the ordinance of the commission, and gave bond to authorize it to charge the rate fixed by the schedule pending the determination of the appeal. The hearings were extended over a considerable period, and a large amount of testimony was taken on the question of the value of the company's property used and useful for the service. After consideration of this testimony and argument thereon, the commission found that the rates fixed by the ordinance were unjust and unreasonable, and ought not to be ratified, and ordered that the rates and charges should be fixed at not exceeding 36 cents per 1,000 feet, with a discount of 2 cents per thousand if paid on or before the 10th of the month next following, and in addition thereto a "readiness-to-serve charge" to the distributing company of 20 cents per meter per month. As stated, this proceeding is brought to reverse or modify that order.

Messrs. John G. Price, Attorney General, and Edward E. Corn, for defendant in error Commission:

The "readiness-to-serve" charge is now, without exception, recognized, and is the fairest and most equitable way of fixing rates.

Johnson, J., filed the following opinion:

The record contains considerable testimony which was offered touching the contentions of the different parties. The results of extensive examinations by experts, officers of the gas company, and other witnesses were produced. We have also had the benefit of the written opinion of the commission, from which it appears that that body, in the consideration of the case, proceeded in compliance with the requirements of the statute which defines its duties. In the effort to arrive at a just and reasonable rate as required by the statute, it ascertained values, costs, expenses, depreciation, and the other elements which are essential to approximately a correct result.

Before this court will interfere with an order of the Public Utilities Commission it must appear from a consideration of the record that its action was unlawful or unreasonable. From a careful examination of the evidence and briefs of counsel, we are not able to say that the order of the commission, fixing the rate which the company was entitled to charge for gas at 36 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, with a discount of 2 cents per thousand if paid on or before the 10th day of the month, was unreasonable or unlawful. We think that portion of its order was sustained by the evidence. The reasons given by the commission in its opinion are convincing, and are sufficient on that part of its order. But the order contains the further provision that there shall be paid, "in addition thereto, a readiness-to-serve charge to the distributing company of 20 cents per meter per month."

The city contends that the inclusion of the charge referred to is unreasonable and unlawful. It must be conceded that there has been considerable confusion and inaptness in the use of the terms "minimum charge" and "readiness to serve," in connection with public utilities rate fixing. The terminology involved in the entire subject is as yet too indefinite and extensive. But there is not much dispute concerning the meaning of the term "minimum charge," as applied to that service. In substance it means the minimum monthly bill which will be rendered regardless of whether or not the consumer has used sufficient of the commodity to make up that sum at the agreed rate. If the consumer uses as much of the gas as will make up this minimum charge, or more, the minimum charge is absorbed in that sum. It means simply that the consumer binds himself to pay for "at least" so much of the commodity during each month. It is manifest that the main purpose of the minimum charge is to make sure that each consumer shall bear a proper proportion of the expense incurred in the furnishing of the commodity or service. The consumer, having become a customer of the company, simply stands in the attitude of having agreed that he will pay for "at least" so much per month whether he has used that much or not. It is easy to understand that many customers do not at times use sufficient service to incur a bill large enough to meet their proper part of the fixed expenses of the company in furnishing the service. It seems clear, therefore, that a minimum charge is not only necessary to compensate the company, but that it is equitable and just as between the company and all of the consumers taken collectively. As to the "readiness-to-serve charge," while there is some difference in the statements of different experts and other authorities and reported cases, there is general agreement that the "readiness-to-serve charge" has been understood to cover the cost incurred by the utility in holding itself in constant readiness to render the service, without reference to the delivery of any of the commodity or the rendering of any of the service, it being understood that for the actual commodity or service rendered or used payment shall be made by additional rate schedule.

Now, as stated, the order of the commission in this case, after fixing the rate of 36 cents per thousand, is that there shall be "in addition thereto a readiness-to-serve charge to the distributing company of 20 cents per meter per month." It will be observed that there is in this clause the simple provision that there shall be paid to the company 20 cents per meter per month in addition to the amount due for gas used. There is nothing in addition to this to indicate what is meant by the term "readiness-to-serve charge."

Section 9329, General Code, contains the provision that no gas company shall charge rent for meters.

Section 3982, General Code, provides that the council may regulate and fix the price which such companies shall charge for the rent of their meters, and such ordinance may provide that such price shall include the use of meters to be furnished by the companies, and in such case meters shall be furnished and kept in repair by the company, and no separate charge shall be made, either directly or indirectly, for the use or repair of them.

In the ordinance appealed from there was a provision that the company might collect as a "readiness-to-serve charge" for each meter, each month, such sum as, added to the net gas bill for such month, will make a total of 25 cents, but if the net gas bill registered by the meter for any one month amounts to 25 cents or more no readiness-to-serve charge shall be charged during said month.

It will be observed that this is simply and only a minimum charge; that is, that each customer agrees to pay at least 25 cents a month. If he uses that or more there is no ready-to-serve charge, but it is absorbed in the bill. But in the order of the commission it is provided that, in addition to the rate fixed, there shall be a "readiness-to-serve charge" of 20 cents per meter per month, which is, of course, a very different thing. Whatever the bill for any month may be the charge is added.

By the provisions of §§ 614-44, General Code, the city Ashtabula was empowered to fix the rate and do the things provided for in §§ 3982 and 3983, General Code. These sections provide that the council may from time to time regulate the price of gas, etc., and also contain the provision as to regulating the charge for meters which is above referred to. The ordinance did not regulate or fix the price which the company could charge for the rent of meters. In legal effect it simply provided for a rate to be charged for gas, and required the use of at least so much at that rate. That ordinance was the thing appealed from.

Section 614-46 provides that if the commission shall be of the opinion that the rate, etc., so fixed by ordinance, is or will be unjust or unreasonable or insufficient to yield reasonable compensation, it shall, under the conditions set forth in detail in the section, proceed to fix and determine the just and reasonable rate, etc., to be charged during the time fixed by the ordinance. In this case the order of the commission not only found that the rate fixed by the ordinance was unjust and unreasonable, and fixed a rate which it found to be just and reasonable, but made the additional charge described.

It is contended that by the provisions of § 614-17 authority was given to make the addition of the "readiness-to-serve charge" referred to. That section contains the provision that nothing in the act shall be taken to prohibit a public utility from entering into any reasonable arrangement with its customers, consumers, or employees for the division or distribution of its surplus profits, or providing for a sliding scale of charges, or providing for a minimum charge for service to be rendered, unless such minimum charge is made or prohibited by the terms of the franchise, grant, or ordinance under which the utility is operated, the classification of service based upon the quantity used, the time when used, the purpose for which used, duration of use, and any other consideration, or providing any other financial device that may be practicable or advantageous to the parties interested.

The section provides that such arrangement, etc., shall be first filed with the commission and approved by it before it is effective. It will be observed that by this section there is an express provision allowing a minimum charge, unless it is made or prohibited by the ordinance under which the utility is operated. There is no mention of a provision for a "readiness-to-serve charge," and the presumption is that none was intended to be included or implied, unless the language "providing any other financial device" permits a readiness-to-serve charge. This language, "any other financial device that may be practicable or advantageous to the parties interested," is extremely vague and indefinite, and we do not feel warranted to hold that the legislature intended by such language to grant the privilege to make material additions to the just and reasonable rate which the public is required to pay for the service of the public utility, which just and reasonable rate is fixed (when appeal is taken from ordinances fixing rates) by the commission in the specific manner laid down in § 614-46, General Code. As we have seen, the minimum charge, which is provided for with due regard to the circumstances, is just and reasonable.

Moreover, as pointed out, § 614-17, General Code, above referred to, contains an express provision allowing a minimum charge "unless made or prohibited by the ordinance." This ordinance contains what is in effect a minimum charge, though it is denominated a readiness-to-serve charge in the ordinance. It is "made by the ordinance," and cannot be made by the company in its own schedule. This conclusion follows from the plain implication of the statute.

The commission found that the rates fixed by the ordinance were unjust and unreasonable. As pointed out, it ordered that the rate should be fixed at not exceeding 36 cents per 1,000 feet, and in addition thereto a readiness-to-serve charge of 20 cents per meter per month. The effect of this was to set aside the minimum charge fixed by the ordinance and to insert in its place the readiness-to-serve charge referred to.

We think it clear that the portion of the commission's order touching the readiness-to-serve charge and setting aside the minimum charge was not, under the facts and circumstances of this case, authorized by our statutes. And it is well settled that the commission has only such authority as is conferred by the statutes which created it and which define its powers and duties.

The order of the Commission will be modified by striking out the portion thereof which refers to the readiness-to-serve charge and inserting therein that portion of the ordinance in question which follows the clause fixing the rate, and, as thus modified, the order of the Commission will be affirmed.

Order modified and affirmed as modified.

A rehearing having been granted the following Per Curiam response was handed down June 7, 1921:

The court adheres to the views stated in the opinion filed herein after the former hearing of the case; but, inasmuch as the commission now asserts that the language of its former order inadvertently provided for a charge to be paid to the company in addition to the just and reasonable rate which the commission fixed for the service, and that the language of the order of the commission conveys a meaning not intended by the commission, it is ordered and adjudged that the order heretofore made by this court herein be set aside, and that this cause be remanded to the Public Utilities Commission, with instructions to fix a just and reasonable rate in accordance with the statute and the opinion of this court.

SAME.

Rhode Island Supreme Court — December 9, 1921.

(— R. I. —, 115 Atl. 461.)

Gas — validity of service charge.

The imposition of a service charge upon each consumer by a gas company is not unreasonable or prohibited by a statute imposing a penalty on a gas company which shall collect a larger sum for gas than appears to be due by inspection of the meter put in to register the consumption.

Sweeney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These are appeals from an order and decree of the public utilities commission dismissing the complaints of the appellants, and are heard together in this court upon the transcript of the evidence taken before said commission.

The reason for the complaints was the filing, April 14, 1920, by the Providence Gas Company with the commission, of a schedule of rates to take effect May 17, 1920. The schedule of rates thus filed increased the rates for gas, provided for a service charge of 50 cents for each meter each month, and lowered the standard of the gas.

The appellants filed objections to the proposed schedule with the commission, and the city council of Providence also filed its objections to the proposed rates. All of said objections were heard together by said commission in July, 1920, and at the same time the gas company was given an opportunity to introduce testimony to justify the changes made by its proposed schedule. Eight days were occupied in presenting testimony or reading exhibits, and the transcript of the evidence produced in this court is voluminous.

The commission made a careful examination and analysis of the evidence presented to it, and found that the gas company had sustained the burden of proof imposed upon it by showing the necessity for the increased rate; that the service charge was reasonable; that the schedule of rates as filed was just and reasonable; and that the reduction in the standard of gas, under the conditions then confronting the company, was necessary, and denied and dismissed the complaints on the 14th day of May, 1921.

The city council of Providence claimed no appeal from this action, but the city council of Cranston and the complainants Rivelli and others duly claimed appeals therefrom to this court.

The appellants claim in their reasons of appeal that the imposition of the service charge is illegal and unreasonable, that the lowering of the standard of gas is unreasonable, and that the proposed schedule of rates is unjustly discriminatory.

The schedule of rates was filed by the gas company with the commission as required by § 48, chap. 795, Public Laws 1912, known as the Public Utilities Act, which provides, among other things, that no change shall be made in existing rates, excepting after thirty days' notice to the commission and to the public of the changes proposed to be made in the schedule then in effect, and the time when the change of rates will go into effect. The commission has no authority to fix rates for a public utility excepting when, after a hearing and investigation, it finds that the existing rates are unjust, unreasonable, insufficient, or unjustly discriminatory, or to be preferential or otherwise in violation of the provisions of said Public Utilities Act, § 21, chap. 795, Public Laws 1912.

The commission found that the service charge made by the company, in the schedule of rates under consideration, was reasonable, and that if such a charge was not made it would be necessary to directly increase the price of gas.

The appellants now claim that the service charge is illegal because it is in violation of § 53, chap. 345, General Laws 1909, which provides, among other things, that every person or corporation who shall wilfully collect a larger sum for gas than appears to be due on inspection of the meter put in to register the same shall be fined not exceeding $500. This law does not penalize the collection of a service charge. Gas—validity of service charge.

It only provides a penalty on any person or corporation for wilfully furnishing a meter which does not correctly register the quantity of gas consumed, or who collects a larger sum of money for gas than appears to be due upon an inspection of the meter. It imposes a penalty for using meters incorrectly registering the amount of gas consumed, or for wilfully collecting money for gas not shown by the meter to have been consumed.

The service charge is a uniform charge to all customers which, together with another charge based upon the amount of gas consumed as shown by the meter, constitutes the entire amount to be paid. The service charge is an equal distribution of those burdens incident to the manufacture and distribution of gas which should be borne by all consumers, irrespective of the quantity used. The consumer of gas pays his equalized cost of the service, and neither the small consumer nor the large one is compelled to carry a load that should be shared by both.

The principle of the service charge has been allowed by many public utilities commissions throughout the United States on the ground that it is equitable and just. In the case of the Rochester Gas & E. Corp. (N. Y. 2d Dist.) P.U.R.1921A, p. 415, at page 420, in allowing a service charge, the commission said: "The corporation provides and installs meters and it bears the expense of the pipe from the main to the property line. Here is an investment upon which it is entitled to a return, and which is constant whether gas is used or not used. Meters must be inspected and kept in repair and so must the service pipes. Meters must be read whether gas is used or not, accounts must be kept with the individual consumer, and bills must be rendered and accounts collected. While the rendition and collection of bills are not regardless of whether any gas is consumed, the expense in no wise relates to the amount of the consumption, and it is therefore a charge which should be distributed among the customers as a total. Meters and services depreciate regardless of the consumption, and the total depreciation depends upon the number of meters and number of services."

It would be possible to increase the rates for furnishing gas used so as to cover the service charge. When the consumer uses such a small quantity of gas that the profit upon it will not defray the costs of serving him with it, it is not unreasonable that he should be required to pay for such service in addition to paying for the gas used by him.

The commission found that the reduction in the standard of gas was necessary under the conditions then confronting the company. The company presented testimony to show that it has ample equipment to produce coal gas and water gas in sufficient quantities to meet the requirements of the people living within the territory served by it. It was also shown that owing to the extraordinary conditions then existing it was impossible for the company to get its necessary supply of gas coal and oil to produce coal gas and water gas at prices sufficiently low to enable to continue to sell gas to its consumers at the proposed rate, without lowering the standard or quality of the gas. The testimony also showed that the lowering of the standard of gas would affect the use of gas for illuminating purposes but slightly, as only 5 per cent of the gas manufactured is used for this purpose, and the objection to the lower standard of gas could be easily overcome by the use of mantles instead of using the open flame burner; and that the lower standard of gas would affect but little its use for heating or industrial purposes.

The claim that the schedule of rates is unjustly discriminatory is based upon the claim that the service charge is illegal and places an unjust burden upon the so-called "small consumer." Inasmuch as we have held that the service charge is legal and applies to all consumers alike, it cannot be held to be unjustly discriminatory.

An analysis of the testimony is stated at length in the opinion of the commission, and it is unnecessary to incorporate it in this opinion.

After a careful consideration of the facts, as shown by the testimony and the law applicable thereto, the court is of the opinion that the claims made by the appellants cannot be sustained, and therefore the order and decree of the Public Utilities Commission appealed from is sustained and affirmed, and the appeals therefrom are denied and dismissed.

ANNOTATION.

Validity of service charge for gas meter.

In the absence of statutory or contract regulation of the subject, it seems that a gas company may make, under ordinary circumstances, a reasonable service charge for the use or rental of its meters. Thus, in Smith v. Capital Gas Co. (1901) 132 Cal. 209, 54 L.R.A. 769, 64 Pac. 258, holding that it is not an unlawful discrimination to require such a payment from a consumer who uses but a small quantity of gas, although larger consumers are not charged therewith, the court said: "There can be no doubt . . . of the right of gas companies, ordinarily, to charge rent for meters."

In upholding a rule or regulation of a gas company prescribing payment by the consumer of a certain sum per month as meter rent where the amount of gas used was less than 500 cubic feet, which was attacked as unreasonable, the court, in State ex rel. Weise v. Sedalia Gaslight Co. (1889) 34 Mo. App. 501, said: "Can it be said that this charge of $1.25 per month on a consumer of less than 500 cubic feet of gas is unreasonable? We think it is not unjust or unreasonable. The evident purpose of this rule was to exact fair compensation from those requiring gas connection and gas furnished at hand, though the amount consumed should be very small, almost nominal. It is a matter of common knowledge that to furnish the gas at hand for the very small or nominal consumer requires the same outlay, in the way of a meter, periodical inspection, and repairs, with weekly or monthly visitations, that is required of very large consumers. The same investment and the same care and oversight are required where the gas monthly consumed shall not exceed 10 cubic feet or even 1 cubic foot, as where the amount used may be 10,000 cubic feet. At the rate charged then in Sedalia, as alleged in relator's complaint, the gas company would be required to invest and expend, for the benefit of this merely nominal consumer, more dollars than cents received."

In RIVELLI v. PROVIDENCE GAS CO. (reported herewith) ante, 222, it is held that as the imposition of a monthly service charge for gas meters is but a fair and equal distribution of those burdens incident to the manufacture and distribution of gas which should be borne by all consumers, irrespective of the quantity used, such a charge is not violative of a statute providing that every person or corporation who shall wilfully collect a larger sum for gas than appears to be due on inspection of the meter shall be subject to fine.

But where the rate to be charged for gas is fixed by contract, ordinance, or statute, a meter charge is unauthorized. Montgomery Light & Water Power Co. v. Watts (1910) 165 Ala. 370, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1109, 138 Am. St. Rep. 71, 51 So. 726; Capital Gas & E. L. Co. v. Gaines (1899) 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1464, 49 S. W. 462; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Columbus Gaslight & Coke Co. (1878) 34 Ohio St. 572, 32 Am. Rep. 390. Compare State ex rel. Weise v. Sedalia Gaslight Co. (Mo.) supra.

Thus, in Capital Gas & E. L. Co. v. Gaines (1899) 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1464, 49 S. W. 462, supra, it was held that a gas company had no right to require consumers to pay meter rent in addition to the rate prescribed by contract between the company and the municipality wherein it was located, although a usage existed at the time the contract was entered into to charge meter rents, the usage being inconsistent with the terms of the contract.

In Montgomery Light & Water Power Co. v. Watts (Ala.) supra, the court said: "The decisions are not in harmony on this question, though it will be found that the cases generally which justify such a charge are based upon ordinances or contracts differently worded, or upon general principles without regard to any contract,—all of which can be ascertained from an examination of the cases cited in appellant's brief. However, the ordinance constitutes the charter of the company, and the contract between it and the city is for the benefit of the citizens; and the reasoning of the cases which deny such right to the company under like circumstances commends itself to our judgment. It may be admitted that, upon general principles, it would be reasonable to allow such a rule where the amount of gas consumed is so small as to render it unreasonable that the company should furnish a meter and keep it up for so small an amount of business, yet we do not see how a court can write into the contract an additional provision. The agreement of the company is to furnish gas at so much per cubic foot, and that must necessarily mean that all the means and instrumentalities necessary to furnish it at those rates shall be provided by the company. It may adopt any means, suitable and accurate, for ascertaining the number of feet consumed, and the customer cannot direct or provide what means shall be used; his only concern being that he receives the service and is not charged more than the rate fixed by the law or the contract. If the company desired the privilege of charging more in certain cases, it should have had a provision to that effect inserted in the ordinance before it accepted the same."

The same rule obtains where the rate to be charged is prescribed by the charter of the gas company. Thus, in Louisville Gas Co. v. Dulaney (1897) 100 Ky. 405, 36 L.R.A. 125, 38 S. W. 703, it was held that a gas company, having accepted its charter, was bound by a provision contained therein limiting the rate to be charged for gas furnished to a certain sum, and could not charge, in addition thereto, for the use of meters which it furnished consumers to measure the gas supplied to them.

The exaction of a "readiness-to serve charge" in addition to the rate stipulated in a contract between a municipality and a gas company, where the contract further provides that no meter rental shall be charged by the company, has been held to be violative of the terms of the contract. Lima v. Public Utilities Commission (1919) 100 Ohio St. 416, 126 N. E. 318.

But in Otsego v. Allegan County Gas Co. (1918) 203 Mich. 283, 168 N. W. 968, it appearing that the gas company's charter provided that all gas meters should be furnished by the company, free of charge, subject to removal if the consumer failed to pay a certain minimum charge per month, the court said: "We cannot accept counsel's argument that a meter charge is forbidden by § 6. A meter charge is not forbidden by § 6 in a certain contingency. The meter in the first instance must be furnished free to the consumer, and he may use it free of charge as long as he uses some gas each month. If he desires to retain it, without using any gas, he must pay 75 cents per month, or be deprived of it. In other words, the consumer is furnished a mechanical device free. He may retain it in one of two ways,—either by taking gas each month, or paying 75 cents each month. Under such a regulation we think the average mind would conclude that he was paying a meter rental, rather than a minimum price for gas. This was the conclusion of the parties to the contract, and they dealt with each other for upwards of five years on the theory that this was the proper interpretation of the contract."

In ASHTABULA GAS CO. v. PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 217, it was held that where a minimum charge for service to be rendered is made or prohibited by the ordinance under which a gas company operates, it is beyond the authority of the Utilities Commission to order a "readiness-to-serve charge" of 20 cents per meter per month in addition to the amount due for gas used. The court distinguished such charge from a charge provided for by the ordinance, which, although denominated a "readiness-to-serve charge" for each meter was in reality a minimum service charge; it, unlike the charge fixed by the commission, being absorbed in the bill for gas consumed if that bill reaches a certain amount per month.

Under a New York statute (Transp. Corp. Law 1890, § 69; 62 McKinney, Consol. Laws, p. 42) prohibiting the charging, directly or indirectly, of a rental on its gas meters, a minimum service charge graduated according to the size of the meter has been held to be a violation of the statute. Buffalo v. Buffalo Gas Co. (1903) 81 App. Div. 505, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1093.

But in Rochester v. Rochester Gas & E. Corp. (1922) 233 N. Y. 39, 134 N. E. 828, and in North Hempstead v. Public Service Commission (1921) 199 App. Div. 189, 191 N. Y. Supp. 394, an order of a public service commission authorizing a gas company to charge a certain rate per 1,000 cubic feet, together with a monthly service charge for each meter, was held not to violate the New York statute heretofore referred to, and in the latter case such order was held by the lower court in (1921) 116 Misc. 585, 190 N. Y. Supp. 794) not to contravene a franchise provision that the company "shall furnish and connect all meters free and shall not make a minimum charge to any consumer."

And it was held in Rochester v. Rochester Gas & E. Corp. (N. Y.) supra, that, under the provisions of the New York Public Service Commission Law, § 65, subs. 1, 2, and 5, and § 66, subd. 14, it was within the jurisdiction of the commission to make such an order, and that such a service charge, when reasonably computed, and moderate in amount, did not involve per se an illegitimate discrimination between classes of consumers. In replying to the argument that the jurisdiction of the commission was limited to prescribing the charge for gas as distinguished from the charge for service, the court said: "We find no such limitation in the statute. 'Every gas corporation' is required to 'furnish and provide such service, instrumentalities, and facilities as shall be safe and adequate and in all respects just and reasonable.' Public Service Commission Law, § 65, subd. 1; Consol. Laws, chap. 48. 'All charges made or demanded by any such gas corporation, . . . for gas, . . . or any service rendered or to be rendered, shall be just and reasonable, and not more than allowed by law or by order of the commission.' § 65, subd. 1. 'Every unjust or unreasonable charge made or demanded for gas, . . . or any such service, or in connection therewith, or in excess of that allowed by law or by the order of the commission, is prohibited.' § 65, subd. 1. We are told that the plaintiff, being a public service corporation, is bound to serve, and that since it is bound to serve, it may not charge inactive accounts for maintaining facilities for service. The conclusion does not follow from the premise. The law imposes the duty to establish connections for the householder who demands them, but it does not impose the duty either to install or to maintain gratuitously. No one is under an obligation to permit connections to be made between his building and the mains. If he demands the facilities, with the added expense that follows, he thereby invites a service, and must be numbered among those for whom service is maintained. The legislature has nowhere said that benefit shall be divorced from burden. On the contrary, permission is expressly given to assess upon the householder the entire cost of installing service pipes beyond the street line (Transp. Corp. Law, § 62; Consol. Laws, chap. 63; Moore v. Champlain Electric Co. (1903) 88 App. Div. 289, 85 N. Y. Supp. 37), and to demand a deposit in advance sufficient to pay therefor. If there is a right to require payment for installation, there must be a right to require payment for repairs. If there is a right to insist upon payment in a lump sum, there must be a right to distribute the payment in accordance with the monthly average of cost. Even if installation were at the cost of the company alone, this would not mean that a return upon the cost would cease to be a factor in the computation of the charge for service. The burden of maintaining the agencies of distribution is to be apportioned among the total body of patrons for whose benefit the agencies exist. No doubt it is to be apportioned fairly and reasonably. But if that requirement is satisfied, it is not a ground for complaint that each has been required to contribute his share of the expense. A service charge is not something in addition to the price that would otherwise be fair and reasonable. It enters into the price of the commodity, not as an element of addition, but as an item of deduction. In the case at hand, the finding is that if the service charge were dropped, the price of gas, now $1.30 per 1,000 cubic feet, would become $1.45. The revenues of the company are the same whether rates are computed on the one basis or the other. The variance is solely in the distribution of the burden."

And in discussing the objection that the service charge was 'unjust and unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory, regardless of the amount thereof,' the court in Rochester v. Rochester Gas & E. Corp. supra, said: "The statute prohibits a gas corporation from charging, demanding, collecting, or receiving 'from any person or corporation a greater or less compensation for gas . . . or for any service rendered or to be rendered or in connection therewith . . . than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person or corporation for doing a like and contemporaneous service with respect thereto under the same or substantially similar circumstances or conditions.' Public Service Commission Law, § 65, subd. 2. Formal equality there indisputably is. The service charge is imposed not on some only, but on all, and on all at the same rate. Discrimination, if it exists, must inhere in remoter incidents or consequences. We start with the recognition of the truth that perfect equality in operation as well as in form is not to be attained by any scheme of rates. Classification is not forbidden, if founded upon reason, and not upon caprice or favor. There are those who think that a schedule which does not impose a service charge is discriminatory, since it shifts upon some consumers the burden of carrying the others. Occasional hardships there will be with any plan. It is a question largely of degree. The argument against the charge seems to rest upon the assumption that unjust discrimination inheres in every rate that is not a flat or uniform rate for every foot of gas supplied. The scale of charges must not be graduated, it is said, so as to adapt the payment to the cost. But that has never been the rule of rate making for public service corporations. Varying charges are not prohibited always and everywhere, but only varying charges for like services in substantially similar circumstances or conditions. The commuter does not pay the same rate as the occasional traveler. The shipper by carload is not charged as the shipper of a single package. Telephone rates per message are lowered as the number of messages increases. Cf. New York Teleph. Co. v. Siegel-Cooper Co. (1911) 202 N. Y. 502, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 560, 96 N. E. 109. Charges for water vary with the quantity consumed. Silkman v. Water Comrs. (1897) 152 N. Y. 330, 37 L.R.A. 827, 46 N. E. 612. If there was ever doubt that rates for gas are subject to like tests, the doubt has been removed by recent amendments of the statute. 'Nothing in this chapter shall be taken to prohibit a gas corporation or electrical corporation from establishing classifications of service based upon the quantity used, the time when used, the purpose for which used, the duration of use or upon any other reasonable consideration, and providing schedules of just and reasonable graduated rates applicable thereto. No such classification, schedule, rate or charge shall be lawful unless it shall be filed with and approved by the commission, and every such classification, rate or charge shall be subject to change, alteration and modification by the commission. § 65, subd. 5, Public Service Commission Law, as amended by Laws 1921, chap. 134, in effect March 30, 1921. "The commission shall have power to require each gas corporation and electrical corporation to establish classifications of service based upon the quantity used, the time when used, the purpose for which used, the duration of use, and upon any other reasonable consideration, and to establish in connection therewith just and reasonable graduated rates and charges; and it shall have power, either upon complaint or upon its own motion, to require such charges in such classifications, rates and charges as it shall determine to be just and reasonable." Public Service Commission Law, § 66, subd. 14, as amended by Laws 1921, chap. 134. With these provisions in force, we see no escape from the conclusion that a service charge, reasonably computed, and moderate in amount, does not involve per se an illegitimate discrimination between classes of consumers."

In discussing the question whether the service charge constitutes "rent on a gas meter" within the prohibition of the statute, the court in Rochester v. Rochester Gas & E. Corp. (1922) 233 N. Y. 39, 134 N. E. 828, supra, said: "Here the burden of the consumer, so far as affected by the meters, is limited to the cost of installation and repair. The charge is not intended as an equivalent for the value of the use. It is compensation for expenses that must be incurred to put the meters in such a condition that the use may be enjoyed. True it is that the individual must pay his monthly quota though his own meter has been neither changed nor repaired during the month, just as he must pay his quota for the maintenance of service pipes and their accessories though his own may have remained intact. In the long run, however, and on the average, what he pays is counterbalanced by what he receives. If he must contribute to a fund to preserve the distributing agencies for others, they must contribute on their part to preserve like agencies for him. We think it would be a strained and forced construction that would find in the distribution of such expenses among the entire body of consumers the quality of rent. Such license of construction is surely not permissible to extend to doubtful situations the prohibitions of a penal statute. . . . Give the words their uttermost extension, and a gas corporation would be unable to include its meters or the cost of upkeep in reckoning the price of gas, since a substitute for rent might be found in an increase of the price. Such an extension would involve a conflict, if not with constitutional rights, at all events with other statutes which assure a reasonable and fair return. Public Service Commission Law, § 72. . . . We are satisfied that it is not rent, within any fair construction of a penal statute, when profit is excluded."

In Amesbury & S. Gas Co. v. Gibney (1912) 210 Mass. 498, 97 N. E. 88, it was held that the making of a contract to pay rental on gas meters for a season of four months was not inconsistent with a statute providing that "no charge for the use of a meter during any portion of twelve consecutive months shall be made if the consumer, during said time, uses gas to the value of $7."

It was held in State ex rel. Weise v. Sedalia Gaslight Co. (1889) 34 Mo. App. 501, that a gas company had authority, under a city ordinance granting its franchise, and providing that it should furnish "a good article of illuminating gas, at a price per cubic foot not exceeding the rate charged in similarly situated places," to adopt or enforce a rule prescribing the payment of a meter rental.

In Cunningham v. Iola (1911) 86 Kan. 86, 119 Pac. 317, it appeared that the defendant city, which owned and operated a gas works, passed an ordinance providing for a charge of 20 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, and a minimum charge of 50 cents per month whether that amount of gas was used or not. The ordinance further provided for a monthly rental of 20 cents for meters furnished to a landlord for his tenants. The plaintiffs, who up to that time had been paying a flat rate for all gas consumed, contended that the ordinance was void on the ground that it was unreasonable and discriminating. In refusing to enjoin the defendant from the enforcement of the ordinance, the court said: "While no specific statutory authority is cited for the enactment of an ordinance fixing rates, we shall assume, as the plaintiffs apparently have done, that such power exists by implication and under the general power vested in cities of the second class to make contracts and enact ordinances. The council evidently deemed it proper and reasonable to collect 50 cents a month from each patron whether he used gas amounting to that sum during the month or not, on the theory that this minimum charge would pay for reading meters and other services performed by the city in connection with the service, although the amount of gas used in one month might not entitle the city to this sum. . . . The 20-cent rental for meters placed in buildings for the purpose of enabling the landlord to know how much gas each tenant used was doubtless deemed a reasonable compensation for the service and expense on the part of the city. What the exact circumstances were, and what facts may have justified or failed to justify the council in these supposed views, we do not know. No provision appears requiring anyone to purchase or procure meters from the city, the provision merely being that those used must be approved by the city inspector, and if, instead of purchasing seventeen meters for their tenants, the plaintiffs saw fit to rent them of the city, we see no reason why the required rental should not be paid."

T. HENRY KLEIN et al., Appfs.

Illinois Supreme Court — December 22, 1921.

(301 Ill. 94, 133 N. E. 660.)

Covenant — against erection of outbuildings — greenhouses as breach.

Greenhouses, although connected with the dwelling house, are outbuildings within the meaning of a covenant forbidding the erection of such buildings on a specified portion of granted premises.

[See note on this question beginning on page 234.]

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Superior Court for Cook County (Sullivan, J.) in favor of complainant in a suit brought to restrain defendants from interfering with plaintiff's use of an easement for ingress and egress over a certain strip of land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Edward J. Kelley for appellants.
Messrs. Anderson & Anderson for appellee.

Dunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case is as to the existence of an easement for ingress and egress over a 12-foot strip of ground for the benefit of adjoining property. A bill in chancery was filed by the appellee to enjoin the defendants from interfering with the enjoyment of the easement, and after a hearing the court entered a decree granting the relief prayed for, from which the defendants appealed.

On March 18, 1869, Samuel B. Chase, through whom all the parties claim, made a deed conveying to Charles H. Cram the west 187 feet of lot 28 in Pine Grove, section 21, township 40, range 14, "together with the right to said Cram, his heirs and assigns forever, to use for the purpose of ingress and egress to said premises and to the south half of the west 187 feet of lot 27 in Pine Grove, and for no other purpose whatever, the 12 feet in width next east of and adjoining said west 187 feet of lot 28 and the south half of lot 27. Said Cram, for himself, his heirs, and assigns, hereby covenanting and accepting this conveyance, subject to the condition that neither he, they, nor any of them shall place or allow to be placed within 115 feet of the south line of the east 60 feet in width, east and west, of said portion hereby conveyed of said lot 28, any shed, barn, or other outhouse or outbuilding, and that a violation of this condition shall have these effects: First, to subject the owner of that part of said described premises whereon such shed, barn, outhouse, or outbuilding shall be placed to the payment of $10 for each and every day the same shall be allowed to remain in violation of this agreement, the same to be paid to the owner of the land (at such time owning the same) lying next east of and adjoining said strip of land 12 feet wide; and, second, that the uses of said alley right shall, upon the violation of this agreement, forever cease as to the owner or owners so violating this agreement and all persons who may afterwards own or have any interest in that part of said premises owned by him, her, or them, the right to use said private alley, as aforesaid, to run with said above-conveyed land as appurtenant thereof."

On August 1, 1870, Chase conveyed the 112 feet immediately east of the west 187 feet which had been conveyed to Cram to William M. Blackburn, reserving "a right of way over the west 12 feet in width in lot 28 hereby conveyed, and also reserving and making this conveyance subject to such right of way and of use over 12 feet in width as was granted to C. H. Cram." On August 10, 1889, Blackburn conveyed the property so conveyed to him to Henry P. Klein, subject to such rights of the use for purposes of ingress and egress of the west 12 feet in width of the premises described as were reserved or granted by Chase to Cram. At the time of this latter conveyance William H. Chadwick had acquired title to the Cram property. In 1891 or 1893 he erected an apartment building and a dwelling house on this property, the dwelling house being east of the apartment house. He also erected on the east side of his dwelling four greenhouses, which covered substantially that part of the premises east of the house, leaving only a narrow passageway of about 3 feet east of the greenhouses. There were four of the greenhouses, two extending east and west, which were connected by two extending north and south. They were attached to the house, and there was an entrance to them from the house, and also from the outside. The house was built of brick with a stone front, and the greenhouses were built with wooden walls about 3 feet high. The roofs were of glass. The front of the most southerly of the greenhouses was about 25 feet from the front of the lot.

When Chadwick built his house and greenhouses he also built a fence on the east line of the west 187 feet of the lot, extending all the way through from the street the full length of the lot. When Klein took possession of his premises he built a barn on the northwest corner. He had some disagreement with Chadwick and Schoeninger, who owned the property north of Klein's, in regard to the use of the alley and the location of this barn which Klein started to build, covering the west 12 feet of his premises. It was actually constructed with the west side of the barn 12 feet east of the west line of Klein's property, leaving the 12 feet clear. There was at one time a 12-foot gate extending from the northwest corner of the barn to the west side of the lot. There is a dispute in the evidence as to whether the gate was kept closed and locked or not. As long as Chadwick continued to live on the premises he made no attempt to make use of the right of way, except that coal was sometimes delivered at the back part of Chadwick's lot by teams coming from the north through an alley which was there, and backing down over the north few feet of the 12-foot strip, where the coal was unloaded on Chadwick's premises and the teams returned as they had come in. Chadwick was adjudicated a bankrupt, the property was conveyed to his trustee in bankruptcy, and on April 10, 1912, by mesne conveyances, the title to the east 37 feet of the south 143 feet of the tract became vested in the complainant.

The appellants insist that the chancellor erred in finding that the appellee and all of his grantors had always observed the covenants and conditions contained in the deed from Chase to Cram; in not finding that the erection of the greenhouses was a breach of the condition against placing within 15 feet of the south line of the east 60 feet of the premises any shed, barn, or other outhouse or outbuilding, and terminated the easement of a right of way over the west 12 feet of the appellants' property; and in not finding that the complainant was barred from maintaining his bill by twenty years' adverse possession of the defendants.

The property in controversy is situated on the north side of Belmont avenue. The property conveyed to Cram was bounded on the west by Evanston avenue, which is now known as Broadway. Further north was Melrose avenue, which bounded the block on the north. From Melrose avenue an alley extended south through the middle of the block to the northwest corner of the Klein property and then at right angles east. This alley would have formed, with the 12-foot strip in controversy, if the latter had been open, an alley through the block from Melrose avenue to Belmont avenue. When Klein took possession of the property he put the 12-foot strip in controversy in grass; a flower bed extended along the fence; an arch was erected, the west side of which rested on the west 9 feet of the 12-foot strip; and the driveway which entered through the arch occupied only the east 3 feet of the extreme south end of the 12-foot strip, going off then to the northeast to Klein's barn. As has been said, neither Chadwick nor his successors ever attempted to make any use of the right of way, so far as appears, except in respect to the hauling in of coal, which has been mentioned, until the complainant acquired title. Soon afterward he filed a bill to enforce the easement, which for some reason was permitted to be dismissed for want of prosecution in 1915, and this bill was afterward filed and brought to a hearing in 1920.

There was some evidence of teams going through from Melrose avenue to Belmont avenue, coming down the alley in the north half of the block, and going through the 12-foot strip west of Klein's barn, then turning to the left and using Klein's driveway down to Belmont avenue. But for the greater part of the way this was not a use of the 12-foot strip, and it was not a use of the easement, because the teams thus going through from Melrose avenue to Belmont avenue were not connected in any way with the easement. We do not regard it as necessary, however, to discuss the evidence in regard to the abandonment of the easement or its loss by adverse possession. The deed by which the easement was created contained a plain provision that the permitting of any shed, barn, or other outhouse or outbuilding on the south 115 feet of the east 60 feet of the premises should terminate the easement.

against erection of outbuildings
—greenhouses
as breach.

If the greenhouses were outbuildings the easement was terminated by their erection, and it is our judgment that they were outbuildings.

Outhouses are defined by Bouvier as: "Buildings adjoining or belonging to dwelling houses; buildings subservient to yet distinct from the principal mansion house, located either within or without the curtilage."

The definition as given by the Standard Dictionary is: "A smaller building standing apart from, but appertaining to, a main or larger building or dwelling."

And an outbuilding is "a smaller building appurtenant to a main building and generally separate from it."

Webster's New International Dictionary has these definitions:

Outhouse: "A small house or building at a little distance from the main house; an outbuilding."

Outbuilding: "A building separate from and subordinate to the main house; an outhouse."

The Century Dictionary defines an outhouse as a "small house or building separate from the main house; an outbuilding, specifically in law, under the definition of arson, a building contributory to habitation separate from the main structure, and so by the common-law rules a parcel of the dwelling house or not, according as it is within or without the curtilage."

At common law the curtilage was the land, with the castle and out-houses, inclosed often with high walls, where the old barons sometimes held court in the open air, from which comes the word "court-yard." Coddington v. Beebe, 31 N. J. L. 485. The term is descriptive of the common arrangement of dwellings, and the yards surrounding them, in England, but is not applicable to the common description of inclosures and buildings constituting the homestead of the inhabitants of this country. In England dwellings and outhouses of all kinds are usually surrounded by a fence or stone wall inclosing a small piece of land embracing the yards and outbuildings near the house, constituting what is called the court. Such precautionary arrangements have not been necessary in this country. People v. Taylor, 2 Mich. 251.

The question of curtilage is of no importance in this case. It was important at common law because the protection and privilege of the mansion house extended to all its branches and appurtenances within the curtilage, and if a barn, stable, or warehouse were parcel of the mansion house, and within the same common fence, though not under the same roof or contiguous, a burglary might be committed therein; otherwise not. 4 Bl. Com. 225. An outbuilding must be appurtenant and appertain to the main building. Though distinct from the main building, it must be subservient to it, and contributory to the habitation. It must belong to or be intended to be used with the dwelling house. The principal argument of the appellee on the question whether the greenhouses were outbuildings is that they were erected at the same time with the house, and were attached to it, and could be entered from the house as well as from the outside. This does not affect the question. From the definitions which have been given, it will be seen that an outbuilding is usually separate from the main building, but this does not necessarily imply removal to such a distance as to not be adjacent or abutting and in tangible connection. An outbuilding may be built a few feet, or a few inches only, from the main house. It may be connected with the house by a covered passage. If for convenience the covered passage is eliminated, and the outbuilding moved or originally constructed immediately against the main building, it would not therefore cease to be an outbuilding. If the outbuilding is separated from the main house only by the space of a common wall, this does not necessarily change its character as an outbuilding. It is the character of the building and the use which is made of it which determine whether or not it is an outbuilding. Though it is adjacent to the house, and may be entered from the house through a passageway, or through a door directly, it is still an outhouse if its use is not for the ordinary purpose of a dwelling, but for some subsidiary purpose in connection with the dwelling. A washhouse, a woodshed, a granary, a barn, may all be connected with the house so that a person can pass from the house to one or all of the outhouses mentioned without going from under the roof, and yet they do not for that reason lose their character of outhouses. A greenhouse is a building covered chiefly with glass, usually provided with artificial heat for the protection and growth of exotic and other tender plants. In this case it appears that Chadwick did not engage in the raising of flowers as a business, but that his building of the greenhouses was merely for pleasure, and he took delight in the raising of orchids and the giving of flowers to his neighbors and friends. The greenhouses were thus subservient to his use of the main house as a dwelling, but they were entirely independent of the house. They could be removed without interfering with the rest of the building, and, in fact, they have been removed. If they had been built at a distance of several yards from the house they would undoubtedly have been outbuildings, and the fact that one wall of the house was used for a wall of the greenhouses did not change the character of the structures from outbuildings so as to make them a part of the dwelling house. In our judgment, the construction of the greenhouses was a violation of the condition in the deed from Chase to Cram, which terminated the easement, and the action of the parties is consistent with their assent to the same view.

The defendants are not entitled to any relief on their cross bill, for it does not appear that any trespass on their premises is threatened.

The decree will be reversed and the cause will be remanded, with directions to the Superior Court to dismiss the bill and the cross bill.

considered by the courts for the most part in criminal proceedings. It has become important in prosecutions for arson and burglary to observe and define the lines of distinction between three classes of buildings; to wit, dwelling houses proper, buildings used in connection therewith and known as outhouses, and buildings which are neither dwelling houses nor used in connection therewith. The term has also been frequently construed by reason of its use in a restrictive covenant. The distinguishing feature of an outhouse has been found in its subserviency to the mansion house, or principal building. "This test serves to mark the distinction between outhouses and other buildings, not including the manor house, which do not possess the peculiar quality assigned to outhouses. It does not, however, assist in distinguishing between the dwelling house and outhouses appurtenant thereto." Bassett v. Pepe (1920) 94 Conn. 631, 110 Atl. 56.

The term "outhouse" has been variously defined. Thus it has been said that an outhouse is a building that belongs to a dwelling house, and is in some respects a parcel of the dwelling house and situated within the curtilage. Such was the meaning of the term at common law, and under the English statutes in relation to the burning of houses. State v. Roper (1883) 88 N. C. 656; State v. Rowland Lumber Co. (1910) 153 N. C. 610, 69 S. E. 58; Elsmore v. St. Briavells (1828) 8 Barn. & C. 461, 108 Eng. Reprint, 1114, 6 L. J. K. B. 372, 2 Moody & R. 514; Rex v. Haughton (1833) 5 Car. & P. (Eng.) 555.

Another definition is that it is a building appurtenant to some main building or mansion house. Firth v. Marovich (1911) 160 Cal. 257, 116 Pac. 729, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1190; State v. Bailey (1834) 10 Conn. 143; Blakemore v. Stanley (1893) 159 Mass. 6, 33 N. E. 689. So it has been said that an outhouse means something annexed to an in-house. Reg. v. Hammond (1844) 1 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 60.

But a building is not an "outhouse" if it is used for a dwelling or for business purposes. Downey v. State (1896) 115 Ala. 108, 22 So. 479.

It has been held, however, that it is not necessary that a building should be within the curtilage in order to be an outhouse. Shotwell v. State (1884) 43 Ark. 345. So, it has been said that an outhouse is a building without the mansion house, intended for the accommodation of the owner or occupant; that it is the subserviency of it to the mansion house that gives it the denomination of an "outhouse," and not the fact that it is included within the same fence, or within what is denominated the curtilage or homestead. State v. Brooks (1823) 4 Conn. 446.

Again, it has been said that the term "outhouse" denotes a building contributory to the habitation, separate from the main structure, either within or without the curtilage. State v. Randall (1904) 36 Wash. 438, 78 Pac. 998.

As used in a statute relating to burglary, the term "outhouse" has been said to denote a part of the dwelling house or mansion, if it is so near the dwelling house that it is used with it as appurtenant thereto, though not within the same inclosure, and hence it is defined to be a small house or building belonging to a mansion or dwelling house, and usually standing separate from or without it, and a small distance from it. Wheelock v. State (1855) 15 Tex. 253.

Under a statute making guilty of burglary every person who shall unlawfully break and enter any dwelling house, or outhouse thereunto adjoining and occupied therewith, it has been held that the term "outhouse thereunto adjoining and occupied therewith" was used in its usual and ordinary sense, and meant that any outhouse, to be a subject of burglary, must both adjoin the dwelling house and be occupied therewith, and that other outhouses, even though within the inclosure, were not subject to burglary unless they were specifically named by the statute or fell within the meaning of buildings named therein. State v. Randall (Wash.) supra.

It has been said that an outbuilding is one that from its character is to be used in connection with the main building, and may thus be held to be a parcel thereof, even if not immediately attached thereto, as the barns, sheds, wood and store houses belonging to a dwelling house. Com. v. Certain Intoxicating Liquors (1885) 140 Mass. 287, 3 N. E. 4, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 627.

II. Particular structures.

a. Barn.

It has been held that a barn not connected with the mansion house or any other building, but several rods away, and used for the purpose of keeping hay, grain, and cattle, was an "outhouse" within the meaning of a statute against breaking and entering "the . . . outhouse of another, whether parcel of any mansion house or not." State v. Brooks (1823) 4 Conn. 446.

A tobacco barn situated in a 10-acre field in which there was no other structure, and from 90 to 200 yards from the owner's dwelling house, and built for the purpose of storing tobacco, has been held not to be an "outhouse" within a statute penalizing the breaking and entering of "any outhouse belonging to or used with any dwelling house." White v. Com. (1888) 87 Ky. 454, 9 S. W. 303.

A deed conveying the north half of a certain dwelling house, "together with the land under the same, and the land used with it and belonging thereto, and all outbuildings and fences thereon and thereto belonging, being the same premises heretofore occupied by me as a dwelling house," has been held to convey a barn used with and belonging to the house as one of the outbuildings. Woodman v. Smith (1865) 53 Me. 79.

Barn as "Outbuilding to which people resort," see infra, III.

b. Brickkiln.

In Rex v. Haughton (1833) 5 Car. & P. (Eng.) 555, it appeared that a building had been built for an oven to bake bricks, but was afterwards roofed and a door attached. In this place the prosecutor kept a cow. Adjoining it, but not under the same roof, was a lean-to, in which another person kept a horse. Neither the prosecutor, nor the person of whom he rented this building, had any house or farmyard near it, nor did any wall connect it with any dwelling house, the nearest dwelling being 100 yards off, and not belonging to either the prosecutor or his landlord. It was held that the building was not an outhouse, and that a person who set it on fire was not indictable for arson.

c. Building on adjoining lot.

A search warrant authorizing a search of "a certain building, the cellar under the same, and the outbuildings within the curtilage thereof," has been held not to authorize the search of a building situated on an adjoining lot, and separate from the other building by a fence, and with distinct modes of access and use, although connected by a passageway. Com. v. Certain Intoxicating Liquors (1885) 140 Mass. 287, 3 N. E. 4, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 627.

d. Chicken house.

A chicken house on the same lot with a dwelling house, and about 60 yards therefrom, owned by the same person, there being between it and the house a garden inclosed by a wire fence through which there was a passway, has been held to be an "outhouse" within the meaning of the statute relating to breaking and entering. Price v. Com. (1894) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 837, 25 S. W. 1062, wherein the court said: "The evidence shows a chicken house was broken and four chickens carried away by appellant. But it is contended that the chicken house in question is not, in the meaning of the statute, an outhouse, and consequently he was not guilty of the offense for which he was indicted. The chicken house broken into is on the same lot as the dwelling house, both being owned and in possession of the same person. It adjoins the stable of the same person, and is about 60 yards from the dwelling house, there being between them a garden inclosed by a wire fence, and through which there is a passway from one to the other. As is manifest from the language of the statute, an outhouse is not to be understood as being part of the dwelling house; but it must be a house belonging to, or used with, the dwelling house, or, in language used in Bishop on Statutory Crimes, ‘contributory to habitation.’ It seems to us the statute itself plainly enough shows that a chicken house, like a meat house or ice house, was intended to be regarded and treated as an outhouse, to break which, and take away anything of value, is made a felony; for unquestionably it does, in meaning of the statute, belong to, and is used with, a dwelling house.”

e. Dugout.

See infra, III.

f. Freight car used as warehouse.

In Carter v. State (1898) 106 Ga. 372, 32 S. E. 345, 71 Am. St. Rep. 262, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 125, the defendant was indicted for the wilful and malicious burning of “a certain freight warehouse, . . . the same being then and there an outhouse.” The evidence showed that the body of a freight car had been taken off the wheels and placed near the railroad track at a station; that it was supported on permanent posts; and that a platform, to be used in transferring freight to and from the car body, had been attached to the same. It further appeared that the structure thus located was used as “a freight warehouse” by the railway company in precisely the same manner as if it had been an ordinary warehouse built for this identical purpose. There was no evidence showing that the railroad company had any other building at this station; and counsel for the accused thereupon insisted that the house in question could not, in legal contemplation, be an “outhouse,” and accordingly that there was a fatal variance between the allegations of the indictment and the proof. The court said: “It is true that the word ‘outhouse’ primarily means a building adjacent to a dwelling house and subservient thereto, but distinct from the mansion itself. . . . After careful consideration, however, we have reached the conclusion that the word ‘outhouse,’ as used in §§ 136, 141, and 142 of our Penal Code, as applied to a structure not located within a city, town, or village, is intended to embrace a house of any description which is not a dwelling house. . . . That all houses other than dwelling houses, thus located, were intended to be regarded as ‘outhouses,’ seems manifest from the provisions of § 142 of the Penal Code, which declares that ‘setting fire to an outhouse of another, as described in the preceding section, shall be punished,’ etc.; for, unless this meaning be given to the word ‘outhouse’ as used in § 142, we would have no penalty whatever for the offense of setting fire to a house of the kind described in the present indictment. The truth is, the prefix ‘out’ was totally unnecessary in this connection, except for the exclusive purpose of distinguishing dwelling houses from other houses; but the use thereof should not, we think, be given the effect of defeating the legislative will, which clearly was to include buildings other than those which would ordinarily be understood as falling within the class designated by the word ‘outhouse.’ ”

g. Garage.

A garage affixed to a residence, i. e., constructed as a part of the building, has been held not to be an outhouse or outbuilding. Peirce v. Beyer (1919) 66 Colo. 554, 185 Pac. 348; Bassett v. Pepe (1920) 94 Conn. 631, 110 Atl. 56. In the case first cited, the court said: “The parties to this action were owners of adjoining lots, holding under deeds containing the restriction that ‘all stables and outbuildings shall be placed at the rear of the lots.’ Plaintiff in error was proceeding to erect a one-story brick garage at the rear of his house, using a portion of the rear wall thereof as a part of one of the walls of the garage. The garage extended to within a few inches of the lot line between the lots of the parties, and within 3 feet and 8 inches of the sleeping porch of defendant in error. The latter secured a permanent injunction against the erection of said garage; the district court holding that it was an outbuilding within the meaning of said restrictive clause. It was shown in evidence that the construction of garages as part of residence buildings is not uncommon, and that this garage was to be architecturally in harmony with the house of which it was made a part. We cannot agree with the district court that such a construction is an outhouse within the meaning of said restriction. No objection is made to the use to which the room is to be put, and we see no more reason for calling it an outhouse than for so designating it if it were to be used as a kitchen or bedroom."

It appeared in Bassett v. Pepe (Conn.) supra, that the defendant's deed contained a restrictive covenant forbidding "the erection or maintenance of any building or structure within 3 feet of the side lines, or the erection or maintenance of any barn or outhouse on the land conveyed." When the defendant purchased his lot there was a house on it, but no garage or other accommodations for housing an automobile. To provide such accommodations he began the erection of an annex to the house, designed for that purpose, and planned to be permanently attached to the rear of the house and form a part of it. The attachment was to be about 10 feet in length on one side of the house and 8 feet on another. At all points the new construction was to be located more than 3 feet distant from the division line between the parties. The work of construction had proceeded but a little way when a temporary injunction was issued in the case at bar to prevent the completion of the building. The structure planned and begun was to be built in a substantial manner, and would not have been unsightly in form or appearance. The trial court held that the proposed structure was neither a barn nor an outhouse, in the strict sense of those words, that it was not within their meaning and intent as used in the restrictive covenant in question, and that its erection and maintenance would not be in violation of either the letter or spirit of that covenant. On appeal the decision of the trial judge was affirmed, the court saying: "The term 'outhouse' naturally implies that the structure under consideration is not one with a dwelling house. Clearly it must be something distinguishable and distinct from the dwelling house to which it is subservient. Otherwise it were ill named. Upon the question as to what the requirement as to distinction and separation imports and what it signifies, adjudicated cases, in so far as we have been able to discover, throw little light. . . . Looking at the conditions attending and surrounding the Laurel beach properties, the character of their use, and the language of the restriction itself, its purpose is manifest. Its aim, beyond question, as the court has in effect found it to have been, was to contribute to make the restricted property desirable as a location for a summer residence colony by forbidding erections thereon which might detract from its attractiveness or be deemed otherwise objectionable. Small structures scattered over the tract might well be regarded objectionable from an esthetic point of view, and structures devoted to certain uses might be offensive for more substantial reasons. At the time that the restriction was framed and imposed the classes of structures which might most reasonably be anticipated under the conditions then existing were barns where horses could be stabled, and privies, both objectionable for similar substantial reasons, and naturally expected to be erected, if erected at all, quite apart from the dwellings. Such other structures as might have been anticipated would neither in themselves nor in their use have been of a kind to be objectionable otherwise than esthetically. This would be true of the more modern garage, and it is scarcely conceivable that a garage appurtenant to a house, so constructed as not to give the effect of a separate building, and so attached to the house as to present the appearance of a part of it, could be considered objectionable from that point of view. This garage, as we read the record, was so built onto the house that no one, not critically examining it, would be struck with the fact that it was not a part of the dwelling-house structure, and used for the immediate purposes of residence and housekeeping therein. Its points of contact with the house were, to be sure, not extensive, and the critical observer might conclude that there were no interior means of communication between it and the house, but for all that it might well, as far as structure and location are concerned, be adapted for summer housekeeping purposes. Whether or not, therefore, an outhouse is of necessity a structure separate and standing physically apart from the dwelling house to which it is subservient, we are of the opinion that the present structure is not one forbidden by either the letter or spirit of the restrictive covenant in controversy, interpreted according to the manifest intent and purpose of those who imposed it.”

It was said in the case last cited, however, that if the garage as constructed was to be considered as a structure apart from the dwelling house, there could be no doubt that, as a structure subservient to the use of the defendant's dwelling, it would fully meet the conditions entitling it to be considered as an outhouse. This statement is in accord with the conclusion reached in Ringgold v. Denhardt (1920) 136 Md. 136, 110 Atl. 321, wherein a restriction “that no other building is to be made, erected, placed, or put upon or on the aforesaid lot other than that now erected, this condition to include and embrace all stables, chicken or pigeon coops, pigsties, privies, or any outbuildings of whatsoever description,” was held to prohibit the construction of a garage. The court said: “As the garage about to be erected was not a dwelling house, there would seem to be no doubt about it being embraced in the first restriction. No building other than that now erected would have been sufficient, but it says what the condition is to include and embrace; namely, ‘all stables, chicken or pigeon coops, pigsties, privies, or any outbuildings of whatsoever description.’ It would be difficult to use more comprehensive language for the purpose of prohibiting the erection of any building not then on the lot. A garage is a building ‘other than that now erected,’ and it is an outbuilding of some description.”

h. Greenhouse.

The reported case (HULTIN v. KLEIN, ante, 230) holds that greenhouses are outbuildings within the restriction of a deed providing that the permitting of any shed, barn, or other outhouse or outbuilding shall terminate an easement for ingress and egress over a strip of ground for the benefit of adjoining property.

i. Ice or meat house.

See dictum in Price v. Com. (1894) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 837, 25 S. W. 1062, set out supra, II. d.

j. Pigsty.

In Reg. v. Janes (1844) 1 Car. & K. (Eng.) 303, 2 Moody, C. C. 308, the defendant was indicted for setting fire to an outhouse. The building set on fire was a pigsty, situate in a yard in the possession of the prosecutor, into which yard the back door of the prosecutor's house opened, the yard being bounded by fences, and by other buildings of the prosecutor, and by a cottage and barn which were let by the prosecutor to a tenant, but which did not open into this yard. The pigsty was held to be an outhouse within the statute against arson.

k. Residence violative of restriction as to cost and value.

It appeared in Firth v. Marovich (1911) 160 Cal. 257, 116 Pac. 729, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1190, that the plaintiff conveyed a residential lot by a deed containing the following provisions: “This conveyance is made and said real property is sold subject to the following conditions: That no building whatever except a private residence with the customary outbuildings, including a private stable, shall be erected, placed, or permitted on said premises or any part thereof, and that such building shall be used as a private residence only, and shall cost, and be reasonably worth, not less than fifteen hundred ($1,500) dollars, and shall be located not less than twenty (20) feet from the front or street line of said lot, namely, on Vernon avenue; and it is further agreed that no barn or shed or other building shall be built or located closer than ninety (90) feet from the front or street line of said lot." It also appeared that shortly after the defendant went into possession of the property she erected, without the plaintiff's consent, a building the cost of which did not exceed $800. There was testimony that the building complained of (which was admitted to be over 100 feet back from the street line) was a one-story structure, covering a space of 24 by 26 feet, and built of rough boards, battened. It was partitioned into rooms, and contained a kitchen with a sink and other conveniences. It was furnished and occupied as a residence, and had been so occupied from the time it was built until shortly before the trial,—a period of about two years. In this state of the evidence the defendants moved for a nonsuit on the ground that there had been no violation of the restriction in the deed, which was granted. On appeal a new trial was ordered, it being held that the structure was not an outbuilding. The court said: "The meaning and intent of the restrictive clause is plain. The purchaser is required, if he desires to put improvements upon the lot, to erect a residence, which shall cost and be worth not less than $1,500. Such residence may be accompanied by the 'customary outbuildings, including a private stable.' There is no provision governing the cost of such outbuildings. The residence is to be not less than 20 feet from the street line. The provision that 'such building shall be used as a private residence only,' of course, refers to the main building, not to the stable or other outhouses. So far there is no room for doubt. The respondents point, however, to this clause, 'And it is further agreed that no barn or shed or other building shall be built or located closer than ninety (90) feet from the front or street line of said lot,' and argue that it permits the erection, at a distance of 90 feet or more from the street line, of any building, whatever its cost, and for whatever use. This is an entirely inadmissible construction of the language. In view of the earlier provisions that no building except a residence with outbuildings should be erected on the premises or any part thereof, the words 'or other building' plainly have reference to the outbuildings permitted at the outset of the paragraph. This meaning is rendered more evident by the fact that this phrase is used in connection with and following the words 'barn or shed.' The effect of this final provision, reading it as a part of the entire restrictive clause, is to require outbuildings to be set back 90 feet from the street line, while the main residence building may be built at a distance of only 20 feet from the street. The word 'outbuilding' or 'outhouse' has been defined as 'a building adjoining or belonging to a dwelling house' (Bouvier's Law Dict.). 'It is the subserviency of it to the mansion house that gives it the denomination of an outhouse.' State v. Brooks (1823) 4 Conn. 446. An outbuilding is 'something which is to be used in connection with a main building.' Blakemore v. Stanley (1893) 159 Mass. 6, 33 N. E. 689. The structure erected by Mrs. Marovich was not an outbuilding. It was not an adjunct to any main building. So far as the evidence and the admissions of the pleadings show, it was built for no other purpose and put to no other use than that of a dwelling. Viewed as a residence, it did not comply with the requirements of the deed as to cost and value."

l. Sample room.

A house contiguous to and used in connection with a hotel as a sample room, and used and controlled by the owner of the hotel, has been held to be an outhouse. Shotwell v. State (1884) 43 Ark. 345.

m. Schoolhouse.

In an early Connecticut case, State v. Bailey (1834) 10 Conn. 143, over-ruling State v. O'Brien (1797) 2 Root (Conn.) 516, it was held that a schoolhouse was not an outhouse. It appeared that the building described in the information was occupied, at the time specified, as a schoolhouse, for the purpose of teaching a district school therein; that at evening the schoolhouse was locked up; that there were deposited therein the books used by the scholars; and that the prisoner, in the night season, broke and entered the schoolhouse, with an intent to steal. The court said: “The prisoner was charged, by the information, with breaking and entering an outhouse, wherein were deposited goods, wares, and merchandise, in the night season, with an intent to steal, under the 30th section of the ‘act concerning crimes and punishments.’ On trial he was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison, where he now is. The outhouse mentioned and described in the information was a district schoolhouse, containing books and other articles commonly used in district schools. In the case of State v. O'Brien (Conn.) supra, it is said that a schoolhouse may come under the denomination of a dwelling house or outhouse; and it was in that case adjudged that the felonious burning of such a building was arson. The doctrine of that case cannot be approved without an entire disregard of an established principle of the law that penal laws are to be construed strictly. Subsequently, at the revision of the statute, and when the law punishing arson was re-enacted, schoolhouses were included in the enumeration of buildings in addition to outhouses,—a circumstance very clearly implying that the legislature did not consider a schoolhouse to be an outhouse, notwithstanding O'Brien's Case. An outhouse is a building appurtenant to some main building or mansion house; and whether it be parcel of it or not depends upon its particular location, or its connection with such mansion house. It is plain that a schoolhouse is not of this description, and therefore is not an outhouse, in legal signification.”

20 A.L.R.—16.

The Maryland court, however, reached the conclusion in Jones v. Hungerford (1832) 4 Gill & J. (Md.) 402, that a schoolhouse which was not a parcel of a dwelling house was embraced within the terms “any other outhouse, not parcel of any dwelling house,” as used in a statute relating to arson.

So, in Rex v. Winter (1815) Russ. & R. C. C. (Eng.) 295, it was held that a schoolroom separated from a dwelling house by a narrow passage about a yard wide, with the tile roof of the house reaching over part of the schoolroom within the same inclosure, was an “outhouse” within the law making it a felony to set fire to any “house, barn, or outhouse.”

n. Shed.

An open shed in a farm yard, constructed of upright posts supporting pieces of wood laid across them and covered with straw as a roof, has been held to be an “outhouse” within the statute against arson. Rex v. Stallion (1834) 1 Moody, C. C. (Eng.) 398. But an open building in a field, at a distance from and out of sight of the owner's house, though boarded and covered in, has been held not to be an outhouse within the same statute. Rex v. Ellison (1832) 1 Moody, C. C. (Eng.) 336. Likewise, it has been held that a cart hovel, consisting of a stubble roof supported by uprights, in a field at a distance from other buildings, is not an outhouse within the statute. Rex v. Parrot (1834) 6 Car. & P. (Eng.) 402.

o. Smokehouse.

It has been held that a smokehouse is not necessarily an “outhouse belonging to or used with a dwelling house,” within a burglary statute. Dunn v. Com. (1905) 119 Ky. 457, 84 S. W. 321, wherein the court said: “It will be observed that the charge in the indictment is that the defendant feloniously broke and entered the smokehouse of J. N. Chambers, and that the statute punishes the breaking of any dwelling house or any outhouse belonging to or used with any dwelling house. It is not charged in the indictment that the house broken belonged to or was used with any dwelling house. It is said that a smokehouse is used with a dwelling house, and therefore the charge that the defendant broke the smokehouse is sufficient. But the court cannot so declare as a matter of law. A smokehouse is not necessarily an outhouse belonging to or used with a dwelling house. True, it usually is used with a dwelling house, but is not always so. The smokehouse may be at one place and the dwelling house at another. The owner, as where his dwelling house is burned, or where he has moved to another, may still retain the smokehouse at the old site. The charge in the indictment that it was a smokehouse which was broken is not, therefore, equivalent to the words of the statute punishing the breaking of 'any outhouse belonging to or used with any dwelling house.' The indictment is therefore insufficient, and the court should have sustained the demurrer to it."

p. Spring house.

A "spring house" has been held to be embraced within the term "outhouse." Willoughby v. Shipman (1859) 28 Mo. 50.

q. Stable.

A stable has been held not to be an outhouse within the meaning of a statute providing that "if any tenant shall, during his term or after its expiration, wilfully and unlawfully demolish, destroy, injure, or damage any tenement house, uninhabited house, or other outhouse belonging to his landlord or upon his premises, . . . he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." State v. Rowland Lumber Co. (1910) 153 N. C. 610, 69 S. E. 58.

In Reg. v. Hammond (1844) 1 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 60, it was held that a stable not connected with a dwelling house was not an outhouse, the court saying: "An outhouse means something annexed to an in-house."

So, where a building restriction in a deed provided that no building should be erected other than dwellings, with necessary outbuildings, said dwellings to cost not less than $2,000 each, and all of said buildings to be not less than 20 feet from the street line, it was held that a stable could not be erected on the lot before there was a dwelling thereon. Blake-more v. Stanley (1893) 159 Mass. 6, 33 N. E. 689.

See also Rex v. Haughton (1833) 5 Car. & P. (Eng.) 555, set out supra, II. b.

r. Stillhouse.

A stillhouse, or distillery, has been held to be an outhouse under an act to prevent gaming in "any house used as a place of gaming, or in any barn, kitchen, stable, or other outhouse," the court saying: "There is nothing in the act to limit their meaning to the outhouses appurtenant to the mansion house. The policy of the law should lead us to extend it to outhouses of every description. For its professed object is 'to prevent the pernicious practice of gaming.' With that view it is made to embrace highways, open fields, and race paths, kitchens, barns, stables, and every other outhouse. It would have been difficult to have made use of words more comprehensive. Both the latter and the spirit of the act, therefore, seem to lead to the same construction. If gaming has a tendency to lead to quarrels and controversies, and to the corruption of morals, etc., when carried on in an open field, that tendency cannot be much lessened by carrying it on at a stillhouse. And although penal laws are not to be extended by construction, yet the policy of the law is to be regarded. In this case, however, the court can discover no inconsistency between the letter and policy of the law." State v. Faulkener (1823) 13 S. C. L. (2 M'Cord) 438.

s. Storehouse.

In State v. Roper (1883) 88 N. C. 656, an old building located at a cross-road, and not inclosed or used in any way as a dwelling house, but which was occupied at the time of the burning as a storehouse, was held not to be an "outhouse," as that term was used in a statute making it a misdemeanor unlawfully and wilfully to burn any church, uninhabited house, outhouse, or other house or building.

Storehouse as “Outhouse where people resort,” see infra, III.

t. Unfinished dwelling house.

A building intended for and constructed as a dwelling house, but which was not completed or inhabited, and in which the owner had deposited straw and agricultural implements, has been held not to be an outhouse within the meaning of a statute entitling the owner to maintain an action against the hundred for an injury sustained by him in consequence of maliciously setting fire to an outhouse. Elsmore v. St. Briavells (1828) 8 Barn. & C. 461, 108 Eng. Reprint, 1114, 6 L. J. K. B. 372, 2 Mann & R. 514.

u. Unoccupied house.

See infra, III.

III. “Outhouse where people resort.”

The phrase “outhouse where people resort” in laws to suppress gaming has been held to be used in the ordinary and popular acceptance of the term as meaning any house standing out and apart from houses occupied and used as dwelling or business houses, and therefore as including all unoccupied houses “where people resort” for gaming and other purposes. Pickens v. State (1893) 100 Ala. 127, 14 So. 672; Wheelock v. State (1855) 15 Tex. 260. Therefore such a statute does not apply to an unoccupied dwelling house. Pickens v. State (Ala.) supra.

It seems that an outhouse to which people may and do resort at pleasure, for the purpose of gaming, though it may be only occasionally, comes within the statutory provision. Downey v. State (1890) 90 Ala. 644, 8 So. 869.

Under a statute prohibiting card playing in any “outhouse where people resort,” it has been held that the fact that the house where the playing took place was detached from the others, and inclosed by a fence, did not show that it was not such as the statute alleged; that to make it an “outhouse,” within the contemplation of the legislature, it was not necessary that it should be in the same inclosure with a mansion house, or other building in which persons resided. Cameron v. State (1849) 15 Ala. 383.

So it has been held that a vacant storehouse which was commonly kept locked, and which was one of a continuous line of buildings fronting on the street, was within the meaning of the statute. Swallow v. State (1852) 20 Ala. 30; Downey v. State (1895) 110 Ala. 99, 20 So. 439; Downey v. State (1896) 115 Ala. 108, 22 So. 479.

It was held in Sisk v. State (1890) 28 Tex. App. 432, 13 S. W. 647, that a room used as a sleeping room in a building in which no other rooms were occupied might be an “outhouse where people resort” within the meaning of the statute.

Likewise, in Huse v. State (1904) 46 Tex. Crim. Rep. 585, 80 S. W. 618, it was held that a dugout within a few feet of a dwelling house and occasionally used in connection with the house was an “outhouse where people resort,” when gambling occurred there.

A barn used for keeping stock and storing grain, and used in connection with the residence of the owner, is not shown to be “an outhouse where people resort,” where the only proof is that the defendant and another person played a game of cards there, no others being present when the game was played. Stockton v. State (1898) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 44 S. W. 509.

v.

J. M. ISBELL.

Mississippi Supreme Court (Division B) — March 7, 1921.

(124 Miss. 799, 87 So. 273.)

Mechanic's lien — priority — existing lien.

All liens are created by law or by contract, and to establish a lien the contract must be made by the owner of the property upon which a lien is sought to be impressed. The contract may be expressed or implied. But, where a mechanic repairs property on which there exists a prior lien which he knows exists, his lien for repairs will be subject to the prior lien, unless the facts show a waiver by the prior lienholder, or an implied contract to subordinate his lien to that of the mechanic.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Copiah County (Miller, J.) reversing a judgment in their favor before a justice of the peace, in a suit to establish a mechanic's lien on an automobile repaired by them for defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. R. N. Miller and L. F. Hendrick for appellants.

Mr. J. F. Guynes for appellee.

Ethridge, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Hollis & Ray instituted a proceeding to establish a mechanic's lien on an automobile which they had repaired for Isbell. Isbell had bought the automobile from William Atkinson & McDonald Company, a corporation, which had retained title until the purchase money was paid. The suit originated in a justice of the peace court, in which court there was a judgment holding the appellants' claim superior to that of Atkinson & McDonald Company, from which judgment an appeal was prosecuted to the circuit court, where there was a judgment holding that the lien of Atkinson & McDonald Company was superior to that of the appellants, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The case was tried in the circuit court on an agreed statement of facts, before the circuit court without a jury. The agreed statement of facts reads as follows:

"In this case it is agreed between counsel to submit to the court, waiving a jury, the following facts:

"It is agreed that Atkinson & McDonald Company, on March 22, 1919, sold and delivered to J. M. Isbell a Maxwell touring car for the sum of $275 and interest, for which amount they accepted his note, reserving to the said company title to the said car until the purchase money should be paid; that said note is filed herewith as exhibit A hereto. On the — day of September, 1919, there was due on the said note a balance of $215, which fact that there was a balance due by Isbell on the car to claimant was fully known to Hollis & Ray, plaintiffs in the original suit.

"On the last date named, without the knowledge or consent of William Atkinson & McDonald Company, the said Isbell took the automobile to Hollis & Ray for repairs, and they repaired it at their garage. The amount due for said repairs amounted to $51. Before the said bill was paid they, Hollis & Ray, consented for the said Isbell to take possession of said car.

"On the — day of —, 1920, the said bill for repairs being still due and unpaid, said Hollis & Ray filed their suit in the justice of the peace court to enforce their lien on said car for the said sum. The car was seized. Atkinson & McDonald Company, before the trial, filed their claimant's issue, claiming the title to said car by virtue of said note.

"At the trial Hollis & Ray obtained judgment for said amount of $51, and for the sale of said car for which to pay the said amount. On trial of claimant's issue the said lien of Hollis & Ray was held to be paramount to the claim of title of Atkinson & McDonald Company. Whereupon said company appealed to the circuit court."

The appellant relies upon the case of Broom v. Dale, 109 Miss. 52, L.R.A.1915D, 1146, 67 So. 659, in which this court held that where a vendor reserving title to secure the purchase money had knowledge that a car sold with title retained was being repaired by a mechanic, and made no objection thereto, the mechanic's lien was superior to that of the vendor. The appellant also relied on the case of Orr v. Jackson Jitney Co. 115 Miss. 140, 75 So. 945. In the Broom Case, supra, a ground of liability rests upon the proposition that the vendor had knowledge, and impliedly consented to the repair of the car, and that the repair resulted to his benefit as well as to the benefit of the vendee. In the case before us the vendor had no knowledge whatever that repairs were being made, or were to be made, until after their completion. There is nothing in the record to show that the repairs increased the value of the car over and above its value at the time of the sale.

The appellant also argues that the principle of commercial necessity enters into this case, and for that reason a mechanic's lien should be superior to the vendor's lien or the vendor's title, even though the mechanic had knowledge of the seller's rights.

In 3 R. C. L. 133, § 55, it is stated: "All liens are created by law or by contract of the parties. Hence, while ordinarily a bailee has a lien on a chattel where, by the bestowal of skill and labor, he has enhanced its value, such a lien arises from his employment to render the services, and, as a lien is in effect a proprietary interest or qualified ownership, it follows that the employment must be by the owner whose property is to be affected by the lien, or by his consent, express or implied; otherwise the bailee has no lien, and the true owner, on demand, is entitled to a delivery thereof without satisfying any charges which may have accrued in favor of the bailee against his bailor."

The general rule of priority is that one acquiring a right with knowledge of a prior right acquires subject to the prior right, and this rule will be enforced, unless circumstances are such that an agreement to the contrary may be implied on the part of the holder of the prior right. In many cases the circumstances warranted the court in holding from the circumstances, that the prior lienholder has waived his lien or agreed to subordinate it to that of the subsequent lienholder, and that was the foundation upon which the case of Broom v. Dale rested. In the present case it was agreed, in the agreed statement of facts above set out, that the seller had no knowledge of the transaction between the mechanic and his vendee, but shows, on the contrary, that the mechanic had full knowledge of the seller's right.

Mechanic's Lien —priority—
existing lien.

This being true, he must have contracted upon the faith of the credit of the vendee and such right as the vendee had in the property repaired. There are no circumstances in this record sufficient to warrant us in applying the doctrine of Broom v. Dale, supra, to this case. There is a clear distinction between this case and that one.

The learned court below decided in accordance with this opinion, and the judgment is affirmed.

NOTE.

The question of priority as between a lien for repairs and the right of the seller under conditional contract is the subject of the annotation following SCOTT v. MERCER GARAGE & AUTO SALES Co. post, 249.

W. A. SCOTT, Plff. in Err.,
v.
MERCER GARAGE & AUTO SALES COMPANY.

West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals — March 1, 1921.

Lien — priority — mechanic's and vendor's.

The common-law lien of a mechanic for repairs on a chattel in his possession is subordinate to the lien of a former owner of the chattel, who, in his contract of sale, reserved the title as security for unpaid purchase money, duly recorded as provided by § 3 of chapter 74 (§ 3831) of the Code, unless by the terms of the contract, or by the subsequent conduct of the seller, he has given express or implied authority to the vendee to keep the property in repair.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Mercer County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of an automobile. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Sexton & Roberts for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Arthur F. Kingdon, for defendant in error:

Even if the plaintiff had a valid lien against the purchaser of the automobile, nevertheless the defendant's lien would take precedence over the plaintiff's lien.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this action of detinue, begun in the circuit court of Mercer county, and there determined adversely to plaintiff, upon agreed facts submitted to the court in lieu of a jury, the question is now presented for our decision whether the common-law lien of the defendant company for repairs upon an automobile, done in December, 1916, and for the payment of which it was detaining said machine, is, as the circuit court held, superior and paramount to that of the plaintiff for the purchase money thereof, represented by notes, for which in his written contract of sale he retained the title thereto, duly recorded in the clerk's office of the said county, prior to the delivery thereof to the defendant by Mary L. Holley, or her husband, the purchaser thereof, for the purpose of such repairs.

The contract of sale, made a part of the agreement of facts, after describing the parties and reciting the consideration, $750, $150 whereof is acknowledged as paid, and the balance, $600, represented by twelve negotiable notes of $50 each, payable one each month with interest, for the period of twelve months, further provides: "The title to the above-mentioned automobile is reserved to the party of the first part until all said purchase-money notes are fully paid."

Another provision of the contract is: "It is further understood and agreed between the parties hereto that in the event the party of the second part shall fail to discharge any two of said notes as they fall due, and any two or more of said notes shall be due at the same time, then the party of the first part shall have the right, or option, if he so desires, to retake possession of said automobile, in the event the said party of the first part cannot otherwise collect said notes."

The facts agreed show that plaintiff did not know said car was out of the possession of the purchaser and in possession of defendant until sometime in 1918, but believed it to be in his possession; that four of the purchase-money notes had been paid, but that, the remainder being unpaid, suit was brought thereon by plaintiff, judgment taken therefor against maker and indorser in May, 1918, for $410.92 and costs, and every legal remedy available was taken to collect the same, without avail; and that thereafter demand for the possession of the said automobile was made by plaintiff upon defendant, which being refused, this suit was brought to obtain possession thereof.

We recognize the fact that we are presented a clear case of a common-law lien of a repair man in possession of the chattel, holding it as security for labor and material expended upon it. But we also emphasize the fact that plaintiff is the vendor thereof, with recorded reservation of title held as security for the purchase money, giving notice to creditors of and purchasers from the vendee, the mortgagor. This lien was good at common law without notice, but by § 3 of chapter 74 (§ 3831) of the Code, such lien for purchase money is lost without recorded notice thereof as therein provided. There is nothing in the equities of the case now before us which should allow the subsequent lien to supplant the prior lien of the vendor. The defendant no doubt acquired a common-law lien on the chattel for the amount of the repairs, but was it not subordinate to that of plaintiff for purchase money? Plaintiff furnished the automobile, practically new, with all the material and labor bestowed upon it to make it a valuable machine, and there is nothing in the provisions of the contract of sale implying authority in the purchaser to encumber the property, voluntarily or involuntarily, in such a way as to supersede the prior lien for purchase money. The instrument so reserving title of a chattel partakes of the nature of a mortgage, the vendor being mortgagee, the vendee the mortgagor. As a general rule, say all the authorities, a mortgagor cannot create a lien upon the property to take precedence over his recorded mortgage. Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 472. This authority says: "An agreement which will defeat the purpose of the transaction should not be inferred or implied against a mortgagee, without very cogent evidence."

Following the general rule referred to, we find directly in point the case of Denison v. Shuler, 47 Mich. 598, 41 Am. Rep. 734, 11 N. W. 402, opinion by Graves, Ch. J., holding that a mechanic's lien for repairs is subordinate to a prior duly recorded mortgage thereon for the purchase money. This case involved repairs on a steam engine which was then in the possession of the defendants, the mechanics, and held by them for the repair bill of $185.86. The court, referring to the fact that the plaintiff had furnished the machine, says: "The repairers did less. Their expenditure was comparatively small, and they acted, in making it, under circumstances which charged them with notice of the plaintiff's prior lien. Why should their claim be preferred?"

What was said by Chief Justice Marshall, in Rankin v. Scott, 12 Wheat. 177, 179, 6 L. ed. 592, 593, referred to by the Michigan court, is as applicable here as in that case, namely, that a prior lien gives a prior claim, which is entitled to prior satisfaction of the subject it binds, unless the lien be intrinsically defective, or be displaced by some act of the party holding it, which shall postpone him in a court of law or equity, to a subsequent claimant.

The comparatively recent case of Shaw v. Webb, 131 Tenn. 173, L.R.A.1915D, 1141, 174 S. W. 273, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 626, involved the lien of a repairer of an automobile—first a common-law lien lost by surrender of possession, but for which the statute also gave him a lien. In that case the court in a well-considered opinion, which reviews many of the decisions and analyzes them, held that the lien given by statute was subordinate to the lien of the vendor of the chattel reserved to secure the payment of the purchase-money notes, and that if the vendor intended to subordinate his lien to that of the mechanic for repairs, it should be manifested in the contract (in that case, in the purchase-money notes), in which the title was reserved to secure the payment thereof, else the notes would be deprived of a considerable element of marketability. In Baughman Auto. Co. v. Emanuel, 137 Ga. 354, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 97, 73 S. E. 511, the common-law lien of the repairer of an automobile was held to be subordinate to the rights of the vendor, in his title retained to secure the purchase money. In that case it appears that the lien claimant had notice of the rights of the conditional vendor. Here our recording statute was the legal equivalent, for it gave defendant record or constructive notice binding him.

An examination of the cases apparently in conflict with those cited, and others that might be referred to,—unless it be those of New Jersey, constituting an exception,—will show that wherever such common-law lien has been allowed to supersede a lien reserved by the vendor of the chattel, the courts have attempted, at least, to refer their conclusions to some actual or implied authority of the vendor or mortgagee to have the chattel kept in repair. An illustration is the case of Hammond v. Danielson, 126 Mass. 294, involving a mortgage of a hack described as "let for hire," and "now in use," from which authority was implied in the mortgage to keep the vehicle in repair. And in accordance with this class of cases, it was sought in the present case to imply authority in the vendee to cause the automobile to be repaired, because of the fact that plaintiff knew that the purchaser intended to use the machine on some occasions to carry passengers for hire. No such authority was given in the recorded contract. May he not stand on that, if he has done nothing in the meantime to deprive him of his rights? The facts agreed show nothing justifying any such implied authority.

For the reasons aforesaid, we are of opinion that plaintiff is entitled to recover possession of the property sued for, and that the judgment below must be reversed. But as the facts agreed do not include the value of the property, and the court made no finding thereon, before a final judgment the value of the property must be ascertained, as provided by § 6 of chapter 102 (§ 4403) of the Code.

We, therefore, reverse the judgment and remand the case to the Circuit Court, with direction by proper proceedings to ascertain the value of the property and give judgment for the plaintiff for possession thereof, if possession thereof can be had; if not, for the value thereof, with costs according to law.

ANNOTATION.

Priority as between lien for repairs and right of seller under conditional contract.

In general.

As a general rule, the lien of a person making repairs to a chattel, at the instance of the buyer in possession thereof, is subordinate to the rights of the seller under a contract of conditional sale of which the person making the repairs has actual or constructive notice. Baughman Auto. Co. v. Emanuel (1911) 137 Ga. 354, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 97, 73 S. E. 511; Small v. Robinson (1879) 69 Me. 425, 31 Am. Rep. 299; HOLLIS v. ISBELL (reported herewith) ante, 244; Shaw v. Webb (1914) 131 Tenn. 173, L.R.A. 1915D, 1141, 174 S. W. 273, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 626. See also SCOTT v. MERCER GARAGE & AUTO SALES CO. (reported herewith) ante, 246.

Thus, in HOLLIS v. ISBELL (reported herewith) ante, 244, it was held that the title retained by a seller under a recorded contract of conditional sale was superior to a lien for repairs, made at the instance of the buyer without the knowledge of the seller. The court distinguished Broom v. Dale (1915) 109 Miss. 52, L.R.A. 1915D, 1146, 67 So. 659, on the ground that the agreed statement of facts in the latter case showed knowledge on the part of the seller that the repairs were being made. See infra, under "Implied consent of seller to repair."

A fortiori, where the person making the repairs has actual notice that a conditional buyer who requests repairs on a chattel is not the owner thereof, he will not be permitted to assert a lien for repairs as against the seller who retains the title to the chattel. Baughman Auto. Co. v. Emanuel (Ga.) supra.

However, under a statute providing that "a person who makes, alters, or repairs any article of personal property, at the request of the owner or legal possessor of the property, has a lien on the same for his reasonable charges for the balance due for such work done and materials furnished, and may retain possession of the same until the charges are paid," it has been held that a person making repairs to an automobile at the request of a buyer was entitled to a lien, even as against an unpaid conditional seller thereof. Davenport v. Grundy Motor Sales Co. (1915) 28 Cal. App. 409, 152 Pac. 932, wherein the court said: "The sole question involved is whether or not the Grundy Motor Sales Company was entitled to a lien for the work done and materials furnished in making repairs upon the automobile at the request of Seymour, to whom the plaintiff had delivered possession under the terms of the contract for the conditional sale thereof. Appellant insists that, as Seymour did not have title to the property, no lien for repairs could be based upon any act or request of his. This contention, however, is contrary to the plain import of the language used in the statute, which, as we have seen, expressly provides that one making repairs at the request of the legal possessor of the property shall have a lien therefor. That Seymour was the legal possessor of the automobile admits of no question."

Likewise, under a statute providing that whenever any person shall intrust to any mechanic, artisan, or tradesman an article of value to be repaired, such mechanic, artisan, or tradesman shall have a lien on the article, it has been held that a lien for necessary repairs by a mechanic was effective as against an owner and conditional seller, where the mechanic made the repairs at the request of the purchaser and without objection from the seller, though the latter had advance notice of the contemplated repairs, and told the mechanic not to let the automobile go out of his possession until he was paid for them. Etchen v. Dennis & Son Garage (1919) 104 Kan. 241, 178 Pac. 408. The decision in that case appears to have been based both on the extent of the lien under the statute, and the consent of the owner to the making of the repairs. See infra, under "Implied consent of seller to repairs."

In New York, by an express provision of the statute relating to liens for the repair of motor vehicles (Lien Law, § 184, 32 McKinney, Consol. Laws, p. 177), a conditional vendee is regarded as an owner within the meaning of the clause creating a lien for repairs made on a motor vehicle at the request of its owner. See Lloyd v. Kilpatrick (1911) 71 Misc. 19, 127 N. Y. Supp. 1096. And in Terminal & Town Taxi Corp. v. O'Rourke (1922) 117 Misc. 761, 193 N. Y. Supp. 238, it was held that § 184, so far as repairs are concerned, is merely declaratory of common-law rights, and that, irrespective of statute, a repair company's lien for repairs made under contract with one who had acquired the interest of the vendee under a conditional contract is superior to the right of the conditional vendor; and that the section is not unconstitutional as contravening the due process of law provision of the state and Federal Constitutions. See also a similar Minnesota statute, referred to in Reed v. Horton (1916) 135 Minn. 17, 159 N. W. 1080.

In Crosier v. Cudihee (1915) 85 Wash. 237, 147 Pac. 1146, the court held to be constitutional a statute giving a lien to any person who expends labor, skill, or material on a chattel at the request of the owner or his authorized agent, providing that a person in possession of a chattel under an agreement for its purchase shall be considered the owner for the purposes of the act, whether he have the legal title or not, and making the lien superior to the right of the holder of the legal title or any previous lien. The court said: "Appellant contends that § 1156, Rem. & Bal. Code (P. C. 309, § 167), is unconstitutional, in that it prefers liens of this character over any prior security held by a vendor, and grants a lien against the interest of the vendor, when, as here, such interest is evidenced by a conditional-sale contract. It is also asserted that the effect of the statute deprives appellant of his property without due process of law. Appellant cites no direct authority supporting his contention, and we find none. We cannot recall any rule of law which would make this statute unconstitutional. Statutes establishing priorities as between liens are not uncommon, and such statutes have never been successfully attacked because liens of this character have been granted priority over vendors,' mortgagors,' and other liens. The fact that appellant is in court seeking the validity of his lien against that of respondents is a sufficient answer to his contention that he has been deprived of his property without due process of law."

Under a statute requiring that a contract of conditional sale must be recorded in order to be valid as against third persons, a lien for repairs made at the instance of the buyer, is superior to the right of a seller who has failed to record the contract reserving title to him. Winton Co. v. Meister (1918) 133 Md. 318, 105 Atl. 301. See also Landreth Machinery Co. v. Rohey (1914) 185 Mo. App. 474, 171 S. W. 681.

The unusual situation has been presented, in two cases, of a claim of lien for repairs by a conditional seller entitled to resume possession because of defaults in payment. Ordinarily, it would seem that he cannot claim a lien, since he is the holder of the legal title, and the claim of a lien is not consistent with his title. Alexander v. Mobile Auto Co. (1917) 200 Ala. 586, 76 So. 944. In that case it appeared that a conditional seller of an automobile bought an action against the buyer for the price, though he had resumed the possession of the machine. The contention of the seller was that he had taken possession because he was entitled to a lien for repairs made by him after the sale. The court held that the seller, having reserved title, could not assert a lien on the chattel sold; that his resuming possession amounted to an election to enforce the condition in the contract of sale, and he could not afterward maintain an action for the price. But in Gilbert v. Bishop (1912) 78 Misc. 560, 138 N. Y. Supp. 689, it was held, under a lien act providing that a garage owner or other person keeping a place for the repair of motor vehicles shall have a lien for repairs made at the request, or with the consent of, the owner, whether he is a conditional vendee or a mortgagor remaining in possession, that the seller of an automobile who retained title until the purchase price was paid could take possession of the machine to enforce a lien for repairs made by him, and that, under such circumstances, his act in taking possession did not bar an action by him against the purchaser for the price.

Implied consent of seller to repair.

Where the circumstances of a conditional sale of a chattel are such as to imply a consent by the seller that the buyer may have it repaired when necessary, the lien of the person making the repairs is superior to the rights of the seller. Thus, an understanding of the parties to a contract for the conditional sale of a vehicle, that it is to be used to carry passengers for hire, has been held to imply that the buyer is authorized to subject the vehicle to a lien for repairs, and, therefore, to give to one who repairs it a lien enforceable against the seller. Weber Implement & Auto. Co. v. Pearson (1917) 132 Ark. 101, L.R.A.1918D, 327, 200 S. W. 273. In that case it appeared that a conditional sale was made of three automobiles, with the understanding that they were to be used in a livery service, and were to be paid for from the earnings of the business. In holding that the purchaser, in having repairs made, was acting as an agent for the seller, the court said: "Necessary repairs are for the betterment of the property, and, under circumstances like the present case, it will be presumed to have been the intention of the parties that the property should be kept in repair, and the purchaser in possession will be deemed the agent of the conditional vendor to procure the repairs to be made. One corporation sold the three cars to the Avens. They knew that they were to be used in the livery business, and that it would be necessary to make repairs on them from time to time, to keep them in running order."

However, in a Maine case (Small v. Robinson (1879) 69 Me. 425, 31 Am. Rep. 299), the court reached an opposite conclusion on substantially the same state of facts. It appeared in that case that the owner of two horses, a set of harness, and a hack parted with their possession under an agreement which was substantially a conditional-sale contract, though not so designated by the court. The buyer, a hack driver, with the knowledge and consent of the seller, had the possession of the hack, using it in his business, though it was stipulated in the note given for the price that title should remain in the seller until the note was paid, with interest. In an action of replevin brought by the seller against a person who had made necessary repairs on the hack, it was held that the buyer had no authority to subject it to a lien for repairs.

Under a "hire-purchase agreement" which provided that the prospective purchaser of a dogcart should keep and preserve it from injury, it has been held that he had the authority to have necessary repairs made on the cart, and that the lien therefor was enforceable against the owner. Keene v. Thomas [1905] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 136, 74 L. J. K. B. N. S. 21, 53 Week. Rep. 336, 92 L. T. N. S. 19, 21 Times L. R. 2.

The recording of a contract providing for the conditional sale of a vehicle, which does not refer to its use for the carriage of passengers for hire, is held in SCOTT v. MERCER GARAGE & AUTO SALES CO. (reported herewith) ante, 246, to avoid the effect of an understanding for such use, and to prevent the title of the seller from becoming subject to the lien of one who makes repairs on the vehicle at the instance of the buyer. The defendant company contended that its lien for repairs on an automobile was superior to the right of an unpaid seller under a conditional-sale contract duly recorded, on the ground that the seller knew, at the date of the sale, that the automobile would sometimes be used for carrying passengers, and that there was, therefore, an implied authority granted to the purchaser to have the machine repaired. The court holds that, since nothing in the recorded contract can be construed as an authority for the purchaser to have repairs made, the lien for repairs is subordinate to the seller's right to possession under his reservation of title in the sale agreement. The court distinguishes an analogous case involving the respective rights of a mortgagee and a conditional seller (Hammond v. Danielson (1879) 126 Mass. 294), wherein a different result was reached on the ground of an implied authority. It is pointed out that the mortgaged vehicle referred to in that case was described as "let for hire," and "now in use."

of a conditional seller of a chattel that the buyer was having repairs made on it was held not to have the effect of an agreement for the making of the repairs, or to subordinate the reserved title of the seller to the lien for the repairs.

In Mississippi, however, the opposite view has been adopted as to the effect of knowledge of the repairs on the part of the conditional seller. Broom v. Dale (1915) 109 Miss. 52, L.R.A.1915D, 1146, 67 So. 659. In that case it appeared that the buyer of an automobile under a conditional contract of sale had repairs made on it with the knowledge of the sellers. In holding that the lien for the repairs was superior to the rights of the sellers, the court said: "In the case at bar the automobile was in the possession of Mr. Polk, and being used by him with the knowledge and consent of appellees, which use continued for a long period of time. Appellees not only knew and consented to the general use of the automobile by Mr. Polk, but also had knowledge that, in the course of his use of the property, he was having it repaired. Appellees, with this knowledge, made no objection to the repairs being made. From the sole possession, control, and the use of the automobile by Mr. Polk, by agreement with appellees, from the manner of its use and the necessity of repairing to preserve it and keep it in running order and prevent its deterioration, and from the making of such repairs with the knowledge of appellees, we conclude that there was an implied authority and permission from appellees, as mortgagees, to Mr. Polk, as mortgagor, to have such repairs made, and that appellants have a paramount and superior lien to that of appellees on the property, for the payment of the labor they performed and materials furnished in repairing it."

Apparently, Etchen v. Dennis & Son Garage (1919) 104 Kan. 241, 178 Pac. 408, is to the same effect, though the decision is based, in part, on the language of a Kansas statute. See supra, under "In general."

It would seem that the mere fact that repairs are necessary, if the conditional buyer of a chattel is to continue to use it, is not sufficient to imply a grant of authority to the buyer to subject the reserved title of the seller to a lien for repairs. Shaw v. Webb (1914) 131 Tenn. 173, L.R.A. 1915D, 1141, 174 S. W. 273, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 626. In that case the plaintiff sought to enforce a mechanic's lien against a conditional buyer, under the following section of a Tennessee statute: "There shall be a lien upon any vehicle . . . for any repairs or improvements made or fixtures or machinery furnished at the request of the owner or his agent in favor of the mechanic, contractor, founder, or machinist who undertakes the work." It appeared that the conditional buyer who ordered the repairs had given two notes in payment, each of which recited that the seller was to retain title to secure the purchase price. After reviewing the authorities, the court said, with respect to the authority of a conditional buyer to subject the purchased chattel to a lien: "We are of opinion . . . that something more is required than the fact that a vehicle, which may need repair in order to continue personal use by the vendee, is placed in the possession of the conditional vendee. The vendor in such case should not be considered as consenting in advance to the subordination to that which both parties patently intended to make superior—the title retained for the security of the payment of the purchase money. The intent of the vendor to permit repairs to be made, and a consequent lien to attach to his interest, should have been manifested in the note contract, since, upon a transfer of the note, the transferee is vested with the rights of the conditional vendor. To announce a doctrine such as is contended for by the mechanic in this case would be to deprive a note which contains a reservation of title to personalty, of a no inconsiderable element of marketability. The transferee of such paper should not, we believe, take it subject to the risk of having his right embarrassed or lessened by such act of the vendee-maker, when the note contains nothing to put him on notice."

PETITION by the Insurance Company to revise an order of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, requiring payment of the admitted surrender value of a policy of life insurance issued by it upon the life of a bankrupt, to the trustee in bankruptcy. Affirmed.

Statement by Hough, Circuit Judge:

Greenberg became bankrupt while in possession of a policy of life insurance in the Hancock Company. The policy had been obtained some years before petition filed, by the bankrupt himself, and therein his wife was designated as beneficiary. The lower court has found as a fact that Mrs. Greenberg never did, "at any time, take out, own, or pay for the policy" above named.

By the policy terms the insured bankrupt could "change the beneficiary from time to time with the consent of the company, by written notice to said company," provided, however, that "no other than the insured's estate, father, mother, husband, wife, or dependent child will be made beneficiary under this policy."

This proceeding began by the trustee (having the policy in possession) demanding that the insurance company pay him the surrender value of the same. From this we assume that previous demand had been made upon the bankrupt, pursuant to § 70 of the act (Comp. Stat. § 9654, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1150), that he pay the trustee such surrender value, that he had declined so to do, and that the policy had, therefore, pursuant to the statute, passed to the trustee as assets. No other assumption is consistent with the form of this proceeding, which is an application to compel the insurance company to pay over said surrender value, pursuant to the trustee's requirement.

The insurance company appeared, has never objected to the jurisdiction, and contended, and still contends, that the policy is vested in the wife, or (if no such vesting has actually taken place) that it, as insurer, may refuse to give its consent to any change of beneficiary, and thereby defeat the trustee's claim.

The district court, having made the finding of fact above set forth, held that the insurance company's action was unwarranted and "arbitrary." It therefore entered an order requiring the payment of the admitted surrender value. To review such order this petition was filed.

Argued before Ward, Hough, and Manton, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Frederick C. Tanner and Morris E. Kinnan, for petitioner:

In construing the Bankruptcy Law as to life insurance, in connection with the statute of exemption in various states, most of the courts have held that no interest in the cash surrender value passes to the trustee in bankruptcy.

Mr. Bernard Bernbaum for the trustee in bankruptcy.

Hough, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The beneficiary of a life insurance policy, who may at any time be removed from the benefited position by the insured, and against the beneficiary's will, cannot have a vested interest. In Grems v. Traver, 87 Misc. 644, 148 N. Y. Supp. 200, affirmed in 164 App. Div. 968, 149 N. Y. Supp. 1085, there was one policy considered much like the one at bar; but the court held as a fact that such policy "was taken out for the especial benefit of the wife, under agreement that it should be held for her protection." No such agreement is here shown, and it may be noted that the cases from United States courts, cited and relied on in the Grems Case, are from lower courts, and for the most part wholly inconsistent with the subsequent decision in Cohen v. Samuels, 245 U. S. 53, 62 L. ed. 143, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 36.

This being a petition to revise, we can inquire only into the law; the facts (unless without any evidence to support them) we must take as found by the lower court. That court having declared that the bankrupt's wife never took out, owned, or paid for the policy, there is no ground for asserting that the wife was within the protection of § 52 of the Domestic Relations Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 14) of this state. By "owned," we take it that the district judge meant that the policy had not vested in the wife, which is the meaning in which we used the word in Re Samuels, 166 C. C. A. 221, 254 Fed. 776.

This case presents but one point, for, strictly speaking, the wife is not before us at all; she is not making any claim to the policy, or the proceeds thereof; she is not a party to this proceeding, which is against the insurance company alone, and at bar that company substantially takes the position that it can, by refusing consent to a change of beneficiary, secure to the wife the enjoyment of that to which she makes no demand. This raises the question as to the scope of the phrase which gave to the insured the right of changing his beneficiary "from time to time, with the consent of the company, by written notice to said company."

It is doubtless true that where a specific and formal manner of changing beneficiary, issuing new certificate or policy of insurance, or of assigning the policy itself, is agreed to and plainly expressed when the policy is obtained, no other method of effecting such change or assignment can ordinarily be recognized; at least as between conflicting claimants. The matter is amply discussed in Freund v. Freund, 218 Ill. 189, 109 Am. St. Rep. 283, 75 N. E. 925; and see a long list of citations in L.R.A.1915A, 109.

But the contest here is not between the original beneficiary and another person selected for succession by the insured. By force of the bankruptcy statute, the trustee has succeeded by operation of law to all the rights of the bankrupt in the premises. For practical purposes this contest is between the insured bankrupt and his insurer, and the question would be the same if Greenberg had attempted to substitute for his wife another beneficiary (within the class limited in the policy), and the company refused consent to the change. Under such circumstances it is to be remembered that this exact provision for the consent of the company to the change is solely for its own protection. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. White, 20 R. I. 457, 40 Atl. 5. And so the question becomes this: Can the insurer coerce the will of the insured in respect of change of beneficiary, although its own rights are not in any way endangered?

No similar proceeding on the part of an insurer can, we think, be discovered in the books; but, on principle, the matter is covered by the decision of Justice Brown, then district judge, in Supreme Conclave, R. A. v. Cappella (C. C.) 41 Fed. 1, and Lahey v. Lahey, 174 N. Y. 146, 61 L.

R.A. 791, 95 Am. St. Rep. 554, 66 N. E. 670, to the effect that where the insured is physically unable to comply with the formalities, or where the insurer itself is so physically unable, equity will deem that to be done which ought to have been done, and proceed accordingly. In the present instance there is no physical inability; there is a flat refusal to perform on the part of the insurer, for reasons having no relation to its own security, or, indeed, to its own business. It is avowed at bar that the company prefers to pay the bankrupt's wife the whole of the policy, rather than pay the trustee the surrender value thereof.

Bankruptcy is equity, and just as it will presume on occasion that that has been done which ought to be done, so on other occasions it will compel that to be done which ought to be done. This is one of those occasions.

The order under review is affirmed, with costs.

Ward, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

The question in this case is whether the beneficiary of the policy can be changed without the insurance company's consent. This is a question of law which we can dispose of upon petition to revise. Of the cases cited by the court, Grems v. Traver, 87 Misc. 644, 148 N. Y. Supp. 200, involved a policy under which the insured had the right to change the beneficiary at any time, and in John Hancock Mut.

L. Ins. Co. v. White, 20 R. I. 457, 40 Atl. 5, the court held that the company was estopped from refusing to consent to the change.

I cannot see how any court can delete this provision of a contract, or say that it will be disregarded because "arbitrary." If the bankrupt were to ask the insurance company to consent to substitute his trustee in bankruptcy in place of his wife as beneficiary, it would be the plain duty of the company to refuse, and the refusal for the protection of the wife could not be regarded as arbitrary. On the contrary, consent would defeat the purpose of the policy, which was to protect the wife. Yet the order of the court below accomplishes this very thing.

The case of Cohen v. Samuels, 245 U. S. 53, 62 L. ed. 145, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 36, does not control. The ratio decidendi proceeded upon facts not found in this case at all. In it the insured had an absolute right to change the beneficiary, and this right the court held, under § 70 (a) subd. (3) of the Bankruptcy Act (Comp. Stat. § 9654, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1169), was vested in the trustee as one of the "powers which he [the bankrupt] might have exercised for his own benefit." And also, under subdivision (5), as "property which prior to the filing of the petition he could have transferred." The bankrupt in this case could have done neither of these things, and his trustee stands in no better position.

I think the order should be reversed.

ANNOTATION.

Refusal of insurer to consent to change of beneficiary in life policy as affecting right of trustee in bankruptcy of insured.

The decision of the majority of the court in the reported case (RE GREENBERG, ante, 253), to the effect that an insurance company, issuing a life policy providing for a change of beneficiary "with consent of the company," cannot refuse to consent to a change to the trustee in bankruptcy of the insured, so as to permit him to realize the surrender value of the policy, although its refusal is based on the ground that it wishes to protect the rights of the beneficiary named in the policy, is clearly in accord with the better reasoning, especially since, in this case, the original beneficiary was not making any claim, and the company's own rights were not in any way endangered, which facts would make its refusal arbitrary; the provision for consent being, as has often been held, solely for the protection of the insurer.

And support for the conclusion reached in the GREENBERG CASE is also found in Travelers Ins. Co. v. Middlekamp (1919) 67 Colo. 162, 185 Pac. 335, where a trustee in bankruptcy brought an action to recover the cash surrender value of a life insurance policy on the life of the bankrupt, which policy entitled the insured to change the beneficiary, which change could take effect only when the "written consent" of the insurer was indorsed upon contract, it having been held, in refuting the argument that the insurance company had not consented to the payment to the trustee, that such refusal of consent could make no difference, since "the rights of the trustee exist by operation of law, which binds equally the insurer and the insured," in view of the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, giving the trustee in bankruptcy all powers which the bankrupt might have exercised for his own benefit, and all property which he could by any means have transferred.

And see Urick v. Western Travelers Acci. Asso. (1908) 81 Neb. 327, 116 N. W. 48, where, in discussing the effect of a provision in an insurance policy, requiring the consent of the insurer to effect a change of beneficiary, the court said that "undoubtedly the insurance company would have no right to refuse to grant a request unequivocally made in accordance with the statute [requiring consent] and the rules of the company," etc. This, however, was not a bankruptcy case.

With respect to industrial life insurance, which vests a discretion in the insurer to pay the amount of the policy to any person appearing to be equitably entitled thereto, it would seem that such a policy, having a cash surrender value, would not, as against the insistence of the insurer, necessarily pass to the trustee in bankruptcy of the insured, since the insurer, in the reasonable exercise of the discretion vested in it, could, were there such a person or persons, pay the money to any other or others equitably entitled to the same. For a case where it was so held, see Re Gannon (1917) 241 Fed. 733, affirmed in (1917) 160 C. C. A. 122, 247 Fed. 932. G. J. C.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY IN KENTUCKY, Appt.,

v.

JOHN T. BARBEE & COMPANY.

Kentucky Court of Appeals — December 17, 1920.

(190 Ky. 63, 226 S. W. 376.)

Carrier — necessity of exercising care to remove property.

1. A railroad company cannot, although its contract exempts it from liability for loss by mob, escape liability for freight destroyed by fire started by a mob, if there was ample time between the starting of the fire and the destruction of the freight, by the exercise of ordinary care, to have removed it from the danger zone to a place of safety.

—destruction of freight by mob — liability.

2. A railroad company cannot relieve itself from liability for freight destroyed by a mob, without showing further that the destruction did not result through its negligence.

—failure to remove car to safety.

3. A railroad company is liable for freight in its cars, destroyed by fire communicated to the cars from buildings in the vicinity of its yard, if for hours it knew that a riot was in progress, and that the fires were being started, without any attempt to remove the cars to a place of safety or to guard them from danger.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Branch, Fourth Division of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County; in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of a shipment of whisky destroyed by fire, which the defendant wrongfully and negligently failed and refused to transport. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Lawrence S. Leopold, for appellee:

Sampson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On June 27, 1917, Barbee & Company shipped a consignment of thirty-nine packages of whisky from Milner, Kentucky, near Louisville, to a point in Texas, and on the next day shipped two barrels of whisky to another point in the state of Texas, in each case taking a bill of lading. Neither of the consignments was delivered by the railway company, and this action was commenced by Barbee & Company, against the Southern Railway Company in Kentucky, initial carrier, to recover the value of the whisky, alleged to be $634.68, averring that the railway company had wrongfully and negligently failed and refused to safely transport or cause to be transported said whisky from Milner, Kentucky, to the destination in the state of Texas, and then and there safely deliver the same to the consignee, as it had agreed in its bill of lading to do, and had wrongfully failed to account to Barbee &

Company, or to anyone for the plaintiffs, for said whisky, or any part thereof, and had converted the same to its own use. The answer of the railway company traversed the material allegations of the petition. The answer averred that the bill of lading, the contract between the parties, expressly provided that neither the defendant railway company nor any of its connecting carriers transporting said whisky should be liable for any loss, damage, or injury to same, resulting from riots or consequences thereof; that while the said shipment of whisky was in the ordinary course of transportation from Milner, Kentucky, to its destination in Texas, it was destroyed in and by virtue of a riot occurring in East St. Louis, Illinois; that in said riot and as a direct result thereof the said whisky was set on fire, and in this manner was burned and destroyed without negligence of any kind on the part of the defendant railway company; and, further, that the railway company had exercised all possible care to safely transport said whisky and to deliver same to the consignee thereof, and that its destruction was without fault or negligence, or any breach of duty, on the part of the railway company, but came about through causes entirely beyond the control of the defendant. A demurrer to the affirmative part of the answer was overruled, whereupon Barbee & Company filed reply, in which, after traversing the material parts of the answer, it was averred that the railway company negligently delayed the transportation of the whisky after it was delivered to it at Milner, and because of such negligence on the part of the railway company the said whisky failed to arrive in East St. Louis prior to July 2d, the date of its destruction by the riot, if it was so destroyed, and that the delay was caused by negligence of the railway company, and but for said negligence on its part to sooner transport said whisky so that the same could arrive in East St. Louis and leave East St. Louis prior to July 2, 1917, the said whisky would not have become subject to the riot and fire ensuing therefrom; and it was further averred that the delay in transporting said whisky was a proximate cause and reason for its destruction, and the railway company is liable for said negligence. A general demurrer was sustained to this paragraph of the reply. It was further pleaded by the reply that on July 1, 1917, mobs formed in the city of East St. Louis began committing various excesses and acts of violence and depredations; that hundreds of men began rioting in East St. Louis on July 1, 1917, and in defiance of the public authorities, and that these facts were given great notoriety, and the public had notice thereof, and that the agents and employees of the railway company in charge of the shipment of whisky knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could and should have known, that the said mobs were committing said excesses and acts of violence and depredations in that city on July 1, 1917; that the mobs had not dispersed on July 2d, and that on that day the mobs were committing acts such as endangered the safety of the consignment of whisky; that the defendant railway company negligently, and in disregard of the safety of the goods, permitted and caused the same to be carried over its line of railroad from the city of Louisville into its yards in the city of East St. Louis while the riots were in progress, and to remain in East St. Louis while the riots were in progress at that time for many hours after the arrival of the consignment in that city, and in doing so the railway company was guilty of such negligence as to make it liable for any damage resulting from any acts committed by said mob or said rioters on that date, including the burning of the whisky. A general demurrer to this paragraph of the answer was overruled.

The rejoinder merely traversed the affirmative allegations of the reply. A trial before a jury resulted in a verdict for Barbee & Company for the full amount claimed, and the railway company appeals.

The parties filed a stipulation of facts, which was read as evidence to the jury, and is as follows:

"(1) On June 27, 1917, the plaintiff John T. Barbee & Company delivered to the plaintiff Southern Railway Company in Kentucky, at Milner, Kentucky, thirty eight cases and one box of whisky, for shipment to San Benito, Texas, consigned to the order of the plaintiff, with instructions to notify Roberts & Buesing, at destination, and a bill of lading was issued, executed, and delivered by and between the plaintiff and the defendant, and accepted by the plaintiff, as the contract of shipment between the parties, a copy of which is hereto attached as exhibit A.

"(2) The said thirty-eight cases and one box of whisky were of the value of $424.25.

"(3) On June 28, 1917, the plaintiff delivered to the defendant, at Milner, Kentucky, two barrels of whisky, for shipment to Cameron, Texas, consigned to the order of the plaintiff, with instructions to notify W. J. Hair at destination; and a bill of lading therefor was issued, executed, and delivered by and between the plaintiff and the defendant, and accepted by the plaintiff, as the contract of shipment between the parties, a copy of which is hereto attached as exhibit B.

"(4) The value of said two barrels of whisky was $210.43.

"(5) The shipment of thirty-eight cases and one box left Milner, Kentucky, on the line of the defendant, on June 27, 1917, and arrived in Louisville the next day (June 28, 1917).

"The shipment of two barrels left Milner, Kentucky, on June 28, 1917, on the line of the defendant, and arrived in Louisville the same day.

"(6) These two shipments were at Louisville, Kentucky, placed in one car (S. F. R. D. 11,250) and left Louisville at 4:30 A. M. on July 1, 1917, and arrived at the Coapman yards of the Southern Railway Company in East St. Louis at 10:45 A. M. on July 2, 1917.

"At 4:30 P. M., on July 2, the said car, containing the said two shipments, was placed on track No. 4 in the Sixth street yards at East St. Louis.

"(7) About 8 P. M., on July 2, 1917, some houses, to wit, private residences in the vicinity of the Sixth street yards and near the track, and place on said track, where said car was located, were set on fire by the rioters in East St. Louis, and the said car and the two shipments of whisky therein contained were consumed by the said fire about 8:30 P. M. on July 2, 1917, which fire was communicated to said car from said residences, the conflagration having spread from the said residences to the said car.

"(8) The shipments of whisky above referred to are those referred to in the petition."

From the newspapers filed in the record and from the evidence of witnesses it is quite manifest that on July 1, 1917, a race riot of no mean proportions broke out and was raging in East St. Louis, Illinois, and continued throughout that day and the next, resulting in much loss of life and property. Some members of the police force were killed by colored persons, and this provoked the riot. Several hundred white persons joined themselves together and went through the city, killing, and attempting to kill, all colored persons, or to drive them out of the city; later on they engaged themselves at burning and destroying the property of colored people and property in which colored people resided. Fires were started in all colored districts of the city, and practically all of the so-called "black belt" was wiped out by the conflagration. The fury of the mob was intensified by its progress, and towards evening of the 2d day of July a number of fires were started in the negro district alongside and near the yards of the Southern Railway Company, and hundreds of frantic men were firing guns, fighting and threatening, and otherwise creating a tremendous tumult near the yards of the railroad company in which the consignment of whisky, with much other freight, was situated. Everybody in the city was alarmed by the size and fury of the mob, and much of the property was threatened by destructive fires. The newspapers were full of lurid accounts of the doings of the mob. Notwithstanding this, the railway company seems not to have taken any precaution whatever, at least none out of the ordinary, to protect the consignment of freight which is the subject of this litigation, nor in fact any freight, of which there was a great quantity then in its custody in its yards in the mob-stricken city. While there may have been a few watchmen in their several yards about East St. Louis, no extra precaution commensurate with the fire situation and the imminent danger from the mob was exercised by the railroad company, or its employees in charge of the yards, for the protection of the consignment of freight in litigation, or any freight in the custody of the railroad in said yards. In fact it appears from the evidence that the railroad officials in charge of the yards, and whose duty it was to look after the safety of the freight therein, left their posts of duty early in the evening and went to their homes without having made any special arrangements or effort to inform themselves of the progress of the fires or the threatened danger to the other freight in the yards from the mob, although the rioting, shooting, and burning were going on very near the Sixth street railway yards of the company, in which this particular consignment was at the time, and in which large quantities of other freight were also standing. Some of the houses burned were within a few feet of the railroad tracks on which loaded cars were standing. This district was largely occupied by colored residents, the object of the mob; and it was common knowledge that the mob was attempting to kill the negroes and to burn and destroy their property, and in fact had been for hours burning their houses and the houses in which they lived.

The railroad employees in charge of the yards were charged with the duty of protecting the freight consigned therein. In fact, the railway company was an insurer, and it could not and cannot relieve itself of liability merely by pleading and showing that a mob was in progress in the city, and that a conflagration, started by the mob, spread to and consumed the freight in question, unless it further shows that such destruction did not result through its negligence. In other words, if the railway company, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have saved the freight consignment from the fire after its danger from the fire was discovered, but failed to do so, it cannot be relieved of responsibility by showing that a mob started the fire. It was charged with the duty of exercising ordinary care to save the freight consignment after the fire which threatened its destruction was discovered. If it failed in its duty in this regard it is liable. The accepted rule is that a railroad company may contract against liability for loss of goods while in transit through mobs or riots, but it cannot contract against its own negligence, and, although a fire may be started by a mob, the railroad company is not relieved of liability by merely showing that the fire was started by a mob, if the facts are sufficient to show, as in this case, that there was ample time between the starting of the fire and the destruction of the property, in which the freight might, by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the railroad company, have been removed from the danger zone to a safe place. For the purposes of this case, we might wholly disregard the fact that the mob started the fire. It is conceded that the fury of the mob was not in any degree directed toward the destruction of freight cars or their contents, but only towards the shacks near the tracks in which negroes lived.

It is also agreed that the fires in the vicinity of the yards, in which the consignment of freight was started about 5 or 5:30 o'clock in the evening. According to some of the evidence, these fires increased very rapidly, starting in different houses in the same district. One witness testifies that as many as ten or twelve fires were going at the same time in the same vicinity. Accompanying all this was a great uproar and much shooting, all of which was calculated to attract attention. There was much flame and smoke, which could be seen for a long distance. Notwithstanding this the railway company did not provide any engine in the Sixth street yards that evening with which to handle the freight cars, and, in case of emergency, to remove them or shift them to avoid the several fires which were in progress near by, and this though some of the houses in which colored people resided, and which were that evening destroyed by fire, stood within a few feet of the tracks of the railroad, on which loaded freight cars were stored. Stranger still is the fact that no sufficient guard was placed in these yards on that wild night to assist in protecting the property of the railroad company and freight in its charge, and no arrangements even were made by the railway officials to keep informed of the progress of the fires towards the freight yards. In fact, the master of the yards did not call up the conductor in charge of a yard engine to ask that he go to the rescue of the burning freight property until about 8 o'clock, or perhaps a little later. In other words, the fire had been in progress in the district of the freight yards for three hours or more before the railroad company even took the precaution to ask one of its yard crews to take an engine to the Sixth street freight-yard and to try to save the burning freight. After this request was made, it took some twenty or thirty minutes for the engine to go from the place it was situated to the place of the fire. There is much evidence,—in fact, it is practically conceded,—that if an engine had been placed by the railroad company in the Sixth street yards when the fires first originated in that district, the consignment of freight which was lost, and of which complaint is now made, would have been saved. This was the plain duty of the railroad company. Common prudence, it seems, would have suggested the propriety of keeping a lookout where a mob, bent on destruction by fire, was operating in close proximity to valuable property of which the railroad company was the trustee and insurer. These facts, it seems to us, fully warranted the jury in concluding that the railroad company was guilty of negligence, and the verdict finds abundant support in the facts.

Judgment affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of carrier for loss of, or damage to, freight by acts of mob or strikers.

This annotation does not include cases of loss or damage to freight from delay caused by the refusal of strikers to work, or by the interference of a mob or party of strikers with the movement of the cars.

The common-law rule, as stated in 4 R. C. L. 696, is that a carrier is liable for all loss or damage to freight, except such as is caused by the act of God or the public enemy.

Of course, loss or damage due to acts of a mob or a body of strikers cannot be attributed to an act of God, since, as stated in 4 R. C. L. 709, practically all the definitions of an act of God agree in requiring the entire exclusion of human agency from the cause of the damage or loss.

And that a mob is not a public enemy within the rule exempting carriers from liability for loss or damage caused by public enemies is held in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Nevill (1895) 60 Ark. 375, 28 L.R.A. 80, 46 Am. St. Rep. 208, 30 S. W. 425; Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Chicago (1909) 242 Ill. 178, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 358, 134 Am. St. Rep. 316, 89 N. E. 1022; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hollowell (1879) 65 Ind. 188, 32 Am. Rep. 63; Lewis v. Ludwick (1869) 6 Coldw. (Tenn.) 368, 98 Am. Dec. 454; and Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Levi (1889) — Tex. —, 12 S. W. 677.

Thus, a railroad company is liable for the destruction of freight by the act of a mob of negroes, which the civil authorities were unable to control, in setting fire at night to the railroad station house in which the freight had been deposited on its arrival. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Nevill (Ark.) supra.

Carriers have generally sought to relieve themselves from this common-law liability by stipulations in the bill of lading, but even such stipulations fail to relieve them from liability, where the loss or damage is caused by their own negligence; since, according to the great weight of authority, a carrier cannot contract against its own negligence.

Thus, a stipulation in a bill of lading to the effect that the railroad company should not be liable for any loss or damage to freight resulting from riots or consequences thereof was held in the reported case (SOUTHERN R. CO. v. JOHN T. BARBEE & Co. ante, 257) not to relieve the railroad from liability for freight in its cars, destroyed by fire communicated to the cars from buildings in the vicinity of its yard, which had been fired by a mob in a race riot, where the railroad company, for hours, knew that a riot was in progress, and that the fires were being started, and had ample time, between the starting of the fire and the destruction of the freight thereby, by the exercise of ordinary care, to have removed it from the danger zone to a place of safety.

But in Hall v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1880) 1 Fed. 226, 14 Phila. 414, 8 W. N. C. 269, Fed. Cas. No. 12,769, a railroad company was held to be released from liability for goods burned by a lawless mob, by a provision in the bill of lading exempting the carrier from liability for loss or damage by fire or other casualty, where the railroad company was not guilty of any negligence in connection with the burning of such goods. The court held that the evidence showed that the railroad company was not negligent, it appearing that a mob took possession of the railroad property, that the railroad called upon the sheriff for assistance, and that he obtained troops from the governor of the state, that they came into contact with the mob, but failed to retake the railroad property therefrom, and that immediately thereafter the mob set fire to the cars containing the freight in question.

And in Wertheimer v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1880) 17 Blatchf. 421, 1 Fed. 232, involving the destruction of freight by the same mob, and in the same manner, as in the preceding case, the same railroad company was held not liable under a bill of lading containing the condition that the railroad company should not be responsible for loss or damage by fire unless it could be shown that such damage or loss occurred through its negligence. The effect of this condition was held to impose upon the shipper the burden of proving that the loss of the goods by fire arose from the negligence of the railroad company; but the court said that, irrespective of any question concerning the burden of proof, the railroad company could not be said to have been guilty of negligence, where it appeared that the fire by which the goods were destroyed was the act of a mob engaged in a struggle with the military authorities of the state, without anything to show that the railroad company was bound, from the circumstances, to anticipate such a result.

In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Coutourie (1904) 68 C. C. A. 177, 135 Fed. 465, an action to recover for cotton burned while stored on a railroad company's wharf, and in its cars, where the bill of lading exempted it from liability for destruction by fire, testimony in reference to labor riots was held admissible as bearing upon the negligence of the railroad company in failing to increase the number of its watchmen after a prior fire on the wharf.

And in Lang v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1893) 154 Pa. 342, 20 L.R.A. 360, 35 Am. St. Rep. 846, 26 Atl. 370, the railroad company was held liable, although the bill of lading provided that the company should not be liable for loss or damage by causes beyond its reasonable control, by a riot, or for any other reason not directly traceable to the negligence of its servants, where it appeared that a train containing several carloads of whisky was overtaken by the Johnstown flood, and owing to the destruction of the track was unable to proceed, and the dangerous element in the community began to break open the cars with axes, the trainmen making no effort to protect the train, and leaving the neighborhood; that a volunteer guard of citizens then protected the train during the night and part of the following day, and, when no longer able to protect the property, destroyed the remainder of the whisky to prevent it from falling into the hands of the mob.

WESTERN PATTERN & MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Respt.,

V.

AMERICAN METAL SHOE COMPANY, Appt.

Wisconsin Supreme Court — December 13, 1921.

Corporation — resignation of officer — effect.

1. The resignation of an officer of a private corporation terminates the office and a vacancy is at once created; and service of process on such resigned officer is not service on the corporation, notwithstanding a by-law providing the directors of said corporation shall hold office until their successors are duly elected.

Judgment — absence of service — nullity.

2. A judgment rendered in the absence of service of process on the defendant should be vacated, set aside, and expunged from the record, and a motion made for that purpose need not be coupled with a showing that the defendant had a meritorious defense to the cause of action set forth in the complaint.

Headnotes by OWEN, J.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Municipal Court for Racine County (Palmer, J.) denying a motion to vacate and set aside a judgment in an action upon a contract for the recovery of a certain sum of money. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Eugene Wright Lawton, for appellant:

Elholm was not a person who had any connection with the defendant company, as required by the statute for service. Therefore, service on him was not service upon the company.

Messrs. Gittings & Moyle, for respondent:

A meritorious defense must be shown by defendant.

The burden of proof is on defendant to show from the record that the judgment from which it desires relief is not only irregular or void, but also that it is unjust and inequitable.

J. V. Farwell Co. v. Hilbert, 91 Wis. 437, 30 L.R.A. 235, 65 N. W. 172.

Owen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff and defendant are Wisconsin corporations. Service of the summons in this action upon the defendant was attempted by delivering to and leaving a copy thereof with one M. Elholm, on the 12th day of May, 1920, who, at the time of such delivery, was supposed to be the secretary of the defendant corporation. The defendant made default, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff upon the cause of action set forth in its complaint. Thereafter the defendant procured an order requiring plaintiff to show cause why such judgment should not be set aside for the reason that the court had never obtained jurisdiction of the defendant, which said order to show cause was based upon an affidavit of the president of the defendant corporation to the effect that, at the time of such attempted service, the said M. Elholm was not the secretary of the said defendant corporation, nor was he any other officer thereof upon whom service of summons upon said corporation might have been made; that he was secretary of said defendant corporation prior to the 1st day of October, 1919, but on said latter date he resigned said office, in writing and that he likewise on said date resigned his office as a member of the board of directors of said company. In response to such order to show cause there was filed an affidavit, sworn to by Miller Patterson, president of plaintiff corporation, in which he deposed that he was informed and verily believed that one M. Elholm was secretary and director of the defendant prior to the 1st day of October, 1919; that he had no knowledge of his resigning his office; and that, as he is informed and believes, no successor was either elected or qualified in his place, either as director or secretary.

There is no denial of the fact that Elholm did resign as secretary of the company on the 31st day of October, 1919, and we regard it as a verity in the case that at the time of the attempted service, May 12, 1920, he was not an officer of the corporation, unless, as contended in this court by respondent, he continued in office until his successor was elected and qualified. Patterson deposes that, as "he is informed and verily believes, the by-laws of the American Metal Shoe Company provide that the directors of said corporation shall hold office until their successors are duly elected." It has been held by this court that such a provision in the by-law of a corporation does not prevent the existence of a vacancy in an office of a private corporation upon the filing of a resignation by one who is then an incumbent of such office. The resignation terminates the office, and a vacancy is at once created. McNaughton's Will, 138 Wis. 179, 208, 118 N. W. 997, 120 N. W. 288. It accordingly follows that no summons was ever served upon the defendant, and that the trial court never acquired jurisdiction to render judgment in the action.

It is contended, however, that the judgment rendered should not be vacated or set aside because the motion to that end was not coupled with a showing that the defendant had a meritorious defense to the cause of action set forth in the complaint. While the affidavit filed in support of the order to show cause avers "that the said American Metal Shoe Company has a good and sufficient defense to the cause of action as claimed by the plaintiff in the above-entitled cause," it cannot be said to disclose a meritorious defense under the requirements of our practice.

There seems to be respectable authority in support of the proposition that, even though a judgment be rendered against a defendant in the absence of any service upon him, yet a court of equity will not set such judgment aside, in the absence of a showing that the defendant has a defense upon the merits to the cause of action. In 15 R. C. L. 737, it is stated that a large preponderance of the authorities hold that, notwithstanding an alleged want of service or notice, a court of equity will not interfere to set aside a judgment until it appears that the result upon a subsequent trial will be other than that already reached; or, in other words, that there was a meritorious defense to the action. A note to the case of Brandt v. Little, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 213, collates a number of decisions announcing such doctrine.

While this rule has been applied in this state in actions brought to set aside judgments rendered by justices of the peace where jurisdiction was lost by reason of irregularities (Stokes v. Knarr, 11 Wis. 389; Thomas v. West, 59 Wis. 103, 17 N. W. 684), it has never been applied in cases where a judgment was rendered in the absence of any service upon the defendant.

The idea that a court will not relieve against a judgment rendered in proceedings of which the defendant had no notice is obnoxious to our notions of fundamental justice, even though

he have no defense upon the merits. The Constitution of the United States provides that property shall not be taken without due process of law, and to seize a man's property by virtue of a judgment rendered by a court which never acquired any jurisdiction of the judgment debtor, in an action of which he had no notice and was never accorded an opportunity to be heard in defense thereof, would seem to be nothing less than a taking of property without due process of law. It may be that he had no defense to the action, but the fundamental law of the land secures to him the right to be heard in his defense; and, as this right was deemed sufficiently sacred to be protected by constitutional provision, any action of a court in violation of such right is without vestige or shadow of authority, and its pronouncement under such circumstances is not a judicial pronouncement in any sense of the word. However, it is not necessary for us to discuss at length these fundamental principles which we think demonstrate the unsoundness of the doctrine that a court of equity will not set aside a judgment obtained under such circumstances, as this court has spoken definitely and often upon the very question here presented. It is firmly established in this jurisdiction that where a motion is made in the same case to set aside a judgment void for want of service upon the defendant, no showing in the nature of a meritorious defense is necessary. The judgment is held absolutely void, and the court should expunge it from the record whenever its attention is called to the fact that jurisdiction of the defendant was not acquired, by reason of a lack of service of process upon him. Carr v. Commercial Bank, 16 Wis. 50; Wendel v. Durbin, 26 Wis. 390; Godfrey v. Wright, 151 Wis. 372, 139 N. W. 193. A perusal of those cases with Rape v. Heaton, 9 Wis. 328, 76 Am. Dec. 269, and Pollard v. Wegener, 13 Wis. 569, fully reveals the attitude of this court upon the question of enforcing a judgment rendered in the absence of service of process. Such a judgment has always been regarded as a mere nullity. It is not a judgment. It is the mere image of a judgment. Its enforcement constitutes a taking of property without due process of law, and will not be tolerated. It was the duty of the trial court to expunge the judgment from the record.

Order appealed from reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to vacate the judgment.

Siebecker, Ch. J., took no part.

ANNOTATION.

When resignation of officer of private corporation becomes effective.

General rule.

As a general rule, in the absence of statutory restrictions or limitations in the by-laws of a corporation, the resignation of a corporate officer, to take effect immediately, becomes complete on its delivery to the proper authority. No action on the part of the corporation is essential, and acceptance thereof by the board of directors or other governing body is not required. Fearing v. Glenn (1896) 19 C. C. A. 388, 33 U. S. App. 424, 73 Fed. 116; International Bank v. Faber (1898) 30 C. C. A. 178, 57 U. S. App. 153, 86 Fed. 443, writ of certiorari denied in (1899) 172 U. S. 648, 43 L. ed. 1182, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 885; Chandler v. Hoag (1874) 2 Hun (N. Y.) 613, affirmed in (1875) 63 N. Y. 624; Blake v. Wheeler (1879) 18 Hun (N. Y.) 496, affirmed on other grounds in (1880) 80 N. Y. 128; *Smith v. (1890) 59 L. J. Ch. N. S. (Eng.) 734, 63 L. T. N. S. 239, 2 Megone, 307.

In Zeltner v. Zeltner Brewing Co. (1903) 174 N. Y. 247, 95 Am. St. Rep. 574, 66 N. E. 810, the court said: "When we come to consider the general right of officers and directors of corporations to resign, . . . we may admit . . . that, as a general rule, such officers may resign at will; and that the validity of such resignations does not depend upon their formal acceptance."

So, a trustee of a corporation may resign and relieve himself from liabilities thereafter incurred by the corporation, although his resignation is not acted on by the board of trustees or entered in the corporate books. Blake v. Wheeler (1879) 18 Hun (N. Y.) 496, affirmed on other grounds in (1880) 80 N. Y. 128. See, to the same effect, Chandler v. Hoag (1874) 2 Hun (N. Y.) 613, affirmed in (1875) 63 N. Y. 624.

In Manhattan Co. v. Kaldenberg (1900) 165 N. Y. 1, 58 N. E. 790, the court said: "There was evidence that Faber tendered his resignation in a letter which he delivered to the president about November 1, 1891. Assuming this to have been done, Faber's resignation was complete when it was tendered. It was not necessary for him to do more. . . . Nor was the validity of his resignation dependent upon its acceptance by the directors." See also International Bank v. Faber (1898) 30 C. C. A. 178, 57 U. S. App. 153, 86 Fed. 443.

In McNaughton's Will (1909) 138 Wis. 179, 118 N. W. 997, 120 N. W. 288, the court, in disposing of the contention that an officer of a corporation, where the organic law provides that his term of office shall continue until his successor is elected and qualified, remains an officer until such time, notwithstanding his resignation, stated its opinion as follows: "That is not the law. On the contrary, . . . even in case the corporate charter provides that the officer shall hold till his successor is elected and qualified, or appointed and qualified, he, nevertheless, by resignation, without any acceptance, unless acceptance is specially required by such charter, vacates the office for all general purposes."

It has been held that service of process on a director who has sent in his resignation does not bind the corporation, though the resignation has not been formally accepted, and his withdrawal reduces the number of directors below the minimum allowed by law, if there is no provision in the by-laws to the effect that an officer or director shall continue to hold office until his successor is elected and qualifies. Wilson v. Brentwood Hotel Co. (1896) 16 Misc. 48, 37 N. Y. Supp. 655. And in the reported case (WESTERN PATTERN & MFG. CO. v. AMERICAN METAL SHOE CO. ante, 264) it is held that, despite the provisions of a by-law to the effect that the directors of the corporation shall hold office until their successors are elected, the service of process on an officer who has filed his resignation will not bind the corporation.

At common law it is sufficient for a corporate officer to deliver his written resignation to the president of the corporation, and thereafter refrain from acting as an officer. Goodrich Rubber Co. v. Helena Motor Car Co. (1917) 53 Mont. 526, 165 Pac. 454.

The resignation involved in Briggs v. Spaulding (1891) 141 U. S. 132, 35 L. ed. 662, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 924, was orally tendered to the president, and inferentially accepted by the performance of certain acts in recognition thereof. The court said: "While the . . . law is silent as to the time when and the method by which the office of director may be resigned, we think that leaves it as at common law, and that this resignation was effective."

In England it has been held that as a director of a corporation is entitled to relinquish his office at any time he sees fit, by proper notice to the company, his resignation depends on his notice, and is not dependent on any acceptance by the company, for the reason that the latter is not in a position to refuse acceptance. Glossop v. Glossop [1907] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 370, 76 L. J. Ch. N. S. 610, 97 L. T. N. S. 372, 14 Manson, 246, 51 Sol. Jo. 606. In the case of Re Gloucester, A. & S. W. R. Co. (1853) 4 De G. M. & G. 769, 43 Eng. Reprint, 708, the court said: "It may not be important to consider whether the resignation or retirement of Mr. Maitland, the elder, was complete and effectual or not. I am of opinion, however, that it was not provisional nor conditional, was authorized by the terms of the constitution of the association in question, and was complete and effectual, whether accepted or not accepted by any other person or body of persons, inasmuch as it was duly communicated to the persons to whom, and in the time and manner in which, it was necessary or right that it should be communicated. In Municipal Freehold Land Co. v. Pollington (1890) 59 L. J. Ch. N. S. (Eng.) 734, 63 L. T. N. S. 238, 2 Megone, 307, on the other hand, the resignation of a director was held to be ineffective until accepted by the company at a general meeting.

Limitations on rule.

Where the by-laws provide that a corporate officer shall continue to hold office until the election of his successor, the resignation of such an officer does not take effect until the election of his successor. Timolat v. S. J. Held Co. (1896) 17 Misc. 556, 40 N. Y. Supp. 962, wherein the court said: "There is no question here of the personal liability of the resigning director to the creditors of the company, but only a question between such creditors and the company, under its own by-laws, and for its own neglect to terminate its official relations with the director by electing his successor. When, by its by-law, it declares that he shall serve until his successor is chosen, it constitutes him its officer until that event, with the same effect, so far as the corporation is concerned, as if he were serving in the term for which he was elected, and had not resigned. It was in the power of the company to terminate his agency at any time by electing a successor, and if it chose rather to continue such agency, he must be treated, in actions against the company, as its duly constituted officer." See also Colorado Debenture

Corp. v. Lombard Invest. Co. (1903) 66 Kan. 251, 97 Am. St. Rep. 373, 71 Pac. 584. Compare the reported case (WESTERN PATTERN & MFG. Co. v. AMERICAN METAL SHOE Co. ante, 264).

So, under such a by-law in a case wherein it appeared that, prior to the date of service of process on a corporate officer, he tendered his resignation to the proper authorities without any action being taken thereon, thereafter continuing in control of the affairs of the corporation, attending meetings of the board of directors, and being recognized by them as such, and no knowledge of such tender of resignation was shown on the part of those in whose behalf process was served, it was held that the corporation could not successfully claim a valid resignation on the part of such officer. Venner v. Denver Union Water Co. (1907) 40 Colo. 212, 122 Am. St. Rep. 1036, 90 Pac. 623, wherein the court said: "Whether or not a director or other officer of a corporation has resigned is a question of fact, to be determined from the circumstances of each case, and which, to some extent, it appears may depend upon the parties who raise the question. In the present case Mr. Sullivan tendered his resignation to the proper authorities, but it was never acted upon. He continued in the control of the affairs of the company the same as though his resignation had never been offered. He attended meetings of the board, acted as a director, and was recognized by his codirectors, including Mr. Venner, in that capacity. It does not appear that the parties who commenced the foreclosure suits in which service of summons was had upon Mr. Sullivan, as president or vice president, of the American Water Works Company, had any knowledge that he had ever tendered his resignation to the company. In such circumstances the company will not be permitted to claim that he had resigned prior to the service of process upon him, by merely tendering his resignation. Further, the articles of incorporation . . . provide that its directors shall hold office until their successors are elected. This is not a case where a director has endeavored to resign, and thereafter taken no part in the management or control of its affairs. Neither does it present a question affecting the liability of Mr. Sullivan, but is only one between parties and the corporation, wherein the latter now seeks to avoid service of summons upon one whom it treated as an official, and who acted as such after he tendered his resignation. By its own failure to observe the provision of its articles of incorporation it has neglected to terminate the official relations of Mr. Sullivan. The company had the power to terminate his relations to it as an official at any time by electing his successor, and where it chose to continue that relationship by failing to act in accordance with the provisions of its articles of incorporation, he must be treated in actions against the company, in so far as service of process is concerned, as its duly constituted agent."

In case the resignation of a corporate officer is offered, to take effect on acceptance, it is essential that action shall be taken thereon, and a formal acceptance recorded. Thus, in Lincoln Court Realty Co. v. Kentucky Title Sav. Bank & T. Co. (1916) 169 Ky. 840, 185 S. W. 156, the attempted resignation of the officers and directors of a corporation by notice addressed to themselves was held to be ineffectual without acceptance, the court saying: "That the attempted resignation of Riehm, Brock, and Dundon, as officers and directors of the defendant, was of no effect whatever, is perfectly apparent. By our statutes (§ 551) the directors of such corporations continue such 'until their successors are respectively elected and qualified.' The only corporate authority who had a right to act upon these alleged resignations was the board of directors which elected them in the first instance. The three resigners constituted that board, and the communication by which they attempted to resign was, in law, one addressed to themselves; but it seems that, as directors, they were not so anxious to make their resignations effectual by acceptance, as they were as individuals to tender them. At any rate, there was no record made in the books of the corporation as to the tendering of their resignations; nor was there ever any acceptance of them recorded on the corporation books or otherwise. Until there is such an acceptance, they continued to remain directors."

So, in Seal of Gold Min. Co. v. Slater (1911) 161 Cal. 621, 120 Pac. 15, it was held that a director who tendered his resignation, to take effect on acceptance, was entitled to participate in meetings of the board until his resignation was accepted. L. F. C.

Set-off — judgment against claim for invasion of homestead.

1. B. recovered a judgment against H. and another. Execution issued upon such judgment and was levied upon certain personalty and certain realty of H. The property so levied upon was claimed by H. as exempt from seizure and sale for the purpose of satisfying such judgment upon the ground that it was the homestead of H., and exempt from forced sale under the Constitution and laws of this state. Upon an application to enjoin the sale, the circuit judge held such property not to be exempt; but upon appeal to this court this order was reversed and the property held to be exempt from forced sale for the satisfaction of such judgment. Thereafter defendant in execution sued the plaintiff in execution to recover certain damages alleged to have been sustained because of the wrongful seizure and sale of such property. In this suit the original judgment was attempted to be set off against plaintiff's claim. Held, that such judgment is not available as a set-off against plaintiff's claim for damages to her exempt property, and that the plea attempting to set off such judgment against plaintiff's claim is not allowable.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Jackson County (Wilson, J.) to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful seizure and sale of plaintiff's exempt property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. D. L. McKinnon, for plaintiff in error:

To be available as a set-off the claim must be "mutual;" that is, growing out of the dealing between the parties, who either expressly or impliedly recognized the claim.

Mr. Paul Carter for defendants in error.

West, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The declaration in this case is, omitting formal parts, as follows:

"The plaintiff, Hannah Hill, sues the defendant First National Bank of Marianna, Florida, a corporation, and H. A. Bowles, as sheriff of Jackson county, Florida, because the said sheriff, by the direction of said bank, levied an attachment and execution in favor of said bank against plaintiff and H. A. Bowles as administrator of John Hill, deceased, on the E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, section 8, township 4, range 10 west, in which plaintiff owned a two-thirds undivided interest, except 1 acre, and sold the same under said execution, both defendants well knowing at the time that she was the head of a family living upon the homestead, that it was exempt from forced sale under the Constitution and laws of Florida, notwithstanding plaintiff claimed said exemption, and duly applied to said sheriff in the manner prescribed by law to have the same exempt as her homestead before said sale. That in consequence of said levies and sales, she failed to make a crop on said land, as she did not know how soon she might be dispossessed, and was put to much expense, trouble, and annoyance to obtain a living for herself and orphan grandchildren that year and the succeeding year, 1917. That she had to employ counsel at great expense to bring suit to have said levies and sales set aside, and to enjoin defendants from making any further sale of said homestead, and said suit was carried to the supreme court of the state at great expense to her before it was finally decided, and she put to much trouble, loss of time, and expense in attending the circuit court and preparing her case, for which she claims \$150 damages.

"(2) And for second count plaintiff, alleging each and every allegation in the first count, says that said defendants levied said attachment and execution upon one cow and calf, of the value of $35, belonging to plaintiff, and sold them, notwithstanding she protested against the sale, claiming them as exempt to her. Therefore she claims $300 damages."

There were pleas of (1) not guilty; (2) no damage to plaintiff as alleged; (3) that the sale of said property was made after a final decree had been entered in the circuit court of Jackson county, in a suit brought by plaintiff to enjoin such sale, in which it was held that the property described in the declaration was not the homestead of the plaintiff, and was not exempt from, but was subject to, sale under the execution levied thereon by the sheriff of the county; (4) denying that defendants knew that plaintiff was, at the time of such sale, the head of a family residing upon said land, and that it was exempt from forced sale under the Constitution and the laws of this state; and (5) denying that plaintiff duly applied to said sheriff, before said sale, to have said land exempt as a homestead.

The sixth plea is as follows: "That at and before the institution of this suit, the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant, the First National Bank of Marianna, Florida, in the sum of $861.32 and interest thereon at 8 per cent from October 20, 1915, in this, to wit: That the circuit court of Jackson county, Florida, on the 20th day of October, 1915, in the suit of First National Bank of Marianna, Florida, v. Hannah Hill et al., duly rendered a judgment against the said defendants, for the sum of $831.15, and also $30.17, costs of court, and said judgment is of record in Minute Book S; page 42, Minutes of the Circuit Court of Jackson County, Florida, and is wholly unpaid and unsatisfied, and defendants here offer to set off so much of said judgment against plaintiff's claim as may be necessary to cover the same."

The seventh plea is the same in substance as the sixth, pleading the same judgment as a set-off in slightly different form.

Issue was joined on the first and second pleas. All the other pleas were demurred to. The demurrer was sustained as to the third, fourth, and fifth, but overruled as to the sixth and seventh. There was a replication to the sixth and seventh pleas, to which a demurrer was sustained, and the case proceeded to trial.

At the conclusion of the testimony, the court instructed the jury that "the Constitution of the state of Florida exempts from levy and sale a homestead of 160 acres of land without the limits of an incorporated town or city to any head of a family residing in the state. I therefore instruct you that if the sheriff levied the execution on the homestead of the plaintiff, as alleged in the declaration, and sold it under execution in favor of the First National Bank of Marianna, a corporation, it was a trespass, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover all the damages she sustained in consequence of said levy and sale, and also for the value of the cow and calf, if you find from the evidence that the sheriff levied upon and sold them under said execution. You will ascertain from the evidence the amount of damages which the plaintiff sustained, including any attorneys' fees she has paid or contracted to pay in the injunction suit, allowing interest on the amount, from the commencement of this suit. You will then deduct this amount from the judgment of the First National Bank of Marianna, pleaded as a set-off, and render a verdict in favor of said bank for the balance due upon said judgment."

There was a verdict accordingly, and judgment pursuant thereto, by which it was adjudged that plaintiff take nothing by this action, and that the defendants have and recover from her their costs expended therein. The case is here upon writ of error for review. For convenience we shall in this opinion refer to the parties as plaintiff and defendants.

Several rulings of the trial court are assigned as error, but the principal contentions are that, first, a judgment is not a proper subject of set-off in any case; and, second, that a debt or demand arising under contract is not available as a set-off in an action of tort. There is, however, presented by this record a question more important than either of these. It goes to the right of the defendants to set off the judgment described in defendants' sixth and seventh pleas against the claim for damages described in plaintiff's declaration, and is, we think, the decisive question in the case. If defendants' judgment is not available in any event as a set-off against plaintiff's claim as described in her declaration for damages, a decision of the two questions stated becomes unnecessary.

By § 1 of article 10 it is ordained that "a homestead to the extent of 160 acres of land, or the half of 1 acre within the limits of any incorporated city or town, owned by the head of a family residing in this state, together with one thousand dollars' worth of personal property, and the improvements on the real estate, shall be exempt from forced sale under process of any court, and the real estate shall not be alienable without the joint consent of husband and wife, when that relation exists, . . . and no judgment or decree or execution shall be a lien upon exempted property except as provided in this article."

visions relating to homestead exemptions are liberally construed in the interest of the family home. Milton v. Milton, 63 Fla. 533, 58 So. 718; 13 R. C. L. 547.

The property described in the declaration has been held by this court to be the homestead of the plaintiff, and "exempt from forced sale." Hill v. First Nat. Bank, 73 Fla. 1092, 75 So. 614.

It is a matter of record and was also stated in the oral argument in this case that the judgment offered to be set off against plaintiff's claim is the identical judgment which this court, reversing the court below, had held was not a lien upon the property described in the declaration, and from which judgment and the execution issued thereon such property was exempt from sale. So that the question is whether this judgment may be available as a set-off in a suit by plaintiff against the defendant bank and the sheriff of the county to recover damages sustained by her because of the unlawful levy upon and sale of her homestead under such judgment. Such homestead itself was exempt from forced sale, and plaintiff could not be lawfully deprived of its use and enjoyment by any coercive process. The actual damage sustained by her because of the injury suffered as a result of the trespass by defendants upon the exempt real property and the conversion by them of the exempt personality, and the judgment recovered therefor, partake of the nature of the homestead property and are also exempt. Thompson, Homestead & Exemptions, § 748; Millington v. Laurer, 89 Iowa, 322, 48 Am. St. Rep. 385, 56 N. W. 533; Reynolds v. Haines, 83 Iowa, 342, 13 L.R.A. 719, 32 Am. St. Rep. 311, 49 N. W. 851; Kaiser v. Seaton, 62 Iowa, 463, 17 N. W. 664; Ellis v. Pratt City, 111 Ala. 629, 33 L.R.A. 264, 56 Am. St. Rep. 76, 20 So. 649.

In the case of Carter v. Carter, 20 Fla. 558, 51 Am. Rep. 618, it was held that, when property which may be claimed as exempt from the satisfaction of debts has been sold or converted into money by an administrator, the heirs entitled to such property may claim its value out of funds in the hands of the administrators. By analogy it would seem to follow necessarily that, where injury has been sustained because of an unlawful seizure and sale of exempt property, the amount recovered as compensation for such injury within the constitutional limit would likewise be held exempt. The fallacy in the court's holding was due to a failure to recognize this principle. By such holding defendants were permitted in a measure to do indirectly what they were forbidden to do directly. The homestead of plaintiff is adjudged to "be exempt from forced sale under process of any court," and yet, under the charge of the court in this case, the amount of damage sustained by her because of an unauthorized "forced sale" of such exempt property, and for which damage, under the charge of the court, she was entitled to recover, is taken from her and given to defendants as a part payment on a judgment which the court had adjudged could not be enforced against such property.

The homestead right is not limited to a mere holding of the legal title to the exempt property "from forced sale;" it contemplates and includes the beneficial, peaceful, and uninterrupted use and enjoyment of such property. Such right is superior to the claims of creditors. The policy of the law conferring it is to preserve the home for the family even at the sacrifice of just demands, and to protect the family from destitution and want.

"The whole theory of the law with relation to homesteads is based upon the idea that, as a matter of public policy, for the promotion of the prosperity of the state, and to render independent and above want each citizen of the government, it is proper he should have a home where his family may be sheltered, and live beyond the reach of financial misfortune and the demands of creditors, who have given credit under such a law." 13 R. C. L. 543; Carter v. Carter, supra.

The rights of the wife and family in homestead real estate are such that it "cannot be alienated without the joint consent of husband and wife when that relation exists" (§ 1, art. 10, Constitution of Florida), and an attempted conveyance in which there is not such joinder when such relation exists is ineffectual to convey any title to such property. Thomas v. Craft, 55 Fla. 842, 46 So. 594, 15 Ann. Cas. 1118. The benefits of the Homestead Exemption Law may not be waived by a householder in such a way as to deprive his family of its protection. Carter v. Carter, supra. Neither does the death of such householder strip property so impressed of its character as a homestead. It descends to his heirs exempt from liability for the indebtedness of the head of the family (§ 2, art. 10, Constitution of Florida), and the right of the heirs to its exemption after it passess to them is not dependent upon a use by them of such property as a homestead. Miller v. Finegan, 26 Fla. 29, 6 L.R.A. 813, 7 So. 140; Raulerson v. Peeples, 77 Fla. 207, 81 So. 271.

To allow a defendant the benefits of a plea of set-off in an action brought against him to recover the amount of damage sustained because of his wrongful invasion of plaintiff's homestead rights would, if defendant's plea prevailed, result in the subjection by indirect methods of exempt property to the payment of defendant's demands against plaintiff, although its subjection thereto directly is not permitted. The soundness of this assertion is susceptible of demonstration. In the case under consideration, the exempt personal property of plaintiff alleged to have been levied upon and sold by defendants under the judgment in their favor against plaintiff is one cow and calf. This cow and calf were sold and were never returned to plaintiff. Suppose that, instead of one cow and calf taken, there had been taken twenty cows of the aggregate value of $400, and that such cows had been sold and not returned to plaintiff, just as the one cow and calf were. Plaintiff clearly would have been entitled to recover the value of such cows because of the unwarranted conversion of them, the court having previously held them exempt from forced sale because of their character as homestead property. But, by way of set-off, defendants plead the very judgment that had been held unenforceable against such property, and, upon a trial, the court directs a verdict in favor of plaintiff, but directs further that the amount of such verdict shall be credited on the judgment of the defendant bank against plaintiff which was pleaded as a set-off against plaintiff's claim. It is perfectly clear that such procedure operates to defeat entirely the whole purpose of the Exemption Law by subjecting exempt property to the payment of the debts of the owner, and deprives him of a right secured by organic law. So far as the defendant bank is concerned, it amounts in the end to the same thing as permitting it to proceed directly against such property in the satisfaction of its judgment, and gives to it all the benefits of its unlawful forced sale of plaintiff's exempt homestead property.

It may be said that the Constitution protects homestead property from a "forced sale" only, and that the plea of set-off in this case does not amount to a "forced sale" of plaintiff's exempt property. But such contention would be out of harmony with what the courts almost universally hold to be the object and policy of exemption laws. It ignores the rule of liberal construction to which this court and many other courts are committed. In this case it would give to defendants the fruits of a "forced sale," although such sale was illegal and therefore wrongful. It would permit defendants to do indirectly what they are enjoined from doing directly, and thereby defeat the beneficial purpose of the law. Judicial sanction should not be given to a construction which leads to this result.

We hold, therefore, that a plea of set-off is not allowable in a case of this kind. To hold otherwise would be to destroy the spirit and efficacy of the Homestead Exemption Laws. In so holding we are in accord with the great weight of authority. Thompson, Home-

Defendants' sixth and seventh pleas set up no defense to the cause of action stated in plaintiff's declaration, and such pleas should have been stricken. There was also error in the court's charge to the jury.

The judgment is reversed.

ANNOTATION.

Availability of judgment under which exempt property has been seized as a set-off or counterclaim against claim based on the wrongful seizure.

In order to accomplish the object of Exemption Laws it is a well-established rule that they should be liberally construed; and by the weight of authority a judgment under which exempt property has been seized is held not available as a set-off or counterclaim in an action based on the wrongful seizure, since the judgment in the action for conversion partakes of the nature of the exempt property, and to allow the judgment under which the property was seized as a set-off would destroy the spirit and efficacy of the Exemption Laws.

In Collett v. Jones (Ky.) supra, where a creditor caused execution to be levied on an exempt horse, it was held that that judgment could not be set off against a judgment recovered by the debtor for the wrongful taking of the horse, and this was held although the debtor was entirely insolvent. The court said: "To the argument that the statute exempted the horse, and not a judgment for his value or for taking him, and that it would be inequitable to allow an insolvent debtor to draw from his creditor the only means of satisfying the debt, it is a sufficient reply that, but for the illegal act of the complainants, the subject to which the privilege of exemption attached would have been unchanged; and they should derive no advantage from their own wrong; and that, highly as the right of the creditor is regarded, it is by the paramount authority of the legislature expressly postponed to the right of the debtor and his family to the services of an only work beast, and cannot, therefore, be preferred by a court of equity, which would violate its own principles by protecting the creditor in an advantage wrongfully obtained against the superior, and, as we may assume, prior equity of the debtor. Whether other creditors may or may not be entitled in equity to subject to their demands the judgment of Collett for the violation of his right in taking this horse is immaterial to the argument in the present case. So far as they are concerned, it might not be essential to the preservation of the authority of the statute to extend its protection to a judgment against another for the violation of a privilege which they have respected, and, at any rate, they can, with a clear conscience, rely upon the difference between the damages for taking the horse and the horse itself, as the conversion would not have been the consequence of their own unlawful act. The argument that, as the statute secures the right in the specific thing, it should only be understood as protecting the remedy for the recovery of that specific thing, and not the remedy for general damages, is more specious than solid. The debtor might not be able to give the security required for obtaining possession of the property in the action of replevin, or the property might be eloiigned before he could do so; and he might, in that action or in detinue, have nothing at last but his judgment for damages. Some of the articles which are exempted by the statute might be consumed before they could be reached by any remedy, and the only redress would be in a judgment for damages. But in truth the statute neither provides nor prefers any particular remedy for its violation. In exempting certain articles or species of property from execution, it prohibits a seizure of them by the creditor, and, expecting obedience, it leaves the consequences of disobedience to be determined by the general principles of the law. Of these principles, one of the most important is that the mandate of a statute shall be enforced, and its authority maintained, by discountenancing every violation of its letter or spirit, and especially by withholding the aid of the law from giving effect to any such violation, and, in many cases, by affording a positive remedy for the redress of the injured party, and to deprive the wrongdoer of the fruits of his wrongful act. If a judgment creditor, seizing and appropriating the privileged property for the satisfaction of his debt, in violation of the statute, is entitled to a decree setting off the damages recovered for the seizure, against his debt, his illegal act is in effect sanctioned and legalized, the authority of the statute in the particular instance is prostrated, and a way opened for its successful violation in every case. Upon this principle the creditor would be absolutely secure in the appropriation of the privileged property to his debt, if he could succeed in placing it beyond the reach of a specific remedy. The statute imposes no peculiar duty or burden on the debtor, and no restriction of his right or remedy, but gives unconditional exemption to certain property. And it is the province of the courts to give to it such effect as not to allow, and much less to encourage, either a violation or evasion of its provision."

And it will be observed that in the reported case (HILL v. FIRST NAT. BANK, ante, 270), where the statute provided that a homestead of a certain extent and value should be exempt from forced sale under process of any court, and that no judgment or decree or execution should be a lien upon exempt property, it was held that the judgment recovered in an action for damages because of the wrongful levy and sale of homestead property partook of the nature of the homestead property and was also exempt, and that the judgment to satisfy which the levy was made was not available as a set-off, as the allowance of it would defeat the object of the exemption statute.

And in Snow v. West (1910) 37 Utah, 528, 110 Pac. 52, where the statute expressly provided that whenever any exempt personal property is levied upon, seized, or sold by virtue of an execution, or wrongfully and unlawfully taken or detained, the damages sustained by the owner thereof by reason of such levy, seizure, or sale, or unlawful detention or taking, and any judgment recovered therefor, shall be exempt from execution, it was held that the judgment under which exempt property was taken on execution could not be set off against a judgment recovered in an action for the conversion of the property taken.

And in Ex parte Hunt (1878) 62 Ala. 1, where the defendant in an action of trover on account of exempt property sought to have the judgment against him reduced by setting off a judgment against the plaintiff, the right of set-off was denied notwithstanding a provision of the statute authorized the court in which judgments were rendered to set off one against the other. It is not entirely clear in this case whether the judgment sought to be set off was that under which the exempt property was taken.

And in Below v. Robbins (1890) 76 Wis. 600, 8 L.R.A. 467, 20 Am. St. Rep. 89, 45 N. W. 416, it was held that a judgment for the conversion of exempt property could not be discharged by the defendant paying that amount to the sheriff, to be applied on a judgment against the plaintiff for the payment of which the property was taken, although a statute provided that, after the issuing of execution, any person indebted to the judgment debtor might pay to the sheriff the amount of his debt.

And in Howard v. Tandy (1891) 79 Tex. 450, 15 S. W. 578, where a sheriff claimed the right to apply money in his hands which had been realized upon a judgment rendered for the conversion of exempt property, to the satisfaction of an execution issued on a judgment in favor of the one guilty of the conversion, it was held that this could not be done. The court said: "To permit the money in the hands of the sheriff which had been realized by Tandy from his judgment against Low & Low et al. for damages resulting from their seizure and conversion of his exempt property, to be applied to the satisfaction of an execution held by the same officer against Tandy, and in favor of said Low & Low, as the appellants contend should have been done, would in effect render nugatory the exemption law of our state relating to personal property. It would also, we think, operate practically to make a suit resorted to to secure the benefit and protection of the exemption law by one whose personal property had been illegally seized result in subjecting the proceeds of such suit to execution, thus defeating the very purpose of the suit itself, and indirectly reaching the property which the law says shall not, by judicial process, be made subject to the payment of debts. But it is ingeniously argued that where one whose exempt personal property has been, as in this case, unlawfully seized under legal process, if the owner desires to avail himself of the benefit of the exemption made by the law in favor of such property, he should pursue the property itself, and resort to such judicial process as will give him the possession of it. That if, in lieu of this, he sues for damages for its unauthorized seizure and recovers judgment therefor, the satisfaction or payment of this judgment operates as a transfer of the property, and vests the title thereto in the defendant. That, this being a voluntary exchange of exempt property for that which is not, the proceeds are liable to execution. We cannot concur in this view. If this position be correct, it follows, we think, that to secure the benefit and full protection of the exemption law in case of the illegal seizure of exempt personal property will depend rather upon the character of suit brought or the nature of the remedy resorted to for that purpose, and not upon the fact that the property is exempt. The fact that the owner of the property so seized may not be able to give bond and avail himself of the more expeditious remedy of suing out such process as will place him in possession of the property, and that instead thereof he sues for damages and obtains judgment, which is paid, should not operate in the latter case to practically deprive him of the results of the suit and the benefit of the exemption."

And in Moore v. Graham (1902) 29 Tex. Civ. App. 235, 69 S. W. 200, where a suit was brought to recover on a note, and defendant, whose growing cotton was seized under attachment, claimed that the crop was exempt, and sought damages for its conversion, it was held that judgment in reconvention, recovered by the defendant, was properly entered, with a provision that the amount recovered should not be offset by the judgment recovered against him by the plaintiff, since, if the judgment could be offset by a judgment for a debt recovered by the adverse party in the same suit, the exemption laws would be ineffective.

And it has been held that the costs recovered by one in protecting the exempt property, and preventing the setting off of the judgment on which the execution under which the exempt property was taken issued, against the judgment for conversion of the property, takes the character of the exempt property, and that the judgment under which the property was taken cannot be set off against a judgment for such costs. Long v. Collins (1903) 16 S. D. 625, 102 Am. St. Rep. 724, 94 N. W. 700.

But in Mallory v. Norton (1856) 21 Barb. (N. Y.) 424, it was held that where one brought an action to recover the value of exempt property wrongfully seized and sold on execution, and obtained a judgment, that judgment was subject to have set off against it the judgment on which the execution under which the property was taken was issued; the court holding that if the party whose property had been wrongfully taken wished to protect his exemption rights, he should have instituted an action in the nature of replevin for the delivery of his property, and have it restored, and should not have brought suit for its value.

And the same position was taken also in Temple v. Scott (1859) 3 Minn. 419, Gil. 306. It is not entirely clear that the judgment which was set off in this case was the one upon which execution issued. The court, in answering the contention that the set-off should be denied, said: "We think there are two valid reasons why this point is untenable. It is the policy of the law of exemptions to protect every debtor in the possession and enjoyment of certain useful articles deemed necessary for the maintenance and comfort of his family. It is the specific articles which are exempted, and not their value as property. The law does not intend that the insolvent debtor shall reserve from his estate an amount certain, to be disposed of and applied as he may prefer, but designated the character and nature of the specific property as best suited to his circumstances; and where an amount in money is mentioned in the statute, it is simply as a limitation upon the quantity of specified articles of property. In no case are moneys in possession, or credits due the debtor, exempted from seizure upon execution. We had occasion to hold, in the case of Grimes v. Bryne (1858) 2 Minn. 106, Gil. 72, that statutes of this nature are in derogation of the common law, and must be strictly construed, and that nothing can be taken by implication. Adhering to this view, we cannot adopt such an interpretation of the statute as would allow the privilege of exemption to leave the specific property of the debtor, and follow and attach itself to all the various representatives of that property during the course of a litigation concerning it, after it has left the possession of the debtor. If the legislature had designed the value of the exempt articles to enjoy the same privilege as the articles themselves, they should have said so; we cannot infer it. It is not in the power of the creditor to deprive the debtor of his exempt property, because the mere seizure of the articles does not divest their title or destroy their privileged character, and the law furnishes the debtor ample means of reclaiming the specific property, which, if resorted to, will reinstate him in all his rights and compensate him in damages for the attempted infringement of them; but, if the debtor abandons the pursuit of the property itself, and relies upon recovering its value, he cannot claim for the representative of that value, whether it be in money, notes, or a judgment, any higher character than property of the same class is entitled to under ordinary circumstances." EDWARD H. WATSON, Appt.,

v.
GEORGE T. ODELL et al., Respts.

Utah Supreme Court — May 5, 1921.

Broker — right to commission — contract for effecting sale.

1. Actual sale is necessary to entitle a broker to his commission under a contract by which property is to be sold at a specified price for a specified commission, to be paid the broker out of instalments of purchase price as paid, unless the property owner refuses to deal with the customer produced by the broker, who is ready, able, and willing to purchase on the terms stated.

— effect of naming price.

2. The price named in an undertaking by a broker to sell land for a named price for a specified commission is not merely a basis for future negotiations, but the sale must be for the price named to entitle the broker to his commission.

— change of terms by owner — effect.

3. A broker contracting to sell real estate for a specified sum for a stated commission is not entitled to a commission upon producing a customer with whom, after negotiation, the owner enters into a contract of sale on different terms, where it is not shown that he was ready, able, and willing to purchase on the terms stated in the original contract; at least, where the contract between buyer and seller was merely executory, and was never performed, because conditions could not be complied with.

Contract — subject to approval of attorneys — conditional character.

4. A contract for sale of real estate upon certain conditions, which are to be approved by the purchaser's attorneys, is merely tentative and conditional, and does not become binding upon the parties until carried into effect.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Salt Lake County (McCarthy, J.) in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover a broker's commission. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Ball, Musser, & Robertson and Ogden Hiles for appellant.

Messrs. Walton & Walton, Ray & Rawlins, and Charles C. Dey, for respondents:

There was no purchaser, and no disposal or sale of the property plaintiff was authorized to deal with.

Weber, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The averments of the complaint are in substance: (1) That on and prior to June 15, 1915, the Richlands Irrigation Company was a Utah corporation; (2) that the corporation owned certain water rights and real estate, consisting of an option to purchase 20,000 acre-feet of water from the Deseret Irrigation Company, a preference right under the Carey Act of 10,800 acres of land in Millard county, and certain water rights and reservoir sites; (3) that the Richlands

Company represented to plaintiff that it desired to sell its holdings to anyone who would pay $260,000 for them; (4) that defendants employed plaintiff to find purchasers ready, able, and willing to purchase the same, and promised to pay plaintiff $30,000 commission for his services; (5) that plaintiff procured certain persons ready, able, and willing to purchase the property defendants had for sale, and brought the sellers and prospective purchasers together, and that the persons so found by plaintiff "offered to purchase from said Richlands Company the property it desired to sell as aforesaid at the price at which it had proposed to sell to the plaintiff;" (6) that after various conferences between the proposed purchasers and defendants these defendants proposed to the purchasers that, instead of conveying the land and water rights and having the consideration therefor paid to the corporation, it would be better to adopt the scheme proposed in the tri-party agreement of May 20, 1916, attached to the complaint as exhibit A; that as part of the transaction embodied in exhibit A, dated May 20, 1916, "in consideration of the contract which he [plaintiff] had theretofore made with said corporation and of his rights thereunder, and of his services in procuring said proposed purchasers," the individual defendants agreed with plaintiff to pay him $30,000 as a commission; (8) that the proposed purchasers, after making the contract aforesaid, continued at all times ready, able, and willing to comply with the terms of the contract, and to pay defendants the sum of $260,000, but defendants failed, neglected, and refused to procure the Deseret Irrigation Company to transfer and deliver to the Richlands Company, refused to secure the execution by the State Land Board of a Carey-Act contract, failed to cause the Richlands Company to issue bonds, and was therefore unable to comply with the terms of its contract with the purchasers.

Exhibit A, which is attached to the complaint, and is also found in the bill of exceptions, was executed May 20, 1916, with George T. Odell, D. B. Macintosh, and W. C. Alexander as parties of the first part, the Deseret Irrigation Company, a corporation, party of the second part, and Ernest Shields, George T. Franck, Robert P. Franck, and Thomas C. Hickman, of San Diego, California, the proposed purchasers, parties of the third part. The first parties agree: First, to cause a certain agreement between second parties and the Richlands Company, as modified, to be ratified, adopted, and confirmed by resolution of the board of directors of the Richlands Company; second, to secure within thirty days from date the execution by the State Board of Land Commissioners of Utah a Carey-Act contract between the state of Utah and the Richlands Company in form satisfactory to the legal firm of Story & Steigmeyer, of Salt Lake City, substantially in the form of exhibit B, attached to the agreement, and to cause the Richlands Company's board of directors to adopt a resolution authorizing and directing the proper officers of the corporation to execute said Carey-Act contract on its part, "provided first parties shall not be liable for breach of this covenant if they make an effort in good faith to obtain such a contract from the state, and are unable to accomplish such purpose;" third, to cause said Richlands Company to issue its 6 per cent bonds dated July 1, 1916, in the sum of $300,000, payable in ten series, one of which shall mature July 1, 1917, and one annually thereafter, and to secure said bonds by mortgage or deed of trust in favor of Columbia Trust Company, of Salt Lake City, Utah, as trustee, upon all the assets and property of the company; fourth, to cause the Richlands Company to purchase all of its outstanding stock except 5,000 shares of preferred stock and 5 qualifying shares of its directors for the consideration of $80,000, payable: (a) $13,300 cash; (b) the promissory note of the Richlands Company payable to W. C. Alexander as trustee, secured by pledge of bonds of said first series, for $12,600; (c) serial bonds of the Richlands Company to be issued aggregating $49,100. "Second party agrees to extend each payment on contract of January 10, 1916, and the contract referred to is otherwise changed and modified. Third parties agree that within five days after first parties have fully performed the covenants by them to be kept and performed to the satisfaction of said Story & Steigmeyer, they will purchase and pay for in cash, at par, bonds of the Richlands, in the aggregate principal amount of not less than $28,000, of which $25,000 shall be used for making the cash payments to first and second parties."

Attached to the agreement is a form of state land contract, paragraph 16 of which provides that if, within one year from the execution of the contract, the state engineer shall determine and first party (the state of Utah) shall so notify second party (Richlands Company) that a drainage system is necessary for the reclamation of the lands of said segregation, then within the period fixed in the contract for the construction of works second party shall construct such drainage system according to the specifications approved by the state engineer of Utah.

The defendants answered the complaint, and after admitting the matters of inducement, and that certain contracts had been entered into between plaintiff and defendants, denied all other allegations in the complaint.

Upon these issues a trial to the district court, sitting without a jury, resulted in findings against plaintiff's contentions and in favor of defendants, upon which judgment was duly entered, from which plaintiff appeals.

On March 7, 1916, plaintiff and the Richlands Company entered into a written agreement by which all former agreements and extensions thereof between plaintiff and the Richlands Company, relating to the sale of the project, were canceled. It was stipulated that the following commission contract would be recognized "so long as the Richlands Irrigation Company deals with the late J. D. Mollison's associates under extensions granted said Richlands Irrigation Company by the Deseret Irrigation Company." The sale price of the property and assets of the Richlands Company was fixed at $260,000, payable as follows: $25,000 cash; $40,000, with 6 per cent interest, on or before one year from date of first payment; $195,000 in nine equal instalments with interest on whole amount unpaid to be paid annually, commission to Watson (plaintiff herein) to be $30,000, payable $10,000 out of the first cash payment of $25,000, $5,000 out of second payment of $40,000, $5,000 out of each of the third, fourth, and fifth instalments, when paid. It was further provided that in event of the sale of the Richlands project (not including contract for purchase of Deseret water) to the late J. D. Mollison's associates the following price and commission would be recognized: Price, $67,500, with 6 per cent interest on all deferred payments, from which a commission of $12,500 would be paid from the instalments paid, pro rata as made.

On May 10, 1916, the plaintiff and the individual defendants W. C. Alexander, A. L. Hoppaugh, C. L. Cundick, R. E. Mark, D. B. Macintosh, and George T. Odell entered into a written agreement with plaintiff as follows, in substance: "In the event of the closing of the pending sale of the Richlands Irrigation Company's holdings to Mr. Shields and his associates from California, we, the undersigned, stockholders of the Richlands Irrigation Company, hereby agree to pay you as commission the sum of $30,000, said amount to be paid as follows: $10,000 out of the first payment of $25,000, and $5,000 out of each of the following four payments as they are respectively made."

The contract of May 20, 1916, being exhibit A of the complaint, was introduced in evidence by plaintiff. The contract referred to was ratified and approved by the board of directors of the Richlands Company and also by the stockholders of that corporation.

On June 23, 1916, Shields and his associates wrote to Moody, Alexander & Watson, saying they had had a conference with Mr. Steigmeyer and understood that the deal was off, and that, as the deal seemed to have fallen down, they demanded reimbursement for the costs and expenses to which they had been put.

A letter dated July 1, 1916, from George T. Odell, one of the defendants, to the secretary of the State Land Board, was introduced, in which he spoke of two plans that had been before the Land Board regarding the Richlands project. He said he had always been in favor of adopting the first plan, which involved an expenditure of $100,000 or less, while the second plan would mean an expenditure of $300,000 or $400,000. He also said that, inasmuch as the delay beyond the 15th of June has "put our San Diego friends" in a peculiar mood, "which, I judge from our correspondence received, has caused them to waver, and so it may be possible that they will call their side of the deal off, which they have a right to do after the 15th of June," and he suggested that no additional work be commenced or expense incurred until officially advised by the Richlands Company.

On this record, together with other evidence that will be referred to hereinafter, plaintiff demanded judgment for $30,000.

The controlling question in this controversy arises out of the letter of May 10, 1916, signed by the individual defendants, who therein agreed to pay plaintiff $30,000 out of expected payments "in the event of the closing of the pending sale of the Richlands Irrigation Company's holdings to Mr. Shields and his associates from California."

What is meant by "pending sale"? The only price at which plaintiff had been authorized to sell was for $260,000, with a commission of $30,000, as shown by the company's contract of March 7, 1916, with plaintiff. The record is devoid of any proof that as a part of the scheme of May 20 the individual defendants, by their agreement of ten days before, agreed to pay plaintiff $30,000. They agreed to pay $30,000 out of payments when made, and that the money due plaintiff should be paid to a trustee to be named by him. These individual defendants agreed that, at the termination of the pending sale, plaintiff should receive his commission of $30,000 in the amounts and at the times specified in the sale contract for $260,000. Appellant insists that the defendants had the tri-party agreement of May 20th in mind when the contract of May 10th was entered into. That is an inference that is not warranted by the evidence. No proof was produced that any sale was pending except the one plaintiff was authorized to negotiate for $260,000. Nor was there any proof that these individual defendants, or any of them, were then engaged with Shields and his associates in the negotiations which culminated in the agreement of May 20th. Plaintiff himself testifies that he wanted the contract of May 10th for his own protection, and that at the time it was made he thought the sale was for $260,000.

The fact that a sale for a definite amount of money is mentioned in the agreements of March 7th and May 10th indicates that no such cumbersome, conditional, and unenforceable contract as that of May 20th was in contemplation of the individual defendants when they signed the agreement of May 10, 1916. A sale is ordinarily understood to mean a transfer of property for money. Pope, Legal Definitions, 1437. Ultimately the contract of May 10th, if successfully consummated, would eventuate in the re-money by the stockholders, nevertheless it is fanciful and need to speak of the agreement as a sale. Assuming that was employed by the defendants by the contract of May 10th, that, nevertheless was not a general employment. Both by the contract of March 7th and the correlation of May 10th his employment was special, on definite terms,—a definite sale price of $260,000; a definite commission of $26,000, payable pro rata as the price would be paid. No commission was payable except in case of the consummation of a sale, and no commission was payable except as the purchase price. These contracts required more from the plaintiff than merely purchasers able, willing, and ready to buy. The actual payment of the purchase price was required, and only as the purchase price was paid was the commission installment and payable. The complaint plaintiff alleges that he was employed by the Richlands Company to find a purchaser for the Richlands holdings at $260,000,—that both the corporation and the individual defendants agreed to pay him a commission of $26,000. He further pleads that he had persons ready and willing and able to pay $260,000. His allegation as to having procured purchasers or persons able, willing, and ready to buy has no support in the record unless entered in the contract of May 20th, the statement therein contained that the parties of the third party were ready and willing to purchase the lands and other securities of the Richlands Irrigation Company on the terms hereinafter stated," and that as evidence that the parties were able and willing to purchase the Richlands property for $260,000. If plaintiff had furnished persons, and defendants had agreed to deal with them, or had agreed upon some other terms, plaintiff might be entitled to pay for his services. But there is no such evidence.

The contract of March 7th was signed by the corporation alone; that of May 10th by the stockholders; the contract of May 20th by Odell, Macintosh, and Alexander, evidently acting for the company. Under our statute, the plaintiff could recover a commission only by virtue of a contract. He could not recover as upon a quantum meruit. Case v. Ralph, — Utah, —, 188 Pac. 640. Moreover, the $30,000 was to be paid only out of the proceeds of the sale when received. There never were any proceeds of a sale. Whatever plaintiff's rights to payment for services may be, he cannot, under the evidence in this case, recover on his special contract, because he never complied with the terms of that contract.

Nor does the evidence justify the inference that defendants, or any of them, refused to proceed with the contract of March 7th, or that they preferred the tri-party agreement to a $260,000 sale.

Plaintiff must therefore rely upon his special contract, not upon a general employment.

The line of demarcation between the principles applying to the rights of a broker under a special contract and to his rights under a general employment is clear and distinct. As stated in Karr v. Moffett, 105 Kan. 692, 185 Pac. 890: "The ordinary rule that a real estate agent is entitled to his commission when he procures a purchaser who is ready, willing, and able to buy, or when he brings a buyer and seller together who make a bargain on different terms than those theretofore dictated to the agent, does not apply when the agent's commission is governed by a special contract between him and his principal."

In the opinion on rehearing of Karr v. Moffett, 106 Kan. 379, 187 Pac. 683, the supreme court of Kansas said: "Appellee sued for an ordinary real estate dealer's commission, alleging that he had earned it in the usual way. . . . The proof of existence of the special contract was surely an effective way of disproving that the defendants owed the plaintiff for services under an ordinary real estate dealer's contract, such as would entitle the agent to the usual commission when he had brought buyer and seller together, whereby they consummated a sale on terms agreeable to each other, 'when he had been the procuring cause of the sale,' as the stock phrasing in such cases is expressed."

In Murphy v. W. & W. Live Stock Co. 26 Wyo. 455, 189 Pac. 857, it is said: "Where, by the contract of employment, the commission is made dependent upon certain conditions or contingencies, as upon the actual consummation of a sale, or the full payment of the purchase money, or a specified part thereof, such as an agreed first payment, or a net price to the owner, these stipulations will govern, and a fulfilment or performance of the prescribed conditions is generally essential to the right to compensation."

In Lindley v. Fay, 119 Cal. 239, 51 Pac. 333, it is said: "The evidence . . . tends to show an agreement to pay commissions out of the first money received, and no money has ever been received. Under such a contract, the broker is not entitled to compensation when he finds a purchaser ready, willing, and able to purchase on the prescribed terms. There must be a sale and a first payment to entitle him to recover. It is so nominated in the bond."

Under the contract of March 7th the commission was to be paid out of proceeds of sale when received, and unless a payment be made no commission would be due. "It is so nominated in the bond."

In Clark v. Asbury, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 134 S. W. 286, a broker sued upon an express contract. He produced a customer able and willing to buy upon different terms. Holding that the broker must recover, if at all, upon the written contract sued upon, the court said: "In O'Brien v. Gilliland, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 40, 23 S. W. 244, where the contract with the broker was to sell for cash, and he produced a purchaser who was willing to buy the land and pay one half cash and execute vendors' lien notes for the remainder, and the broker had arranged to sell these notes for cash, it was held that this was not a sale in compliance with his contract to sell for cash.

"In Thornton v. Stevenson, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 31 S. W. 233, it was held that, where a broker was to sell property at a certain price, and discussed the sale with a party who afterwards purchased from the owner at a different price, he could not recover his commissions in a suit on his contract. In a suit for commissions on a contract, the recovery must be confined to the contract itself. Edison v. Saxon, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 30 S. W. 958, 959. These are sound propositions of law, and a broker who sues upon a contract, and not upon quantum meruit, cannot recover unless he shows compliance with the contract, or unless he was prevented from carrying out the same by the seller. Owen v. Kuhn, L. & Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 72 S. W. 432. Giving an agent an exclusive agency does not, of itself, preclude the owner from making a sale. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Wright Hardware Co. 61 Tex. Civ. App. 481, 130 S. W. 729; Dole v. Sherwood, 41 Minn. 535, 5 L.R.A. 720, 16 Am. St. Rep. 731, 43 N. W. 569. And if the owner make a sale upon other and different terms from those set forth in his contract with the agent, it cannot be said that the agent has made a sale in compliance with the terms of said contract; and if in such case he is entitled to any compensation, it must be upon quantum meruit, and not upon contract."

See also Murray v. Rickard, 103 Va. 132, 48 S. E. 871; Edwards v. Baker, 39 Cal. App. 755, 180 Pac. 33; Columbia Realty Co. v. Alameda Land Co. 87 Or. 277, 168 Pac. 64, 440; Cremer v. Miller, 56 Minn. 52, 57 N. W. 318; Van Norman v. Fitchette, 100 Minn. 145, 110 N. W. 851.

It is argued that the price fixed in the March contract was only a basis for future negotiations between the owner and the purchasers. If the selling price was only a basis for future negotiations, why would not the $30,000 mentioned as a commission be equally subject to fluctuation? Would a sale for $30,000 entitle the broker to the whole amount as a commission? But the contract is definite as to the sale price. It plainly says the price is $260,000, out of which the stipulated commission of $30,000, not a percentage, shall be paid. Toulmin v. Millar, 3 Times L. R. 836, an English case cited by appellant's counsel, seems to uphold their contention, but, as the facts are not stated in the opinion, what seems to be obiter dictum to the effect that "the mention of a specific sum . . . is merely given as the basis for future negotiations, leaving the actual price to be settled in the course of these negotiations," is not persuasive, and if, on authority of that case, it is claimed that, under such a contract as that between plaintiff and the Richlands Company, the price is merely a basis for future negotiations, we do not agree with the proposition thus advanced.

In George v. Howard, 5 Alberta L. R. 391, 2 West. Week. Rep. 443, 4 D. L. R. 257, the contract was that Howard, the seller, would sell his hotel, except personal effects and stock, for $40,000, and pay George, the agent, 5 per cent commission. The court held that, as a matter of interpretation, "in the light of the surrounding circumstances," the contract was not to pay a commission on $40,000, but on the purchase price," whatever that might ultimately be fixed at, accompanied by a statement that the basis of the negotiation was to be a price of $40,000. Plaintiff secured a purchaser for $34,000. This amount was accepted by the owner, the sale completed, and the broker was held entitled to the 5 per cent commission.

In the case of Little v. Fleishman, 35 Utah, 566, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1182, 101 Pac. 984, is announced the general rule that, when the broker procures a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy for the price and on the terms satisfactory to his employer, he did all that was required of him. The broker's contract in Little v. Fleishman, supra, shows the inapplicability of that case to any question involved in this controversy. The proposition that was submitted by Fleishman, the employer, to Little & Little, the brokers, was this: "You are given exclusive authority to sell for me the following described property," situated in Salt Lake City, "for the sum of $33,000, upon the following terms, to wit: $25,000 cash, bal. thirty days; and in the event of a sale at any price agreed upon, I agree to pay the regular commission, which is 5 per cent, on amounts up to $2,500 and 2½ per cent on amounts in excess thereof. This order good for till 5 P. M. to-day."

Within the stipulated time a customer was procured who was ready, able, and willing to purchase on the terms specified, and who entered into a contract with the owner for the purchase of the property. Though the sale was not consummated, because of the owner's inability to furnish a sufficient abstract of title, the broker was held to be entitled to his commission.

Fritsch v. Hess, 49 Utah, 75, 162 Pac. 70, is also not apposite to any issue in the instant case.

As we understand the argument of plaintiff's counsel, it may be summarized: Defendants in writing employed plaintiff, a real estate broker, to procure a purchaser for the Richlands holdings. Purchasers were produced by plaintiff who were ready, willing, and able to purchase same on terms specified. Defendants entered into a binding written agreement of sale with the purchasers, the terms being satisfactory to all parties concerned, and which contract was substituted for the proposition to sell for $260,000. By the contract of May 20, 1916, the Richlands holdings were actually sold to the purchasers, and defendants are estopped as against plaintiff to say that the transaction was not a sale of the Richlands holdings. The reasoning is logical. The argument is sound, and it would be unassailable were it not founded upon what to us appears to be a misconception of what the ultimate facts are. The employment of plaintiff was not general. He had a special contract with the Richlands Company and with the individual defendants, if he was employed by the latter

at all. That the proposed purchasers produced by plaintiff were ready, able, and willing to buy on the terms of the contract of March 7, 1916, is not established by the evidence. The contract of May 20, 1916, was not, in our opinion, a contract of sale. It was not an enforceable contract. It was executory and conditional. It provided that if, within a year, the state engineer should determine a drainage system to be necessary for the reclamation of the segregated lands, the Richlands Company should construct such drainage system according to the specifications approved by the state engineer. As we understand the evidence, the State Land Board would not enter into a contract waiving the drainage clause. Mr. Alexander, the secretary of the Richlands Company, testified that the State Land Board required the drainage provision in the contract; that after May 20, 1916, Story & Steigmeyer, attorneys for Mr. E. J. Shields and his associates, had advised him that they would not approve a contract containing the drainage features. The tri-party contract contained a clause providing that the Carey-Act contract between the state and the Richlands Company must be "in form satisfactory to the legal firm of Story & Steigmeyer, of Salt Lake City, expressed in writing." How could it be the fault of defendants that a contract satisfactory to Story & Steigmeyer was not obtained from the state when they could not procure a contract with the drainage features omitted, and when Story & Steigmeyer had informed defendants that they would not approve a contract containing the drainage clause? The contract of May 20, 1916, being, therefore, executory and conditional, never having been consummated, not a dollar having been paid thereon, plaintiff was not entitled to the $30,000 commission that was payable to him in the event only of the purchase price being received by the defendants. Being dependent on the approval of the attorneys for the third parties to the contract, the tri-party agreement was only tentative and conditional. It was not binding on the parties and was not carried into effect. The execution of such a contract does not give to the broker a right to compensation. 9 C. J. 603.

In Halprin v. Schachne, 21 Misc. 519, 47 N. Y. Supp. 711, affirmed in 25 Misc. 797, 54 N. Y. Supp. 1103, it is held that, where a broker for the sale of real property brings parties together, but a contract made by them is, by its terms, conditional upon the subsequent approval of the attorney for one of them, who fails to approve, the broker is not entitled to commission. The court says: "This shows that in law this agreement is made upon a condition, and is dependent upon the performance of that condition; and, if the condition is not complied with, no obligation thereunder arises, and no rights thereunder attach. The rule of law is that a broker is entitled to his commission when the minds of the parties have met on every material particular of the transaction. Here, in this case, however, the minds of the parties in regard to the transaction have never met, because the validity of the contract was made dependent upon the condition that the defendant's attorney approve of the contract. The defendant's attorney never approved of the contract. In that event the contract and the whole transaction were to be null and void to the same effect as if no transaction whatsoever had been agreed upon and entered into between the parties. For that reason the condition upon which the broker's commission depended, and which entitled him in law to recover, was never fulfilled, and he is not entitled to recover."

Among other cases supporting the doctrine above announced are these: Hawkins v. Green, 87 W. Va. 116, 104 S. E. 279; Merritt v. Lillyblade, 57 Wash. 159, 106 Pac. 621; Condict v. Cowdrey, 139 N. Y.

273, 34 N. E. 781; Sullivan v. Milliken, 51 C. C. A. 79, 113 Fed. 93; Rhodes v. Wetherill, 236 Pa. 66, 84 Atl. 660; Ward v. Kennedy, 51 Misc. 422, 101 N. Y. Supp. 524; Id. 122 App. Div. 890, 106 N. Y. Supp. 1149; Brown v. Keegan, 32 Colo. 463, 76 Pac. 1056; Cameron v. Ayers, 175 Cal. 662, 166 Pac. 801.

We think the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the trial court were right, and that the record contains no errors justifying a reversal.

The judgment is therefore affirmed, with costs.

ANNOTATION,

Right of real estate broker to commissions under a contract providing for payment of commissions out of purchase price.

I. Introduction.

It is a general rule that, in the absence of a special contract, a real estate broker is entitled to his commission when he has procured a purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase the property upon the terms fixed by the owner. 4 R. C. L. pp. 303, 307, §§ 46, 49. The parties may, by special contract, modify this general rule. The present annotation is concerned with contracts making the commissions payable out of the purchase price; it being the purpose to examine into the broker's right to commission under such a contract. It is apparent that if the sale is completed and the purchase price paid, the broker's right to commission, as distinguished from the time for payment thereof, under an agreement making such commission payable out of the purchase price, stands upon the same footing as under the ordinary contract. It is only when the sale has not been consummated that a distinction exists. There are two general theories upon the broker's right to commissions: one denying such right, the other sustaining it. These two theories appear where the sale has failed because of the owner's default, as well as where the purchaser has defaulted. The tendency, however, seems to be to hold the broker not entitled to commissions where the sale fails because of the purchaser's default, and to sustain the right to commissions where it fails because of the owner's default. Where title has passed to the purchaser, who thereafter defaults in the payment of notes given to evidence the unpaid purchase price, the cases are more evenly divided.

The present annotation does not discuss generally brokers' contracts under which the broker is to have all that he gets over a certain price, although in some such contracts the wording is very similar to that of the contracts here involved, in that he is to receive this sum out of the price paid, and some such cases have been included; but generally they have been excluded from this discussion. A very excellent discussion of such contracts appears in Murphy v. W. & W. Live Stock Co. (1920) 26 Wyo. 455, 189 Pac. 857. The court there states the general rule to be that "where, by the contract of employment, the commission is made dependent upon certain conditions or contingencies, as upon the actual confirmation of a sale or the full payment of the purchase money, or a specified part thereof, such as an agreed first payment, or a net price to the owner, these stipulations will govern, and a fulfilment or performance of the prescribed conditions is generally essential to the right to compensation." It was held in Seattle Land Co. v. Day (1891) 2 Wash. 451, 27 Pac. 74, that one holding land under a contract of purchase, who has employed a broker to sell it, and agreed to give the broker all he could obtain after making the principal a profit of $500, is not liable for commissions where a sale made by the broker failed because of defects in title.

Some contracts expressly provide that the payment of the commission, which is to be a certain per cent of the purchase price, is to be paid the broker at the date of the payment of the purchase price or instalments, according to the payment by such purchaser. Under such a contract, where the purchase price is paid in instalments, the broker is entitled, upon the making of such payments, to his percentage thereof. The payment of his commission is not dependent upon the payment by the purchaser of the entire purchase price. Frank v. Bonnevie (1904) 20 Colo. App. 164, 77 Pac. 363.

It is assumed in Gorham v. Heiman (1891) 90 Cal. 346, 27 Pac. 289, that a broker who is entitled to receive as his commission a percentage of the amount actually paid by a purchaser is not entitled to his commission except as the purchase price is paid.

a. View denying right to commission.

It is the general doctrine of some cases that where the commissions are payable out of the purchase money, the broker is not entitled to his commission where the purchaser defaults.

Thus, where the owner of the property has given to the broker a contract for the payment of money, containing a provision that it is "to be paid only out of the money to be paid by" the purchaser or his assigns for the purchase price of the land, the broker cannot recover where the purchaser procured by him makes default. Edwards v. Baker (1919) 39 Cal. App. 755, 180 Pac. 33.

A broker to whom the owner agreed to pay a commission of a certain percentage of the amount he received is not entitled to his commission where a purchaser procured by him refused to proceed with the purchase of a plantation after a contract was made, and upon discovery that a suit had been filed against the owner which might affect his title to the land. Lee v. Greenwood Agency Co. (1920) 123 Miss. 823, 86 So. 449.

A broker whose commissions were to be paid out of the sale price, according to the written agreement, and, according to an oral agreement, were to be paid in the final settlement between the owner and the purchaser procured by the broker, out of the money paid by the purchaser to the owner, was denied the right to recover commissions in Lowenstein v. McPeak (1911) 48 Pa. Super. Ct. 280, where the purchaser defaulted after entering into an agreement with the owner and making a cash payment. The broker in this case admitted the default, and said to the owner that he would endeavor to get another purchaser.

A broker who has agreed to procure a purchaser of land at a stated price, of which he was to have a stipulated sum as commissions when the purchase price was paid, cannot recover his commissions upon the mere showing that he procured a purchaser who entered into a contract and made a small payment, it being admitted that the sale was never completed, and there being no evidence of the owner's unwillingness to complete the same. Norris v. Walsh (1922) — Colo. —, 205 Pac. 276. The fact that there was an enforceable contract does not entitle the broker to commissions; the owner's agreement was to pay commissions when the property was sold and the purchase price received.

An owner who has agreed to pay the broker's commission out of the purchase money is not liable for commission where the sale fails because of the inability of the purchaser procured by the broker to complete it. Fletcher v. Campbell (1913) 19 Ont. L. Rep. 501, 15 D. L. R. 420.

See Colvin v. Post Mortg. & Land Co. (1919) 225 N. Y. 510, 122 N. E. 454, infra, III. a. See the reported case (WATSON v. ODELL, ante, 280).

Some cases denying the right to commissions where the purchaser has defaulted have, however, found in the facts some right in the owner, recognized by the broker, to declare a forfeiture in case of default. Under an agreement between owner and broker that the broker should have the right, in case the land was sold on instalments, to retain a certain percentage of each instalment as paid, and a supplementary agreement regulating the commission on account of a resale of lots declared forfeited, the owner, who has declared a purchase forfeited for default in payments, is not liable for the commissions, so far as they remain unpaid. Holbrook v. Investment Co. (1897) 30 Or. 259, 47 Pac. 920. In Columbia Realty Invest. Co. v. Alameda Land Co. (1918) 87 Or. 277, 168 Pac. 64, 440, an action on a contract under which the brokers were entitled to a commission out of the selling price of the land, the court said that such a promise to pay is enforceable only on allegation and proof that the fund named was adequate for the payment demanded, and it was held that the brokers cannot recover commissions without proof that enough of the purchase price had been paid to cover the commissions claimed. In this case the contract between the parties recognized that some of the contracts of purchase and sale of the land might have to be declared forfeited. The dispute in the case was over contracts which had thus been declared forfeited.

Where a principal has entered into an agreement with a broker, who has effected a sale for him, to pay a certain part of the commission out of money deposited by the purchaser and the remaining part out of the final cash payment to be made on the delivery of the deed, failure to allege that this final payment has been made is fatal to a complaint by the broker to recover his commission. Nekarda v. Presberger (1908) 123 App. Div. 418, 107 N. Y. Supp. 897.

A broker who had undertaken to secure a contract for the manufacture of munitions for his principal under an agreement that his commissions should become due and payable only as, and when, and in the same proportion as his principal received payment from the purchaser, that is, the commission was only to be paid out of the payments under the contract, was held not entitled to recover commissions where the contract failed for a fault not that of his principal. Fuller v. Bradley Contracting Co. (1918) 183 App. Div. 6, 170 N. Y. Supp. 320, affirmed in (1920) 229 N. Y. 605, 129 N. E. 925.

A broker employed to sell a patent right, who, under his contract with his employer, was entitled to a commission of a certain percentage of any kind of consideration received by the employer except in case of forfeiture, was held not entitled to any commission in case of forfeiture nor upon any stocks which should revert to the employer through failure to pay the purchase price of the patent right in cash. Phelps v. Cable R. Co. (1890) 122 N. Y. 639, 25 N. E. 394.

Even though the land has been deeded to the purchaser, if he afterwards defaults in the payment of the purchase price, the broker cannot recover his commission. A real estate broker who has effected a sale of land, and to whom the owner has given notes for his commission, containing the provision that they are not to become obligations of the maker until the notes which have been given to him for the purchase money of the land have been paid, cannot recover his commission where the purchaser of the land has made default, and the owner has been compelled to sell the land under a vendor's lien reserved by him, and has become the purchaser at the sale. Roach v. McDonald (1914) 187 Ala. 64, 65 So. 823. According to the court, it was the intent of all the parties by their contract to declare that if the seller was, because of the failure of the buyer to complete his part of the contract of purchase by payment of the purchase-money notes in cash, forced to take his land back, then that he should not be liable to the real estate agent for the commissions which were represented by the notes. But see Crane v. Eddy (1901) 191 Ill. 645, 85 Am. St. Rep. 284, 61 N. E. 431, infra, II. b. A broker who had an agreement with the landowner that the latter should pay the broker's commission when the purchasers paid to the owner a stipulated sum on account of the price of the sale, and executed to him their notes and mortgage for the balance of the purchase money, cannot recover his commission where the purchasers executed their notes and mortgage, but failed to pay the stipulated sum, although the landowner extended the time of payment, and used all reasonable means to procure the money, but was finally compelled to take back the property. McPhail v. Buell (1890) 87 Cal. 115, 25 Pac. 266. An owner of land who has contracted to pay a broker commissions "out of the payments as made," and who, upon the default of the purchaser procured by the broker, accepts a reconveyance after a long period of time, is not liable to the broker for commissions. Murray v. Rickard (1904) 103 Va. 132, 48 S. E. 871. The reconveyance of the land and the surrender of the purchase-money bond were in accordance with the terms of the contract entered into by the parties.

Where a broker has procured a purchaser for a mine, who has entered into a contract with the owner to pay the purchase price out of the gross proceeds of the mine, and in no other way, and the broker has acquiesced in this arrangement, and has agreed to accept as his commission a certain percentage of the gross proceeds of the mine, thus paid on the purchase price, it is held that he has an interest in the contract between the purchaser and the owner which entitles him to recognition, and entitles him to receive, during the lifetime of the contract, his share of the proceeds without interruption from the owner. No very clear statement of his right to recover, however, appears in this case, which was an action by the broker against the owner after the owner had entered into a new contract with the purchaser. It was claimed that this contract was entered into after the purchaser had abandoned his first contract, but there is held to be evidence from which the jury might have arrived at a different conclusion. It is held, further, that the test of the broker's right to recover commissions is not dependent upon whether or not the owner fraudulently entered into the contract, or whether he entered into it in good faith. Bishop v. Averill (1897) 17 Wash. 209, 49 Pac. 237, 50 Pac. 1024.

b. View sustaining right.

In Pinkerton v. Hudson (1908) 87 Ark. 506, 113 S. W. 35, a broker, under a contract for commissions out of the proceeds of the sale, was held entitled to his commissions where he procured a purchaser with whom the owner entered into an enforceable contract, although the purchaser afterwards defaulted. In this case the owner had entered into a contract for sale with the purchaser furnished by the broker, and had furnished an abstract in accordance with the contract, but the purchaser refused to accept it, and refused to carry out the contract of purchase by paying over the sum stipulated therein; thereafter the owner brought a suit in chancery against the purchaser for the specific enforcement of the contract, but afterwards, upon a disagreement between himself and the broker as to the payment of costs, dismissed it. The agreement as to payment out of the proceeds of the sale is regarded as a mere postponement of the time the commission is payable, and not as a condition of the broker's right thereto. It is accordingly held to be the owner's duty to enforce his contract of sale and collect the purchase money. In this case the purchaser's default occurred before deed was made and delivered.

But in this jurisdiction it has been held, where the purchaser is financially unable to respond to the terms of his contract, that the broker whose commissions are payable out of the purchase money is not entitled to his commissions upon the purchaser's default. Boysen v. Frink (1906) 80 Ark. 254, 96 S. W. 1056. In this case, under the contract between the broker and the landowner, the broker's commission was to be paid one half when one third of the purchase price had been paid, the other half when one half of the purchase price had been paid; the owner entered into a contract with the purchaser under the terms of which a certain payment was to be made in ten days, evidenced by a note, and two other notes were to be paid for the balance of the purchase price; the purchaser failed to pay any of the notes, and about six months afterwards a compromise was made by the payment of a certain sum and the giving up of the notes by the landowner. The court said that if the payment of the compromised sum was accepted in good faith as a reimbursement of losses for the purchaser's breach of the contract, and the contract, to the extent of the broker's interest, could not have been enforced, the broker could not recover for his commission; but if the sum paid was not in good faith accepted as a settlement of an otherwise uncollectable debt, but was a good business deal, and it was to the advantage of the landowner to accept it and hold the land instead of enforcing a valid sale, he must pay the commission.

Where a deed has been made to the purchaser procured by the broker, and the purchaser has given back notes secured by a lien on the land, and afterwards defaults in the payment of the notes, and the vendor forecloses his lien and bids in the land, the courts are not agreed as to the owner's liability for the commission. That he is not liable is held in the cases set out supra, II. a. On the contrary, the Illinois court holds that he is liable. Crane v. Eddy (1901) 191 Ill. 645, 85 Am. St. Rep. 284, 61 N. E. 431. The court here argues that the situation is the same as if a third person had purchased the land and paid the money. There was the additional fact in this case, on which some reliance is placed, that some of the payments had been made by the purchaser, and upon his making payment part of the land had been released without the broker's consent. It is argued that if this part had not been released, it might be that the land would have sold to a stranger for the full amount due the vendor; therefore, he would have received payment in full in money. The agreement to pay commissions in this case was in the form of a duebill stating that there was due the broker so much commission, "the same to be paid out of the purchase money as it is paid to me on the various payments in proportionate amounts with interest at 6 per cent per annum."

In Bush v. Abraham (1896) 25 Or. 336, 35 Pac. 1066, where the owner, who had conveyed his property to the purchaser procured by the broker, for a cash payment and notes for the balance, secured by mortgage, gave the broker a note for his commission, payable when the notes of the purchaser were payable, it was held that the acceptance by the owner, in consequence of the insolvency of the purchaser, and to save himself from further loss and expense, of a reconveyance of the property and an order on a third person for a stated sum in satisfaction and discharge of the purchase-price notes, and other consideration named, was a substituted payment, or accord and satisfaction of such purchase-price notes, and that the owner was liable to the broker for his commission.

It has been held that a broker whose contract with the owner provided that the broker's commission was to be paid out of the payments made by the purchaser on notes given to evidence the unpaid part of the purchase price, and that in the event the purchaser failed to pay and the vendor should foreclose, the broker was not to be entitled to commission, is entitled to commission although there was default in payments and the vendor foreclosed, where upon foreclosure the notes and all costs were paid in full, one of the notes being paid before it would have been paid but for the foreclosure. White v. Murphy (1922) — Mo. App. —, 236 S. W. 674.

Although brokers have agreed that no commission should be paid unless the purchases procured by them made a deferred payment, they are entitled to their commission where the purchaser was able to make the payment, but the contract was rescinded by mutual consent of vendor and purchaser. Brown v. Marty (1922) — Wis. —, 187 N. W. 181.

A broker employed to sell machinery under a contract for commissions as soon as the purchase price had been collected was held entitled to his commissions, in Dillon v. Turkey Gap Coal & Coke Co. (1921) 89 W. Va. 395, 109 S. E. 334, although the entire purchase price had not been collected, it being due, the purchaser being solvent, and the principal having refused to take steps to collect.

c. Commissions payable out of first money.

A broker whose commissions are to be paid out of the first money collected is entitled to his commissions where more than the amount thereof is collected, although the purchaser afterwards defaults, and may be financially unable to complete the transaction. Moore v. Irwin (1909) 89 Ark. 289, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1168, 131 Am. St. Rep. 97, 116 S. W. 662.

III. Owner's default.

a. Cases sustaining right to commission.

Where the broker's commissions are payable out of the purchase money, and the owner has refused to accept the purchaser found, or, for some other default on his part, the sale has failed, he cannot defend an action for commissions on the theory that no purchase money was paid. Fiske v. Soule (1891) 87 Cal. 313, 25 Pac. 430; Finch v. Guardian Trust Co. (1901) 92 Mo. App. 263; Colvin v. Post Mortg. & Land Co. (1919) 225 N. Y. 510, 122 N. E. 454; Cheatham v. Yarbrough (1890) 90 Tenn. 77, 15 S. W. 1076; Pederson v. North Yakima & E. S. Irrig. Co. (1911) 63 Wash. 636, 116 Pac. 279; Hugill v. Weekly (1908) 64 W. Va. 210, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1262, 61 S. E. 360.

In Fiske v. Soule (Cal.) supra, where the contract of employment of the broker contained a provision that the owner would pay the broker a commission "of all I receive over and above the price above mentioned on amount of said sale or exchange," it was urged that the broker was not entitled to recover commissions until the purchase money was paid. In answer to this contention the court says: "It may be conceded that this would be so if the purchaser had failed to pay the purchase money, but the defendant could hardly defend on this ground when the purchase money was not paid solely because he refused to accept it."

In Finch v. Guardian Trust Co. (1901) 92 Mo. App. 263, the owner refused to complete a sale to a purchaser procured by the broker after being advised by his attorney that, if he did so, the broker would be entitled to his commission. The court, in allowing a commission, says: "That clause in plaintiff's contract with the defendant, offered in evidence, 'this commission shall be payable out of the first cash payment of one third of the purchase price,' is not a condition precedent to plaintiff's right of recovery. And the contract by its terms does not require a cash payment of one third of the purchase price before the agent is to get his fee; it merely provides that his commission shall be payable out of that fund. It was not intended that, unless there was a cash payment of one third of the purchase price, the agent was to get no commission." Finch v. Guardian Trust Co. is approved in Brown v. Russell (1920) — Mo. App. —, 221 S. W. 791.

In Colvin v. Post Mortg. & Land Co. (1919) 225 N. Y. 510, 122 N. E. 454, where it was agreed between the broker and the owner that the broker's commission should be a certain percentage of the purchase price, "payable pro rata from each instalment of the purchase price as and when the same is received" by the owner, the final instalment to be due when the final cash payment and the bond and mortgage securing the balance are turned over, it is held that if the sale fails through the seller's fault, there is no indication of any intention that, in such an event, the broker shall lose what he has earned, although if the sale fails because of the purchaser's default, he is not entitled to commissions. The rule of this case was held applicable in Traylor v. Crucible Steel Co. (1920) 192 App. Div. 445, 183 N. Y. Supp. 181, affirmed without opinion in (1922) 232 N. Y. 583, 134 N. E. 581, to a broker's right to recover commissions on war contracts, payable as and when payments were made to his principal, and the broker was held entitled to commission on contracts although no payments were made thereon, because the contract was canceled, due to the principal's default.

A broker to whom the owner has agreed to pay a commission out of the purchase money, who has furnished a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy on terms satisfactory to the owner, but who refuses to complete the transaction because of a defective title, may recover his commission. According to the court the fact that the broker was to receive his compensation out of the proceeds of the sale did not make his right to compensation dependent at all events on the completion of the sale. If he performed his part of the contract, and the trade was defeated alone by the inability of his principal to make a good title, then he is entitled to receive compensation for his services though it cannot be paid, as agreed, out of the purchase money. Cheat-ham v. Yarbrough (1890) 90 Tenn. 77, 15 S. W. 1076.

An owner of land who has contracted to pay a broker commissions of a certain percentage "on the purchase price of said land, and shall be liable only for the portion of each of said purchase-money instalments coming to second party as the same may be collected by the first party, and not otherwise," is liable for commissions where a sale failed because of a default on the part of the owner in furnishing water to the land for irrigation purposes, as he had agreed to do. Pederson v. North Yakima & E. S. Irrig. Co. (1911) 63 Wash. 636, 116 Pac. 279.

An owner who has contracted to pay a broker a certain percentage commission out of the first payment is liable for the commission although the sale failed because of alleged misrepresentations by an employee of the owner. Hugill v. Weekly (1908) 64 W. Va. 210, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1262, 61 S. E. 360.

A broker employed to secure a loan, who has agreed with his principal that the amount to be paid him should be deducted from the loan, is entitled to his commission where the loan fails because of a defective title to the property which was to be given as security. Putzel v. Wilson (1888) 49 Hun, 220, 2 N. Y. Supp. 47.

b. Cases denying right.

Other cases deny the broker's right to commissions even though the sale fails because of the owner's default. Lindley v. Fay (1897) 119 Cal. 239, 51 Pac. 333.

The contract involved in Cremer v. Miller (1893) 56 Minn. 52, 57 N. W. 318, gave the broker as his commission whatever sum he should obtain over a stipulated price. The testimony left it uncertain whether the commission was payable on the production of a customer acceptable to the owner, or out of the payments made by such customer in compliance with the contract. The court says: "Under the rule in Flower v. Davidson (1890) 44 Minn. 46, 46 N. W. 308, if the contract requires the sale to be consummated, and the plaintiff's compensation depended upon the payment of the purchase money, the plaintiff could not recover unless these conditions should exist, or unless the plaintiff was defeated by the fraud, bad faith, or wrongful act of the defendant. And it is clear that inability to make title within the time specified would not subject the defendant to liability if the contract was not carried out for that cause, nor would the burden of proof rest on defendant to show that the failure of the contract was not due to the acts or omissions of the defendant in the premises." Cremer v. Miller (Minn.) supra. The sale made in this case was not completed because the owner was unable to give a merchantable title.

One employing a broker to purchase property for him, who has the right to approve or reject any contract for the purchase of the property which might be agreed on by the broker and the owner, and who has agreed to pay commissions out of the proceeds of the deal, cannot be held liable for commissions where the transaction failed, although it failed because of the refusal of the person thus employing the broker to consummate it. Kiam v. Turner (1899) 21 Tex. Civ. App. 417, 52 S. W. 1043.

In Lindley v. Fay (1897) 119 Cal. 239, 51 Pac. 333, where the sale failed because the owner refused to go on with it, the brokers were held not entitled to commissions where, under the contract, they were to be paid out of the first money received. The court says: The contract "tends to show an agreement to pay commissions out of the first money received, and no money has ever been received. Under such a contract the broker is not entitled to compensation when he finds a purchaser ready, willing, and able to purchase on the prescribed terms. There must be a sale and a first payment to entitle him to recover. It is so nominated in the bond."

v.
HELENA IMPROVEMENT DISTRICT NO. 1.

Arkansas Supreme Court — June 20, 1921.

(149 Ark. 285, 232 S. W. 28.)

Damages — leaving property outside levee.

1. Destruction of value of property by being left outside a levee is not an element of damages to be allowed for condemnation of a right of way across the property for construction of the levee.

[See note on this question beginning on page 302.]

— eminent domain — right of way for levee → depreciation of value of property.

2. The damages to be paid by a levee district for a right of way across mill property for the construction of a levee which depreciates the value of the property by cutting off switch connections with a railroad in the construction of the levee is not limited to the mere value of the land taken, but includes the injury so caused.

— cutting off switch connections — property not valueless.

3. If property is not rendered valueless by being left outside a levee, the levee district cannot avoid liability for injury done to it by cutting off its switch connections with a railroad by the construction of the levee.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Phillips County (Jackson, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to condemn a right of way over property belonging to the defendant oil works for the construction of a levee. Reversed.

Statement by Hart, J.:

This action was brought in the circuit court by Helena improvement district No. 1 against the City Oil Works to condemn a right of way over property belonging to the defendant in Helena, Arkansas, for the construction of a levee. Subsequent purchasers of the property from this defendant were also made defendants. They answered, setting up damages by reason of the actual taking of a part of the land and the injury to the remainder.

The board of commissioners for the levee district and the engineers were witnesses for it at the trial of the condemnation proceedings. According to their testimony the levee was first constructed in front of the oil mill of the defendants, and the levee protected the mill from the high waters of the Mississippi river. There was a subsidence in the levee. By this is meant that the levee sank down, and the cause of it was the soft foundation. The subsidence in that part of the levee in front of the mill. The commissioners of the levee district expended about $20,000 in trying to repair and maintain the levee in front of the oil mill. They were unable to do so, and after the levee had sunk down again and a part of it had caved into the river, it was deemed advisable to construct the levee behind the oil mill. In doing this, they used about six tenths of an acre of the land on which the oil mill was situated and built the levee across an industrial railroad track which had been extended from the main track of the railroad company to the oil mill for the purpose of carrying freight to and from the mill. This left the oil mill in front of a levee 60 feet high without means of carrying its freight from the mill to the tracks of the railroad company. The value of the land upon which the mill was situated was $1,000 per acre.

According to the testimony of G. W. Willey, the president and manager of the oil mill, his company was engaged in crushing cottonseed and in the cottonseed oil business. It is impractical to operate an oil mill of that size without an industrial track. After the levee was constructed behind the oil mill it destroyed the industrial track so that the company was unable to move its freight to and from the mill to the railroad. It was impractical to operate the mill after the levee had been constructed across its industrial track so that cars could not be brought from the railroad track to the mill for the purpose of loading and unloading. The value of the plant before the levee was constructed behind it was $70,000. After that its value was practically destroyed, and it was necessary to sell the machinery piece by piece.

He further stated that this would have been prevented if the old levee had been permitted to remain. According to his testimony also, the construction of the new levee made it impossible to operate the plant. The reason given was that the levee occupied that portion of the ground that had been formerly used for trackage purposes, and the construction of the levee, which was 60 feet high across the industrial track leading into its mill, damaged the property the whole value of the mill. The reason that the taking deprived them from operating the mill was because it was impossible to maintain thereafter a railroad connection. In short, the taking of the particular piece of land and the building of the levee across the industrial track practically destroyed the value of the mill, and made it impracticable to operate it.

No subsidence has occurred in the old levee in front of the mill since the construction of the new levee behind it. Accretions are forming in the river in front of the mill, and willow trees are growing up there.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff and assessed the value of the land taken by it in the sum of $60.

From the judgment rendered, the defendants have duly prosecuted an appeal to this court.

Messrs. Moore & Vineyard and W. G. Dinning, for appellants:

The improvement district is liable to the appellants for the damages caused to their property as a whole by the building of the levee across a portion of their lands.

Messrs. P. R. Andrews and J. G. Burke for appellee.

Hart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is no conflict in the testimony that it was necessary to construct the new levee in order to protect the lands within the district from the overflow of the Mississippi river. It is conceded that the commissioners acted in good faith in locating and constructing the new levee, and that this was within the power of the commissioners under the act creating the improvement district.

The evidence shows that the levee as originally constructed was between the oil mill of the defendants and the Mississippi river. So, it may be said that the oil mill was on the inside of the levee. By the construction of the new levee the oil mill was placed outside of the levee; in other words, the oil mill of the defendants is between the new levee and the Mississippi river. There was an industrial track extending from the oil mill of the defendants westward to the main line of a railroad. The levee was constructed across the industrial track on a part of the land of the oil mill. The levee as constructed was 60 feet high and destroyed entirely the use of the industrial track of the oil mill; so that communication from the mill with the railroad by cars operating on the industrial track was entirely cut off.

In instructing the jury at the request of the plaintiff, and in refusing to give instructions asked by the defendants, the court limited the damages to be recovered to the value of the land actually taken in the construction of the levee, and denied the defendants the right to recover on account of the levee being built across the industrial track running from the main line of the railroad to the oil mill of the defendants. This was error. The ruling on this point would have been correct if the uncontradicted evidence had shown that the practical use of the oil mill had been destroyed on account of its being outside of the levee, by the construction of the new levee.

In McCoy v. Plum Bayou Levee Dist. 95 Ark. 345, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 396, 129 S. W. 1097, the court held that a levee district may rightfully build its levee across depressions, swales, and low places so as to prevent the escape of flood water from a river into surrounding lowlands sought to be protected, though it has the effect of raising the water higher on lands between the levee and river, without becoming liable to the owner of such intervening lands so damaged.

The court further held that a levee district, which builds a levee so as to protect lands from overflow of the waters of a stream at flood time, will not, under article 2, § 22, of the Constitution of 1874, providing that private property shall not be "taken, appropriated, or damaged for public use, without just compensation therefor," become liable for injuries to land lying between the levee and the river, resulting from the flood water being raised higher between the levee and the river than before the levee was constructed.

In Jackson v. United States, 230 U. S. 1, 57 L. ed. 1363, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1011, and Hughes v. United States, 230 U. S. 24, 57 L. ed. 1374, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 624, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1019, the court held that the United States is not responsible for damages by overflow or for failure to construct additional levees along the Mississippi river so as to afford increased protection from increased overflow caused by the levees that were constructed by state and Federal authority at other points; nor do such damages amount to taking the land overflowed for public use within the meaning of the 5th Amendment.

Under the rule announced in those cases, the landowner is not entitled to damages because of the failure to so construct the levee as to protect his land from the waters of the Mississippi, or because the levee as constructed may prevent such water from flowing off as it otherwise would, or it may deepen the water in an overflow on the land between the embankment and the river.

The intention of the legislature was to protect the lands in the improvement district against the waters from the Mississippi river by constructing a levee for that purpose, and, if it was necessary to construct the levee so as to leave property between it and the river, this would, in the very nature of things, be unavoidable. Hence it has been held that the landowner must submit to the consequent loss resulting to him as his misfortune to be borne for the general good.

Therefore the levee district is not liable for damages inflicted upon the land by the Mississippi river. But it does not follow that the levee district should not be liable for damages produced by independent causes other than being outside of the levee, if these elements of damages are proper in other condemnation proceedings. This rule is supported by the decisions of the supreme court of the state of Mississippi. A section of the Constitution of that state excludes compensation for damages accruing to land "because it is left outside the levee." The court said that the words used in the Constitution present the idea of defenselessness against the ravages of the Mississippi river.

In Duncan v. Levee Comrs. 74 Miss. 128, 20 So. 839, the court said: "All damages, therefore, which accrue to lands from the ravages of the river because not protected against it by the levee, are not to be compensated for. But damages produced by independent causes other than being left outside the levee, if, in their nature, allowable within the rules of law, are still recoverable."

Again, in the case of Richardson v. Levee Comrs. 68 Miss. 539, 9 So. 351, the court held that the landowner is not entitled to compensation because the construction of the levee renders the land lying between it and the river practically worthless for agriculture, and necessitates the removal of houses to the protected side of the levee, as these are consequential damages. In discussing the question the court said: "The landowner is not entitled to damages because of a failure to so place levees as to protect his land from the water of the Mississippi, or because the levee may prevent such water from flowing off as it otherwise would, and may deepen the water in an overflow on the land between the embankment and the river. These are consequences of the situation, and the authorized effort to promote the general good by the construction of levees, and must be borne, because they are unavoidable in the nature of things. The legislative scheme is to protect against water from the Mississippi river by an embankment sufficient for the purpose, and it is to be put where the board intrusted with the execution of the scheme may determine; and the landowner must submit to any inconvenience or disadvantage or loss resulting to him consequentially, as his misfortune, to be borne for the general good, to which individual convenience must be subordinated, except where it is otherwise provided. Levee Comrs. v. Harkleroads, 62 Miss. 807. . . . That damage caused by the success of the scheme in confining the water of the river is excluded seems clear, and has already been announced. That all other damage which is not remote and arises directly from the taking of part for levee purposes, resulting to the owner's adjacent land immediately from the constructing of the levee, is to be compensated for, seems as clear as the denial of damage by the river. This is consonant with natural justice, and it may be assumed that it was the legislative purpose to secure to the owner whose land is taken for a levee indemnity for all damages done him as to the adjacent land he owns, not arising from the accomplishment of the object of the levee, and directly produced by depriving him of so much of his land as is taken from him, and converting it into such a shape as to do harm to his adjacent land. We are not willing to declare a rule more precise than this; for, while there may be a general resemblance in all cases of land near the river, there must be individual differences, and each case must be governed by its own peculiar circumstances, subject to the general rules announced."

It results from these views that, if the undisputed evidence had shown that the oil mill of the defendants had been rendered practically useless by the construction of the new levee so as to place the mill outside of the levee, and the mill could not thereafter be operated, the owner could not recover damages for the consequent depreciation in the value of his property or the cost of removing the mill and its machinery to another site where the mill could be operated. The reason is that the damages suffered under such a state of the record would follow as an incident to the construction of the levee so as to leave the property outside of its protection.

—cutting off
switch connections—property not valueless.

The undisputed evidence in the case at bar, however, does not show that the oil mill was rendered valueless as an oil mill because the levee was constructed so as to leave it on the outside of the levee. It is true there is some confusion in the testimony on this point, but, when the evidence is given its strongest probative force in favor of the defendants, it does not appear to us that the oil mill could not be operated at all because the construction of a new levee placed it between the levee and the Mississippi river.

The evidence does show that the oil mill was greatly depreciated in value on this account. According to the testimony of the defendants' witnesses, it was rendered impractical to operate it because the new levee was constructed across the industrial track leading from the railroad to the oil mill, and thus the oil mill company was prevented from carrying cars over the industrial track to and from its mill for the purpose of loading and unloading freight. The evidence for the defendants shows that it was impractical to operate the oil mill without this connection. According to their testimony, however, it was not wholly impractical to operate the oil mill, because it was on the outside of the levee. To sum up, the evidence shows that before the new levee was constructed the oil mill was worth $70,000. Suppose the uncontradicted evidence had shown that the construction of the new levee rendered the property valueless as an oil mill, and that it could not be operated as such on account of the ravages of the waters from the Mississippi river; then the defendants would be only entitled to recover the value of the land taken, and the instructions given by the court would have been correct.

It is fairly inferable, however, from all the evidence, that while the oil-mill property was materially injured by being placed outside of the new levee, still it was practical to operate it, if its industrial track had not been destroyed by the construction of the new levee. This shows that the construction of the new levee across the industrial track was an independent cause which rendered the oil-mill property valueless as such and made it impracticable to operate it.

The error in the instructions of the court evidently arose from the fact that it considered the construction of the levee across the industrial track as a mere incident instead of an independent cause producing damages. It is true the only practical way to construct the new levee was to build it across the industrial track. The evidence for the defendants shows that such construction damaged their oil-mill property because it prevented the defendants from carrying cars of freight to and from the oil mill over the industrial track. Manifestly this was not damage accruing because of the oil-mill property being left outside of the levee, but the damage accrued because of the construction of the levee over the industrial track. In short, this damage was caused not because the property of the oil-mill company was unprotected by the levee, but it was caused by the levee itself. Whether inside or outside of the levee, the damage to the oil mill in this respect was caused by the building of the levee itself, and not by reason of the fact that the oil mill was left outside of the levee. The facilities afforded by the industrial track for the transportation of freight between the railroad and the oil mill were a valuable property right which belonged to the oil-mill company, and its injury by the appropriation of the land on which it was situated and the construction of the levee across it constituted a damage to the remaining property for which the defendants should be compensated. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. v. McGrew, 104 Mo. 282, 15 S. W. 931; New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Blacker, 178 Mass. 386, 59 N. E. 1020.

In the latter case the court, in discussing a similar question, said: "The fact that this land was situated on the line of the railroad, and at a level with it, so that spur tracks could be (as they were) built, running onto it, made it valuable for any business which could be economically carried on by having freight delivered to it directly from the cars without the expense of handling and carting. That was an element which in fact gave, or might have given, value to this land, and which could properly be considered in determining what the fair market value of it was."

The holdings in those cases are in accord with our own decisions. In Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Boles, 88 Ark. 533, 115 S. W. 375, the court held that, although several lots of land sought to be condemned for railway purposes are separated by an alley, they may be treated as parts of a single tract for the purpose of determining the damages if the testimony shows that they are used as a unit.

In St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Anderson, 39 Ark. 167, the court held that the elements of damages in condemnation proceedings are not alone the market value of the land actually appropriated, but include also the injury to the owner of the remaining land arising from the increased difficulty of communication between the parts of the several tracts, etc.

It follows that the court erred in not submitting to the jury as an element of damages the loss suffered by the defendants on account of the levee having been constructed across the industrial track so as to cut off connection between the oil mill and the railroad by means of the industrial track.

For this error the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

ANNOTATION.

As the title indicates, the annotation is confined to damages, whether of a positive or negative character, consequent upon land being left outside of the levee; and the right to compensation for land taken or damaged in other ways is beyond its scope.

The reported case (CITY OIL WORKS v. HELENA IMPROV. DIST. ante, 296) is in harmony with the general rule that there is no liability to compensate for injuries to property due to fact that land is left outside of a levee.

So far as the lower Mississippi valley, which may, perhaps, be regarded as governed by the civil law, is concerned, it is now settled by Cubbins v. Mississippi River Commission (1916) 241 U. S. 351, 60 L. ed. 1041, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 671, that there can be no recovery for raising the height of water in a river by government levees so as to overflow and destroy private property. The opinion, however, deals almost entirely with the Roman law.

[In Levee Inspectors v. Crittenden (1899) 36 C. C. A. 418, 94 Fed. 613, which is not within the scope of the present annotation, the court said that even though in the original Louisiana territory there was a servitude upon land bordering upon the Mississippi river as to levees, which justified the taking of land therefor without compensation, that principle was not available to a levee district established under the laws of Arkansas, since that state had never exercised or asserted the right, but, on the contrary, the act under which the levee was constructed provided for awarding to the landowner on whose land the levee is located and built, such damages as six landowners of the county may deem just and right.]

A levee district may rightfully construct a levee across sloughs, swales, and other low places which help to absorb the flood waters of a river, without liability to a riparian owner whose lands are left between the levee and the river, and which are injured as a result of the levee raising the height of flood waters. McCoy v. Plum Bayou Levee Dist. (1910) 95 Ark. 345, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 396, 129 S. W. 1097; and see also Cobbins v. Mississippi R. Commission (1913) 204 Fed. 299.

Nor is there any liability under a constitutional provision that "private property shall not be taken, appropriated, or damaged for public use without just compensation therefor." Cobbins v. Mississippi R. Commission (Fed.) supra. The court stated that where no rights have been violated, there is no injury for which the law affords compensation; that it is a case of an injury without damages.

Levee commissioners have the legal right to protect the lands in the district by leveeing against vagrant flood waters, and thus incidentally throwing them upon the landowners between the levee and the river, when incident to and reasonably necessary to the effective protection of the lands in the levee district, and such damages are within the phrase "damnum absque injuria." Indian Creek Drainage Dist. v. Garrott (1920) 123 Miss. 301, 85 So. 312. The court said: "The damages resulting are without legal injury and must be borne for the common good. The act causing the damage is done for protection against the common enemy,—roaming flood waters. It is similar in principle to the right to protect from violence against an outlaw who runs amuck, even though a neighbor is incidentally hurt in the exercise of the right." The court added that the constitutional provision that private property shall not be damaged for public use except on due compensation does not compensate damages resulting without legal injury, as in the case at bar, and cited the McCoy Case (Ark.) supra, as being so identical with the case before them that it was referred to as a sound authority upon which to rest.

So, a city may construct a levee to prevent the overflow of a portion of its territory without liability for damage to property outside the levee, due to the levee causing water to stand upon the lot between it and the river in time of flood, which theretofore had passed over the protected part and on into the river, some distance below the city. Hoard v. Des Moines (1883) 62 Iowa, 326, 17 N. W. 527. This right, the court said, was the same as every owner of land has to protect himself from overflow by water from a river, even though, by excluding the water from his own premises, he deepens it between his land and the river.

And the erection by the Federal government, in improving navigation, of a levee behind a plantation, which was thereby placed between the old and the new levee, was not a taking of property for which compensation must be made. Hughes v. United States (1913) 230 U. S. 24, 57 L. ed. 1374, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 624, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1019.

As to compensation to owner for land taken for levee purposes, the court, in Richardson v. Levee Comrs. (1891) 68 Miss. 539, 9 So. 351, said: "The landowner is not entitled to damages because of a failure to so place levees as to protect his land from the water of the Mississippi, or because the levee may prevent such water from flowing off as it otherwise would, and may deepen the water in an overflow on the land between the embankment and the river. These are consequences of the situation and the authorized effort to promote the general good by the construction of levees that must be borne because they are unavoidable in the nature of things. The legislative scheme is to protect against water from the Mississippi river by an embankment sufficient for the purpose, and it is to be put where the board intrusted with the execution of the scheme may determine; and the landowner must submit to any inconvenience, or disadvantage, or loss resulting to him consequentially, as his misfortune, to be borne for the general good, to which individual convenience must be subordinated except where it is otherwise provided. . . .

The Constitution guarantees due compensation to the owner for property taken for public use, and, in observance of this guaranty, the act under which this condemnation was made declares that the 'cash value of the land or material occupied or used . . . for the right of way of said levee or for other purposes, and also the damages caused to the owner's adjacent property by reason of the use of his land or other property for right of way for said levee or for other levee purposes' shall be the measure of due compensation to him. The only place for interpretation is as to what damages are caused to the owner's adjacent property by reason of the use of part of his land for levee purposes within the contemplation of the act. That damage caused by the success of the scheme in confining the water of the river is excluded seems clear and has already been announced. That all other damage which is not remote, and arises directly from the taking of part for levee purposes, resulting to the owner's adjacent land immediately from the construction of the levee, is to be compensated for, seems as clear as the denial of damage by the river. This is consonant with natural justice, and it may be assumed that it was the legislative purpose to secure to the owner whose land is taken for a levee indemnity for all damages done him as to the adjacent land he owns, not arising from the accomplishment of the object of the levee, and directly produced by depriving him of so much of his land as is taken from him, and converting it into such a shape as to do harm to his adjacent land. We are not willing to declare a rule more precise than this, for while there may be a general resemblance in all cases of land near the river, there must be individual differences, and each case must be governed by its own peculiar circumstances, subject to the general rules announced." And see also, to the same effect, Levee Comrs. v. Harkle-roads (1885) 62 Miss. 807, the court in that case stating that the overflowing water of the Mississippi river is the enemy of the public, and the state, in assuming to deal with the danger arising therefrom, has not provided for compensating the owners of land lying along the borders of the river for any injury which may incidentally and possibly arise from the confining of water within the limits fixed by the levee.

But the construction of a levee for the reclamation of land from the flood water of a river will not, although it is for a public use, be permitted to destroy a portion of the water supply system of a municipal corporation. Ft. Worth Improv. Dist. v. Ft. Worth (1913) 106 Tex. 148, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 994, 158 S. W. 164.

The building of levees along the bank of the Mississippi river, or the closing of breaks therein for the purpose of retaining the water in the river, whereby the levee of riparian owners, built to protect their land, became ineffective because of the resulting increase of the volume of water in the river and the raising of the flood level, would not give a right of action as against an individual for the resulting injury to the land and crops, and much less will support a claim against the United States, where the acts are those of the government, on the theory of taking property for which compensation must be made. Jackson v. United States (1912) 230 U. S. 1, 57 L. ed. 1363, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1011.

So, also, the raising, strengthening, and extending the line of levees at certain points along the Mississippi river, and thus temporarily increasing the flood level in time of high water, without building a line of levees along minor stations on the east bank, to afford means of protection from the increased danger of overflow, would not render even an individual liable for the resulting injury to land and crops, and, when the acts are those of the Federal government, do not amount to a taking of property for which compensation must be made. Ibid.

Although, in condemnation proceedings for levee purposes, the landowner is not entitled to damages, because a part of his land is left outside the levee, yet such landowner is entitled to damages for an obstruction of drainage on such land. Duncan v. Levee Comrs. (1896) 74 Miss. 125, 27 So. 838; Ham v. Levee Comrs. (1903) 83 Miss. 534, 35 So. 943. And see also Richardson v. Mississippi Levee Comrs. (1899) 77 Miss. 518, 26 So. 963.

And in Inter-River Drainage Dist. v. Ham (1918) 275 Mo. 384, 204 S. W. 723, where a contemplated levee was so run as to bisect certain land, leaving a portion of it between the levee and a river, thus causing the water of the river to overflow the land between the levee and the river bank to a greater depth and at more frequent intervals, it was held that the damages were not damnum absque injuria, but that the levee district was liable under the constitutional provision that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation." The court based its decision on the fact that the district was seeking to condemn a right of way for the levee through, and not outside of, the complainant's land, distinguishing Jackson v. United States (1912) 230 U. S. 1, 57 L. ed. 1363, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1101, and Hughes v. United States (1913) 230 U. S. 24, 57 L. ed. 1374, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 624, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1019 (both of which cases are cited in this annotation), stating that in both those cases the levees were not constructed upon the lands of the complainant, but behind them, and that if, in the instant case, the levee was so built as to leave all of the land between the levee and the river, those two cases would be in point.

And in Jones v. Mississippi Levee Comrs. (1914) 108 Miss. 149, L.R.A. 1916F, 1194, 66 So. 413, it was held that the owner of land lying between an inner and outer levee, erected to protect a district from the overflow of a river, is entitled to compensation for property destroyed by the cutting by the levee commissioners of the outer levee in order to use the water covering the space between the two as a cushion to protect the inner one, the result of which is to devastate the land of claimant.

And see the reported case (CITY OIL WORKS v. HELENA IMPROV. DIST. ante, 296), which holds that where property left outside of levee is not valueless there will be liability for injury done to it by cutting off switching connections.

Louisiana cases.

In Louisiana the rule, which antedates the purchase of the territory by the United States, is that the riparian owner holds his land subject to a servitude of the right on the part of the public to construct levees upon it without making compensation to him for the land used. See Eldridge v. Trezevant (1895) 160 U. S. 452, 40 L. ed. 490, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 345, infra.

Wherever the taking or damaging of property is merely the enforcement of the servitude which that property owes or to which it is subject, there is no exercise of the right of eminent domain, and the constitutional limitation making compensation a condition to be previously performed has no application; for if the land or the owner is about to be compelled to submit to only an obligation impressed by the law upon property by the original grant, or by a statute under which it has been acquired or held, and independently of the right of eminent domain, there is no propriety in considering whether a previous compensation has been paid or no compensation of any sort is due. Hart v. Levee Comrs. (1893) 54 Fed. 559.

er upon whose land a levee had been constructed by the police jury of the parish was held to have no claim for damages, there being no question but that the levee was a necessity, or that it was placed at a reasonable distance from the river, considering the history of that part of its bank and its badly caving character. In the course of its opinion the court said: "In this state, so much exposed to ruinous inundations, the public have the undoubted right on the shores of the Mississippi river, to the use of the space of ground necessary for the making and repairing of the public levees and roads. . . . It was the condition of the ancient grants of land on the Mississippi river, and sufficient depth was always given to each tract to prevent the exercise of the public rights from proving ruinous to the individual. Speculation and other motives have in latter times caused the division and sale of some tracts and entries of others with large fronts and little depth, in opposition to the general policy of the country. Thus, in the present case the plaintiff had scarcely any depth, with a large front, and a deep bend with a caving bank. The policy of the country and the laws of the land, made for the general safety, cannot yield to cases of individual hardship. Those who purchase and own the front on the Mississippi river gain all that is made by alluvion and lose all that is carried away by abrasion. And those who choose to purchase tracts with little depth in caving bends expose themselves knowingly to total loss, and must suffer the consequences when they occur. They suffer damnum absque injuria."

And it is the duty of the proprietor of a tract of land to accommodate himself to the change where a levee is necessarily moved back—as much so as if such change had been occasioned by the sudden caving of the banks of the river. West Baton Rouge v. Bozman (1856) 11 La. Ann. 94. And so the owner of such a tract was held liable for the expense of a side levee, made necessary by the moving back of a levee.

And so, also, a riparian owner holds his land subject to the servitude of a new levee, rendered necessary by the caving in of the bank of the river, and has no action for damages for injury to his property, although it is placed out of the protection of the new levee. Dubose v. Levee Comrs. (1856) 11 La. Ann. 165. The court said: "The plaintiff in this case has been apparently a sufferer, but we are not prepared to say that the board of levee commissioners acted arbitrarily, or wantonly, or unjustifiably in placing the new levee where they did. To reconcile the controlling interest of the public with the subordinate interest of the individual is ever a delicate problem; when they come in conflict, the latter must yield. In this case, if the plaintiff suffers, it must be attributed to an unfortunate or improvident investment upon a caving bank. He could not expect the state to warrant him against the abrasions of the Mississippi river, or to move the levee back, inch by inch, as the river encroached upon the bank, so as to save him the utmost amount of property. The safety of the public has to be first consulted. When a new and expensive levee is to be built, prudence dictates that it should be so located as to be secure for many years from crumbling into the river. The evidence in this cause shows that such were the views which governed the inspector and commissioners. The facts with reference to the condition and history of the bank opposite the plaintiff's house seemed to have justified their action. . . . The law concerning the expropriation of private property for public use does not apply to such lands upon the banks of navigable rivers as may be found necessary for levee purposes. The quantity of land to be taken for such purposes presents a question of police or administration to be decided by the local authorities, whose decision should not be revised by this tribunal except for the most cogent reasons, and where there has been manifest oppression or injustice."

Again, in Bass v. State (1882) 34 La. Ann. 494, where a levee was constructed in the rear of a plantation, so that it not only threw the plantation out of its protection, but obstructed the natural flow of the water back into a bayou and swamp in the rear, so causing the water to back up and entirely overflow the plantation, which, from its peculiar position, was not otherwise liable to inundation, it was held that there was no right to compensation either for the property taken or for the injury sustained. The decision, however, was based not on the fact that the land owed a servitude, but that the building of the levee was an exercise of the police power; the court stating that this was very different from the right of eminent domain, which expropriates upon indemnity for public utility. That it is the police power which is inherent in every government under its organic law, and which is exercised without making compensation, the damage or injury occasioned by such exercise of such power being damnum absque injuria. This conclusion of the court in the Bass Case, that there was no right to compensation because the constructing of the levee was an exercise of the police power, the court, in Eldridge v. Trezevant (U. S.) supra, in reviewing the Bass Case, said was difficult to be reconciled to the provision of the Louisiana state Constitution that private property will not be taken for public use without just and adequate compensation first made, and intimated that the decision would better have been based upon the doctrine of servitude recognized through a long line of Louisiana decisions.

In Peart v. Meeker (1893) 45 La. Ann. 421, 12 So. 490, an action to recover for damages caused by the construction of a levee in such manner as to leave property outside of the levee exposed to overflow, and so render it unfit for cultivation by reason not only of such exposure, but also by the consequent obstruction of drainage, in holding that there was no right to compensation, the court stated that, whatever may be the law elsewhere, under the Civil Code riparian property on navigable rivers in this state is subject to the servitude or easement imposed by law for the public or common utility, authorizing the appropriation by the government, under proper laws, of the space required for the making and repairing of the levees; and that, in locating and building levees the property is not expropriated, but lawfully appropriated to a use to which it is subject under the title itself.

And in Egan v. Hart (1893) 45 La. Ann. 1358, 14 So. 244, a private injury resulting from the location of a levee was said to be damnum absque injuria.

And that lots which do not front or lie upon the river, and so are not riparian, owe a servitude as to levees so that compensation for land taken or for resulting damages need not be made where a levee is constructed thereon, is the decision in Hart v. Levee Comrs. (1893) 54 Fed. 559. The court stated that, under the provision of the Code that on the borders of the Mississippi and other navigable streams, where there are levees established according to law, the levee shall form the bank, it follows that no matter what would be the law in other states, in Louisiana, so far as relates to the Mississippi river, the levees established according to law are the banks. Wherever the levees are located, there are the banks of the river. It is conceded that the proper levee authorities have located this levee upon the complainant's lot. Therefore the proper authorities have determined that the present bounds of the river bring it to the land of the complainant, and it is, in the strictest statutory sense, riparian. In other states the river comes to land only when, by the flow of its water, it touches the soil or earth which composes it. In this state, by law and according to legal intendment, the Mississippi river touches land when its artificial banks or levees touch it. Under the operation of this statute the complainant's land is riparian.

But in Pontchartrain R. Co. v. Levee Comrs. (1897) 49 La. Ann. 570, 21 So. 765, it was held that while front proprietors on the Mississippi river or other navigable rivers must yield without compensation the property for levee and road purposes, land not on the river owes no such servitude, and so a railroad company across whose road a levee was constructed was entitled to compensation for land taken, and the cost of elevating the grade and taking up and relaying the tracks. No reference was made to the Hart Case (Fed.) supra, or to the Code provision referred to therein. It may be stated that in this case the court, in answer to the contention that the construction of the levee was an exercise of the police power to which all must submit, and in respect to which no compensation for resulting loss can be claimed, said: "Where land is taken, or the use of it is incommoded, or a burden is imposed on the owner to build a levee, or, to take another illustration, to open a street, the right of the owner to compensation is not to be denied because of the supposed exercise of the police power, but the owner's claim for compensation falls within the operation of the principle that secures compensation when private property is taken for the public utility." This sustains the contention of Eldridge v. Trezevant (1895) 160 U. S. 452, 40 L. ed. 490, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 345, in reviewing the Bass Case.

It is the soil alone which owes the servitude. Mithoff v. Carrollton (1857) 12 La. Ann. 185, and so an owner of buildings in the line of a levee, which have to be destroyed, and which were built at a time when the land owed no servitude, is entitled to compensation for their destruction. The court distinguished this from the Dubose Case (La.) supra, stating that in that case the houses were left standing and the levee was built in the rear of them, while in the instant case the houses were on the line of the new levee, and it was determined that they should be torn down, and an ordinance to that purpose was passed and carried into effect. In holding that the Dubose Case is not decisive in the present case, the court stated that "whilst we acknowledge the correctness of the decision in the Dubose Case, we think a distinction must be made between the resumption of servitude which the soil upon the banks of the Mississippi river alone owes to the public and the destruction of building (placed upon the soil before the servitude becomes due) in order to arrive at the use of such servitude. At the time the owners of the lots for which compensation is claimed built upon them, they owed no immediate servitude to the public of any kind. When they erected the buildings upon them they had the undoubted right to build in such form and manner as they pleased, and were at liberty to put up buildings costly or plain, according to their fancy, whatever that fancy might be. When so erected the buildings were theirs in the highest sense of the term, and the property thereof being vested in them as such owners, they were protected from an expropriation in order to arrive at the servitude which the soil alone came to owe by the Constitution, which requires compensation to be made in such cases. . . . By the wearing away of the bank of the river the safety of the public required the houses . . . to be demolished and a levee to be constructed over the ground occupied by their buildings. Their land, therefore, by virtue of its location and vicinity to the river, became bound under the laws which prescribed the obligation of proprietors of lands bordering upon the river to suffer the servitude of the levee, and nothing more. The buildings had not been put up in violation of any law, and they could not be removed from the soil without compensating the owners for them. The town authorities might, as was done in the Dubose Case, . . . have run the levee behind these buildings or in front, so as not to obstruct them absolutely, and the proprietors could not complain. But when the public, by its proper authorities, chose to pull down the houses, it took from the owners something more than the mere servitude which was due by the soil,—it took a part of the property itself, for which the defendant owes the plaintiff compensation." In a dissenting opinion, Judges Spofford and Lea considered that the doctrine of the Dubose Case was applicable to the instant case, or, at least, so far as the right to recover for buildings necessarily destroyed, and stated that there was no soundness in the distinction that the buildings were put up when the land owed no servitude to the public because the land was not bought with the front on the river, as it is impossible to confine the Mississippi river to its primitive bed, stating that "the banks of navigable rivers, and especially of the Mississippi in this latitude, are constantly undergoing changes by attrition on one side and accretion on the other. If, in the course of time, they reach the land of a proprietor who did not buy originally with a front on the river, he becomes, by that fact alone, subject to all the servitudes imposed by law upon front proprietors: . . . As well might it be contended that the government is bound to warrant such a proprietor against the action of the elements and the encroachments of the river upon his lands, as that he should be exempted from contributing to the public utility, by yielding his land for levee purposes without compensation, when the advancing tide makes such a protection necessary. And it results, as a logical inference, that when the houses he has built are upon land thus invaded by the stream, and rendered indispensable to be used for levee purposes, they, too, like the land on which they are built and of which they form a part, should be yielded up to the public service, without compensation, for it is not the act of man, but the act of God and the law which causes their demolition. By the location of the new levee (if it be lawfully and properly located), it becomes, under article 448 of the Code, the river bank, and no man's houses shall obstruct the bank. Their destruction is necessary to the exercise of the servitude; or, rather, it becomes a part of the servitude. I am, therefore, of the opinion that, under the general principles of law which were recognized and enforced in the Dubose Case, the plaintiffs are entitled to no compensation whatever for their land, nor for such of their houses as stood directly upon the line of the new levee as located."

A case in decided conflict with the Louisiana decision is Hollingsworth v. Tensas Parish (1883) 4 Woods, 280, 17 Fed. 109. This was an action to recover for damages caused by the construction of a levee so as to leave out of its protection certain property, and it was held that the owner of the property was entitled to compensation. The court, after referring to the Louisiana Code provision that the riparian property was subject to servitude as to levees, said that in Louisiana, as well as in all the states, the implied powers are sufficient to warrant the imposition of this service on lands adjacent to navigable rivers, and the imposition of such service may be the offspring of a wise public policy; but the court did not consider that it followed that there was in the state or Federal system any power outside of and apart from the eminent domain rights lawfully, by direct or implied legislation, to take any private property, or take the use of it, or so damage it as to deprive the owner of its use or profit with or without compensation. The court conceded that there was a line of Louisiana decisions denying the right to compensation in such cases, but stated that it was not bound to follow those decisions, as they were employed in giving effect to general principles of law, and not in giving effect to or in the interpretation or construction of state statutes or local laws.

The court in Hart v. Levee Comrs. (1893) 54 Fed. 559, said that in the Hollingsworth Case the court dealt with the authority to locate levees as a question relative to an exercise of the right of eminent domain.

GERTRUDE SICHTERMAN

v.

KENT STORAGE COMPANY et al., Plffs. in Certiorari.

Michigan Supreme Court—February 8, 1922.

(— Mich. —, 186 N. W. 498.)

Workmen's compensation — employee on errand of mercy.

1. Injury to a salesman traveling in his own motor car to make his calls, when he has left his car and gone to the assistance of another person hit by another's automobile on the highway, does not arise out of his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

— injury must have been in the service of the master.

2. To justify an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act the injury must have occurred in the service of the master and by reason thereof.

[See 28 R. C. L. 796 et seq.]

CERTIORARI to the Industrial Accident Board to review its award to claimant in a proceeding by her under the Workmen's Compensation Act to recover compensation for the death of her husband. Award vacated.

Statement by Fellows, Ch. J.:

Harry Sichterman was a traveling salesman in the employ of defendant Kent Storage Company. His territory, which he covered once a week, surrounded Grand Rapids, where he lived and where defendant's place of business was located. He made his territory by automobile, leaving Grand Rapids in the morning and returning at night. Either at night or the following morning he turned in his orders to the company. On November 10, 1920, he made his usual trip for that day, winding up at Freepport. The usually travelled road from that town to Grand Rapids is known as the "Cascade road" and was the one taken by Mr. Sichterman. About 2 miles from Grand Rapids, and after it had grown dark, he came across a peddler, with his wagon at the side of the road. The peddler's wagon had been struck by an automobile about an hour before. Mr. Sichterman drove his car about 25 feet beyond where the peddler was, getting it to the side of the road, and stopped, got out of the machine, and walked back in the road to where the peddler was, and had just asked him if there was anything he could do for him, when he was struck by an automobile and so seriously injured that he shortly after died, leaving a widow, the plaintiff, and a son Robert, only four years old. The defense to the claim for compensation is that the accident did not arise out of and was not received in the course of decedent's employment.

Messrs. Brown & Kelley, for plaintiffs in certiorari:

Accidents to employees in the act of going from their work are not usually regarded as arising out of the employment or in the course thereof. In such cases, it is generally true that the relations of cause and effect between the accident and the duties of the injured employee to his employer in the employment are too vague and incidental to permit the founding of a liability.

Hills v. Blair, 182 Mich. 20, 148 N. W. 243, 7 N. C. C. A. 409; Draper v. University of Michigan, 195 Mich. 455, 161 N. W. 956.

There was no sudden emergency to a fellow employee, or to any person in any manner associated with the business or affairs of the employer.

Waters v. William J. Taylor Co. 218 N. Y. 248, L.R.A.1917A, 347, 112 N. E. 727; General Acci. F. & L. Assur. Corp. v. Evans, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 201 S. W. 705.

There was in any event no causal relation between the employment and the accidental injury; the death of decedent, Sichterman, was not due to the risk or hazard of the employment.

Mr. Martin H. Carmody for defendant in certiorari.

Fellows, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This state, like many of our sister states, has followed the English act in providing that compensation shall be paid in industrial accidents where the accident arises out of and in the course of the employment. The English courts and the courts of this country with uniformity have agreed that both requirements must be met to justify an award. Both requirements are indicative of the underlying thought that compensation is to be awarded when and where the accident occurs in the service of the master.

In an exhaustive note found in L.R.A.1916A, 23, following our case of Rayner v. Sligh Furniture Co. 180 Mich. 168, 146 N. W. 665, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 386, 4 N. C. C. A. 851, the subject of Workmen's Compensation Acts is fully treated. At page 41 of L.R.A.1916A, the editorial writer lays down the general principle: "It may be stated generally that the phrase 'out of and in the course of the employment' embraces only those accidents which happen to a servant while he is engaged in the discharge of some function or duty which he is authorized to undertake, and which is calculated to further, directly or indirectly, the master's business."

The courts recognize the general principles which control, but encounter many difficulties in their application in determining whether the conditions justifying compensation have been met. In considering the case before us we shall first consider the authorities from other jurisdictions, reserving the consideration of our own cases until the last.

The case of Robinson v. State, 93 Conn. 49, 104 Atl. 491, supports plaintiff's contention. The court, however, cites no authorities to sustain its conclusion, and indulges in no reasoning in support of its holding. The English case of Corlett v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. 120 L. T. N. S. 236, 63 Sol. Jo. 115, and the opinion of the court of appeals of Indiana, in Re Raynes, 66 Ind. App. 321, 118 N. E. 387, also have that tendency, although the English case is not fully in accord with Warren v. Hedley's Collieries Co. [1913] W. C. & Ins. Cas. 172, and in the Indiana case the employee had gotten out of the taxicab in which he was riding to allow the driver to get some gasoline, an incident of the trip.

In London & E. Shipping Co. v. Brown, 42 Scot. L. R. 357; Dragovich v. Iroquois Iron Co. 269 Ill. 478, 109 N. E. 999, 10 N. C. C. A. 475; and General Acci. F. & L. Assur. Co. v. Evans, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 201 S. W. 705, liability was sustained where the accident occurred in attempting to rescue a fellow workman from a perilous position, the Illinois court saying: "Under these authorities it is clear that it is the duty of an employer to save the lives of his employees, if possible, when they are in danger while in his employment, and therefore it is the duty of a workman in his employ, when occasion presents itself, to do what he can to save the lives of his fellow employees when all are at the time working in the line of their employment. Any other rule of law would be not only inhuman, but unreasonable and uneconomical, and would, in the end, result in financial loss to employers on account of injuries to their employees. From every point of view it was the duty of the deceased, as a fellow employee, in the line of his duty to his employer, to attempt to save the life of his fellow employee under the circumstances here shown."

The Texas court, treating the question as a new one to that jurisdiction, said: "The question has not been passed upon by any appellate court of this state, so far as we are aware, and in cases in which the question arose in other states the decisions of the courts are at some variance. In some of them it was held that a workman who goes to the rescue of his master or of another workman, and is thereby injured, is not entitled to compensation. But courts of recognized ability have, on the contrary, held that it is the duty of a workman, when the necessity arises, to do what he can to save the life of his fellow employees when they are at the time working in the line or course of their employment."

The court of appeals of New York went a step further, and in Waters v. William J. Taylor Co. 218 N. Y. 248, L.R.A.1917A, 347, 112 N. E. 727, held that there was liability under the New York act where an employee went to the rescue of an employee of another contractor engaged in a common enterprise, and held that liability was not defeated though Waters was "technically" working for another employer. But, in concluding the opinion, it was said: "Of course, what we thus say is to be read in the light of the facts presented on this appeal. There is no trouble in outlining a case where an employee, even with the laudable purpose of helping another, might go so far from his employment and become so thoroughly disconnected from the service of his employer that it would be entirely unreasonable to say that injuries suffered by him arose out of and in the course of his employment. It is sufficient to say that we do not regard the case now presented to us as being such a one as we have suggested."

That the New York court had gone further in the Waters Case than other courts had gone was recognized by that court in Di Salvio v. Menihan Co. 225 N. Y. 123, 121 N. E. 766, where, after reviewing cases from other jurisdictions, it said, referring to the Waters Case: "And this court, perhaps, went farther than any of these cases in extending the benefits of a compensation act."

In the Di Salvio Case the workman wished to say good-by to a fellow workman before he went to the front. In doing so he crossed the room and there received the injuries for which compensation was asked. Both New York cases were written by Justice Hiscock. In the Di Salvio Case he said, speaking for the court after considering the Waters Case and cases from other jurisdictions:

"In each of these cases an award was sustained because the court was able fairly to say that, between the work for which the employee was engaged and the disputed act which led to the accident, there was, either naturally or as the result of some act of the employer or of custom, a real relationship which brought the accident within the range of employment, and, therefore, it could be said to have arisen out of and in the course of the employment.

"But in the present case we search in vain for any such feature or relationship. There was no connection between the employment for which claimant was engaged, of marking soles, and his trip across the shop to say good-by to a fellow employee. This act did not enable him either directly or indirectly, in any tangible sense, the better to perform his work, discharge his duties, or carry forward the interests of his employer. It was not a natural incident to the work for which he was hired. It did not grow out of any emergency where he was justified in taking an unusual step to protect his employer's interests. It was simply and solely the expression of a private desire and the consummation of a personal purpose. However natural and even commendable his act may have been, it was neither beneficial to his employer nor to himself in the way of completing and performing his work."

An English case frequently cited both by the courts of England and of this country is Reed v. Great Western R. Co. 99 L. T. N. S. 781 (also found reported in 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 31, [1909] A. C. 31, 25 Times L. R. 36, 53 Sol. Jo. 31, 2 B. W. C. C. 109), decided by the House of Lords in 1908. The workman, an engineer, left his engine when it was standing at rest to get a book from a fellow employee, and was injured so seriously that he died. It was held that the accident did not arise out of and in the course of the employment.

In Smith v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. 79 L. T. N. S. 633, [1899] 1 Q. B. 141, 68 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 51, 47 Week. Rep. 146, 15 Times L. R. 64, a ticket collector collected the tickets from a certain train, but had not completed his day's work. He got on the footboard to speak to a girl he knew, and was injured. It was held that the accident did not arise out of the employment.

In Murray v. Allan Bros. & Co. [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 193, the employee was injured while watching laborers at work repairing a vessel. He was returning by the shortest way to his place of employment. It was held that the accident did not arise out of the employment.

The supreme court of Illinois in N. K. Fairbank Co. v. Industrial Commission, 285 Ill. 11, 120 N. E. 457, has this to say:

"The Workman's Compensation Act is designed to protect workmen and compensate them for injuries received while performing any duty necessary to be performed in the course of their employment or incidental to it. It was not intended by this act that the employer who comes within the provisions of the act shall be the insurer of the safety of his employee at all times during the period of the employment. The employer is liable for compensation only for an injury which occurs to the employee while performing some act for the employer in the course of his employment, or incidental to it. . . .

"An injury occurs in the course of the employment, within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, when it occurs within the period of the employment at a place where the employee may reasonably be, and while he is reasonably fulfilling the duties of his employment or is engaged in doing something incidental to it."

In O'Toole's Case, 229 Mass. 165, 118 N. E. 303, the decedent, a city employee, was engaged in spreading cracked stone on the roads. A steam roller was used by the city in the work. Deceased went upon the roller at the invitation of the engineer for personal conversation. While there he was injured. In denying liability, the court said: "There are cases which hold that an employee is protected by the Workmen's Compensation Act, although not at the time actually engaged in the work for which he was hired. If the employee is injured in going to or returning from his work upon the master's premises, or on premises available for the purpose, or if during intervals of leisure which occur in the course of his employment he is injured, he may still be within the scope of his employment and entitled to the benefits of the act. Sundine's Case, 218 Mass. 1, L.R.A.1916A, 318, 105 N. E. 433, 5 N. C. C. A. 616. Blovelt v. Sawyer, 6 W. C. C. 16. But the principle of these cases is not applicable where the servant leaves the sphere of his employment for some purpose of his own entirely disconnected with and not in any way incidental to the employment."

The same court, in McNicol's Case, 215 Mass. 497, L.R.A.1916A, 306, 102 N. E. 697, 4 N. C. C. A. 522, had this to say: "It is sufficient to say that an injury is received 'in the course of' the employment when it comes while the workman is doing the duty which he is employed to perform. It 'arises out of' the employment, when there is apparent to the rational mind, upon consideration of all the circumstances, a causal connection between the conditions under which the work is required to be performed and the resulting injury. Under this test, if the injury can be seen to have followed as a natural incident of the work and to have been contemplated by a reasonable person familiar with the whole situation as a result of the exposure occasioned by the nature of the employment, then it arises 'out of' the employment. But it excludes an injury which cannot fairly be traced to the employment as a contributing proximate cause and which comes from a hazard to which the workman would have been equally exposed apart from the employment. The causative danger must be peculiar to the work and not common to the neighborhood. It must be incidental to the character of the business and not independent of the relation of master and servant. It need not have been foreseen or expected, but after the event it must appear to have had its origin in a risk connected with the employment, and to have flowed from that source as a rational consequence."

This court has recognized the principle of this case, as we shall presently see.

Turning now to our own cases, we find that the precise state of facts here involved has not been before the court, although we are persuaded that our former opinions are by analogy controlling. In the recent case of Sebo v. Libby, McNeil & Libby, 216 Mich. 351, 185 N. W. 702, the employee was a gardener; he attempted to stop a runaway team, which was hauling milk consigned to the employer, and received injuries resulting in his death. We held that his act was one to prevent loss to the employer, and was in the furtherance of the employer's business, and sustained liability. But, in Spooner v. Detroit Saturday Night Co. 187 Mich. 125, L.R.A.1916A, 17, 153 N. W. 657, 9 N. C. C. A. 647, where the employee, as a friendly act, took persons up on an elevator he was not employed to run, and while so doing was injured, this court held the master was not liable. Mr. Justice Stone, who wrote for the court, there said: "At the time of the injury we think that he was engaged in an act outside of, and not in the course of, his employment, and the injuries he received and which caused his death did not arise out of and in the course of his employment. The elevator shaft was in pitch darkness, by the undisputed evidence, and in using it he not only risked his own life, but that of the men he took up on the elevator with him. Had he remained in the place where his duties called him and attended to those duties, he would not have been injured, so far as this record shows. The material question is not what he had done at times, for his own convenience or otherwise, while in the employ of Winn & Hammond Company, but the pertinent question is: What was he employed to do upon this night? Manifestly, to run and care for the engine and dynamo. This injury occurred while he was away from his work, and while he was a voluntary visitor to the employee of the appellant, and the act was for his own pleasure or satisfaction." He then considers a Vermont case (Miner v. Franklin County Teleph. Co. 83 Vt. 311, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1195, 75 Atl. 653) and says: "We think the case readily distinguishable from the instant case. In fact it might be said the plaintiff there was in the performance of and carrying on the very work for which he was employed, to wit, he was assisting his foreman, who undoubtedly represented the master. In the instant case Spooner was rendering no service which was either accepted by or known to his superior, but was engaged in a voluntary, friendly act, entirely outside the scope of his employment, upon the night in question."

In Carnahan v. Mailometer Co. 201 Mich. 153, 167 N. W. 9, the employee, by direction of the shipping clerk, delivered a heavy case of books to the home of one of the stockholders. He delivered it with safety to himself. At the request of the maid, and prompted by chivalrous motives, he carried the books upstairs. This extra strain produced the injury. After considering whether the delivery of the books was labor in the master's service, Mr. Justice Steere, speaking for the court, said: "But passing these questions, and even conceding that in rendering this casual service, as directed, to a stockholder of the corporation during the noon hour, plaintiff was in the usual course of his employment, because obeying an order emanating from the manager under whom he was employed, his own testimony shows that he had executed the order as given, and fully performed the service directed before the accident occurred. Neither the nature of his employment nor the special order given him by the shipping clerk can be said to contemplate that after he had succeeded in delivering this heavy box, weighing 140 pounds and containing 100 books, as he estimated, at Mr. Hunt's residence, he would then, at the unreasonable request of some woman whom he hated to refuse, undertake to carry it on his back up a winding stair to the second floor,—an undertaking on which he 'wouldn't take a chance even around the factory' with which he was employed. There is no competent evidence in the case to support the finding that an injury resulting from such an undertaking arose out of and in the course of his employment."

These three cases we think clearly show the line of demarcation. In Case the act was one in the interest, for his benefit and prance of his business, and was sustained. In the Case the act was a friendly stranger, not in furtherance of the master's business; in the Case, the act was an act of a stranger, not in furtherance of the master's business; in both these cases the act which caused the injury did not arise out of the employment and liability was denied. This court has constantly kept in mind the provision of the statute that the accident must arise out of the employment will be determined by an examination of the facts, to a few of which we shall refer. In Clark v. Michigan, 189 Mich. 652, 155 N. W. 2d, the claimant was injured by a fire caused by a party attacking the master for whom he was at the time. Mr. Justice Bird, speaking for the court, said: "It may have been commendable in him to volunteer to assist his brother against the fire at odds, but that does not properly answer the question whether his acts had with reference to the employment. He was not called upon to protect his master's property on the previous day. He was asked to assist his master's property on the second day. His act was purely a voluntary one, and seems to us no different than if he had discovered the fire while fighting with his brother and afterward ten blocks away. Although claimant had observed the fire going on across the street and had gone there to get a better view while there had been no firing of missile and injured. Claimant remained at his work and did not have been injured. Hence at the place of fighting the fire, there was no demand of payment."

Shall v. Baker-Vawter Co., 189 Mich. 466, 173 N. W. 191, the claimant was foreman of the company, and was shot by the master. The board found that the injury was fired through personal animosity and denied liability. We affirmed the award because of the finding of the board on the disputed question of fact, but recognized the doctrine of McNicol's Case, supra.

In Tarpper v. Weston-Mott Co., 200 Mich. 275, L.R.A.1918E, 507, 166 N. W. 857, we held that, where the injury resulted from "larking," as our English brethren term it (Fitzgerald v. W. G. Clarke & Son [1908] 2 K. B. 796, 77 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1018, 99 L. T. N. S. 101, 1 B. W. C. C. 197; Federal Rubber Mfg. Co. v. Havolic, 162 Wis. 341, L.R.A. 1916D, 968, 156 N. W. 143), there could be no recovery. The injury may occur when the employee is at work for the master, and be produced by a fellow workman, but it does not arise out of the employment, and as we there said: "That the injury suffered by the employee must arise out of the employment as well as in the course of the employment is well settled by our own decisions."

The following cases are of interest: Bayer v. Bayer, 191 Mich. 423, 158 N. W. 109; Bischoff v. American Car & Foundry Co. 190 Mich. 229, 157 N. W. 34; *Kennelly v. This unfortunate accident occurred when deceased was performing an act of humanity, entirely dissociated from the master's work. It did not arise out of the employment.

PAULINE STANSBERRY et al., Respts., v.

MONITOR STOVE COMPANY, Appt.

Minnesota Supreme Court—July 15, 1921.

(— Minn. —, 183 N. W. 977.)

Workmen's compensation — right of traveling salesman.

1. A traveling salesman employed in connection with the business localized in this state, is within the Minnesota act, though injured by accident outside of the state.

[See note on this question beginning on page 319.]

— application of statute to foreign corporation.

2. An Ohio corporation whose northwestern business is localized at a Minneapolis branch is, as to employees of that branch, within the Minnesota Compensation Act.

— death in hotel fire — right to compensation.

3. Where a traveling salesman, obliged to stop at hotels in the course of his travel and to furnish his employer with a list of the cities on his itinerary, the names of the hotels at which he is to stop, and the time he is to be at each hotel, is killed while attempting to escape during a fire in one of such hotels in which he is stopping, compensation may be recovered.

Headnotes by HALLAM, J.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Hennepin County (Jelley, J.) to review a judgment in favor of claimants in a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act to recover compensation for the death of their husband and father. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr A. A. Tennen, for appellant:

The Minnesota Workmen's Compensation Act has no extraterritorial application to a contract of employment entered into in this state, which is to be wholly and exclusively performed in North Dakota, which state has a compulsory, monopolistic, and mandatory compensation act applicable to every employer and employee operating within its borders.

v. Industrial Bd. 274 Ill. 70, 113 N. E. 110, 12 N. C. C. A. 652.

Hallam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Frank J. Stansberry was a traveling salesman for defendant company. While in the Frederic Hotel at Grand Forks, North Dakota, a fire broke out at night and Stansberry was killed while attempting to escape. His widow and minor children made claim for compensation under the Minnesota Workmen's Compensation Statute (Gen. Stat. 1913, §§ 8195-8230). The claim was allowed. Defendant appeals.

1. Defendant is an Ohio corporation. It manufactures and sells furnaces. It maintains a permanent branch office, warehouse, and agency in Minneapolis, Minnesota. The sale and distribution of furnaces in the Northwest, including Minnesota and North Dakota, are made through the Minneapolis agency. Stansberry was employed by the Minneapolis branch and worked under its direction. For purposes of this case the situation is the same as though the head office instead of a branch were located in Minnesota. The business in which Stansberry was employed had a situs in this state.

Workmen's compensation—application of statute to foreign corporation.

2. The territory in which Stansberry traveled was for the most part in North Dakota. The business in which he was engaged was localized in this state, and in such a case our Compensation Act applies and compensates for injuries in a service incident to its conduct sustained beyond the borders of the state. State ex rel. Chambers v. District Ct. 139 Minn. 205, 3 A.L.R. 1347, 166 N. W. 185 (distinguishing Johnson v. Nelson, 128 Minn. 158, 150 N. W. 620); State ex rel. Maryland Casualty Co. v. District Ct. 140 Minn. 427, 168 N. W. 177; State ex rel. McCarthy Bros. Co. v. District Ct. 141 Minn. 61, 169 N. W. 274.

3. A more difficult question is whether the death of Stansberry was due to an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment as provided in Gen. Stat. 1913, § 8195. The death of Stansberry was accidental as that term is used in the act. The fact that death resulted from an attempt to escape from the fire puts the case in no different position from what it would have been had he perished in the fire.

The court found that Stansberry lost his life "while in the act of furthering the interests and business of the defendant and while engaged in saving certain property of the defendant, and then and there in his possession, and in attempting to save his life." The property referred to was a portfolio containing advertising matter, a sales order book, report sheet, and advertising samples. We should not predicate liability on the fact of the efforts of Stansberry to save these small items of property.

The important facts are that he was a traveling salesman engaged in the service of his employer. As such he was obliged to stop at hotels in the course of his travels and to furnish the Minneapolis office with a list of the cities on his itinerary and the names of the hotels at which he was to stop and how long he was to be at each hotel, and it was his duty to carry out such schedule. He had given Grand Forks as one of such cities and the Frederic Hotel as his stopping place there. The question is whether such an injury received while stopping there arose out of and in the course of his employment. We think it did.

In State ex rel. Chambers v. District Ct. supra, it was held that a traveling representative, injured by the overturning of an automobile used by him in the course of his travels, was within the statute.

In State ex rel. McCarthy Bros. Co. v. District Ct. supra, it was held that a traveling representative, drowned while using a boat to catch a train during a flood was within the statute.

In Foley v. Home Rubber Co. 39 N. J. L. J. 115, a salesman who lost his life on the sinking of the Lusitania was held within the act.

In Chitty v. Nelson, 2 B. W. C. C. 496, a servant in a hotel, occupying a room in a hotel in order to perform her duties as servant, who was suffocated in a fire that broke out in the nighttime, was held within the act.

In Re Bollman, — Ind. App. —, 126 N. E. 639, a threshing-machine man, sleeping in a barn on a farm where the machine was operating, injured while asleep by the falling of a wagon box, was held within the act.

In Marshall v. The Wild Rose [1910] A. C. 486, 79 L. J. K. B. N. S. 912, 103 L. T. N. S. 114, 26 Times L. R. 608, 54 Sol. Jo. 678, 3 B. W. C. C. 514, a sailor left his berth in the night and went on deck, and next day was found missing. No recovery was allowed, but it was said that if it appeared that deceased was washed overboard, even at a time when he was sleeping, recovery would have been permitted.

In Blovelt v. Sawyer, 73 L. J. K. B. N. S. 155, [1904] 1 K. B. 271, 68 J. P. 110, 52 Week. Rep. 503, 89 L. T. N. S. 658, 20 Times L. R. 105, 6 W. C. C. 16, a bricklayer, while eating dinner on the premises of his employer, injured by the collapse of a wall, was held within the act.

Our decision that the case is within the statute seems to us in harmony with the principle of our former decisions and with the weight of authority elsewhere.

Forman v. Industrial Acci. Commission, 31 Cal. App. 441, 160 Pac. 857, and Kass v. Herschberg, S. & Co. 191 App. Div. 300, 181 N. Y. Supp. 35, relied on by counsel for relator, seem to us fairly distinguishable. In the California case the employee was selling real estate on commission, and, for an indefinite time, was located in the town and quartered at the hotel where he was injured. In the New York case it was held that the employer, engaged in the business of "wholesale dress trimmings," was not within the New York Act. Anything further said in the opinion would seem to be obiter.

Gen. Stat. 1913, § 82,301, provides that the act is declared "not to cover workmen except while engaged in, on, or about the premises where their services are being performed, or where their service requires their presence as a part of such service at the time of the injury, and during the hours of service as such workmen."

Relator's counsel argue persuasively that the above language excludes this case. If the question were a new one it would be worthy of grave consideration. But we think the language permits recovery in this case as clearly as in the Chambers or McCarthy Cases.

Affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Workmen's compensation: death or injury while traveling as arising out of and in the course of employment.

- I. Introduction, 319.
- II. While at hotel, 320.
- III. While traveling on boat or train, 321.
- IV. While traveling in taxi or automobile, 322.

I. Introduction.

Death of, or injury to, train employees, is not within the scope of the annotation.

- V. While waiting or resting, 322.
- VI. While going toward station, hotel, conveyance, or home, 323.
- VII. While going home for week-end, 325.
- VIII. While performing work, 326.

Attention is called to the fact that the question of the extraterritorial operation of workmen's compensation acts was involved in STANSBERRY v.

MONITOR STOVE Co. (reported herewith) ante, 316, and also in State ex rel. McCarthy Bros. Co. v. District Ct. (1918) 141 Minn. 61, 169 N. W. 274, and State ex rel. Chambers v. District Ct. (1918) 139 Minn. 205, 3 A.L.R. 1347, 166 N. W. 185, which are included in this annotation. The general question as to extraterritorial operation of workmen's compensation statutes and conflict of laws is covered in the annotation in 3 A.L.R. 1351, which is supplemented in the note appended to Crane v. Leonard, Crossette & Riley, 18 A.L.R. 285.

As to injury while riding to or from work in employer's conveyance, as arising out of or in the course of employment within meaning of workmen's compensation acts, see annotation in 10 A.L.R. 169.

As a general rule the phrase "out of and in the course of the employment" embraces only those accidents which happen to an employee while he is engaged in the discharge of some function or duty which he is authorized to undertake, and which is calculated to further, directly or indirectly, the master's business. Considerable difficulty is encountered in applying this rule, however, and the decision in each case depends to a great extent upon the facts and circumstances.

II. While at Hotel.

In STANSBERRY v. MONITOR STOVE Co. (reported herewith) ante, 316, it was held that the employee's death was the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, where it appeared that he was a traveling salesman, obliged to stop at hotels, keep his employer informed of and carry out his schedule, and was killed while attempting to save his life and certain property of his employer from destruction by a fire in the hotel at which he was stopping. The court stated that the fact that the employee's death resulted from an attempt to escape from the fire in the hotel put the case in no different position than it would have been had he perished in the fire.

In two cases involving circumstances somewhat similar to those in STANSBERRY v. MONITOR STOVE Co. (reported herewith), a contrary result has been reached.

Thus, in Forman v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1916) 31 Cal. App. 441, 160 Pac. 857, where one employed to sell real estate on commission, with no regular working hours, was directed to go to a certain town for the purpose of selling real estate and remain indefinitely, and while stopping at a hotel at that place was injured by a fire which occurred in the hotel at night, it was held that his injuries were not sustained by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. The court in STANSBERRY v. MONITOR STOVE Co. (reported herewith) stated that this case was distinguishable, as the salesman was to be located at the hotel for an indefinite time.

And in Kass v. Hirschberg, S. & Co. (1920) 191 App. Div. 300, 181 N. Y. Supp. 35, the court, after holding that the employer's occupation was not a hazardous one within the act, said in effect that the injury did not arise out of or in the course of the employment where the employee, a traveling salesman who had taken a room at a hotel, gave instructions that he was not to be disturbed on Sunday, and on Monday morning was found asphyxiated, apparently due to the negligence of the management of the hotel. The court said: "But, assuming that the employer was a manufacturer of 'articles from textiles or fabrics,' and that the decedent was away from the plant in the employment of the employer, can it be said that a traveling salesman, retiring to a hotel and injured through the negligence of the management of the hotel, is a legitimate subject for compensation? A hotel, in contemplation of law, is a temporary home (15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 766, and authorities there cited), and it is difficult to understand how an employee of a manufacturing plant, going to his own home and retiring for the night, can be said to have sustained an injury within the definition of the statute. The act provides (§ 3, subd. 7) that "injury" and "personal injury" mean only accidental injuries arising out of and in the course of employment,' and surely the accident here under consideration did not arise out of the employment. The accident arose out of the negligence not of the master, but of a third party. It was not a whit different than an accident of the same character which might have happened at the decedent's own home after his day's work was done. While the statute, as amended by chapter 622 of the Laws of 1916, has enlarged the liability of employers, it has not had the effect of insuring their employees generally against those accidents which are common to mankind; it is only as to accidents 'arising out of and in the course of employment.' Dose v. Moehle Lithographic Co. (1917) 221 N. Y. 405, 117 N. E. 616, 16 N. C. C. A. 633. The act does not afford compensation for injuries or misfortunes which merely are contemporaneous or coincident with the employment, or collateral to it. Not every diseased person, suffering a misfortune while at work for an employer, is entitled to compensation. The personal injury must be the result of an employment and flow from it as the inducing proximate cause. The direct connection between the personal injury as a result and the employment as its proximate cause must be proved by the facts before the right to compensation springs into being. Mad-den's Case (1916) 222 Mass. 487, L.R.A.1916D, 1000, 111 N. E. 379; Alpert v. Powers (1918) 223 N. Y. 101, 119 N. E. 229. The accident here under consideration had no relation to the employment, the decedent was not doing anything for the employer at the time of the accident, and there is no ground for this award." The court in STANSBERRY v. MONITOR STOVE CO. (reported herewith) ante, 316, sought to distinguish this case, stating that the observations on the above point were merely obiter.

III. While traveling on boat or train.

A traveling salesman who lost his life by the torpedoing of the vessel upon which he was sailing in the course of his employment and with the knowledge of the employer, by a war vessel, may be found to have suffered death from accident arising out of the employment. Foley v. Home Rubber Co. (1917) 89 N. J. L. 474, 99 Atl. 624, affirmed without opinion in (1917) 91 N. J. L. 323, 102 Atl. 1053. The court said: "It (the employer) was bound to take notice that a condition of war existed between Great Britain and Germany, and that ships of the enemy were subject to be captured or destroyed by such warring nations. This was a danger reasonably to be apprehended. This danger attached itself to every traveler on an enemy ship, whether engaged in the pursuit of pleasure or in the course of his or her employment."

And in Nisbet v. Payne [1910] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 689, 80 L. J. K. B. N. S. 84, 103 L. T. N. S. 178, 26 Times L. R. 632, 54 Sol. Jo. 719, 3 B. W. C. C. 507, 3 N. C. C. A. 268, where a cashier whose regular duty required him to carry large sums of money by train to pay wages was shot while traveling in a train in discharge of this duty, and the money stolen, it was held that he sustained an accident which arose out of and in the course of the employment.

But a clerk in the auditing department of a railroad, who is traveling under orders to check up the accounts of an agent at a station on the road, is not acting within the course of his employment; within the meaning of the Compensation Act, in leaving the train when an injured passenger attempts to board it, even though he intends to aid in caring for the injured man if called upon to do so, so as to be entitled to compensation, if injured when attempting to re-enter the train. Northwestern P. R. Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 174 Cal. 297, L.R.A.1918A, 286, 163 Pac. 1000.

And a workman required to travel by train is outside the scope of his employment in attempting to mount a train while in motion, although it was necessary for him to take that particular train in order to keep an appointment made for him by his employers. Jibb v. Chadwick [1915] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 94, 31 Times L. R. 185, [1915] W. N. 52, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1241, 112 L. T. N. S. 878, 8 B. W. C. C. 152. Lord Cozens-Hardy, M. R., and Swinfen Eady, L. J., pointed out that if it was his duty to take that train in order to keep his appointment with his employers, it was also his duty to be at the station in time to take such train in a proper manner; and it was also pointed out that there was nothing in the evidence to show that his employment had prevented him from being at the station in proper time.

IV. While traveling in taxi or automobile.

It will be observed that in SICHTERMAN v. KENT STORAGE CO. (reported herewith) ante, 309, where a traveling salesman who covered his territory by automobile stopped his machine while returning at night after having visited his customers, and was struck by another automobile when walking back to assist a traveler, it was held that the injury did not arise out of the employment, but occurred while the employee was performing an act of humanity entirely disassociated from the employer's work.

In Re Raynes (1917) 66 Ind. App. 321, 118 N. E. 387, it was held that if an employee who had charge of the collection of accounts went to an adjoining city exclusively to collect accounts, and, in spite of having been diligently engaged in such work, was unable to complete it until the last car had gone, and was injured while on the way home in a taxicab, the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment; but that, if the collecting of accounts was a mere incident of a trip which was taken mainly for his own pleasure, and he missed the car because the sociabilities of the occasion caused him to become oblivious of time, the injury did not arise out of or in the course of the employment.

In Messer v. Manufacturers Light & Heat Co. (1919) 263 Pa. 5, 106 Atl. 85, an engineer who was on his vacation with pay, but subject to call, was held to have sustained an injury by accident in the course of his employment, where the superintendent of the company employing him telephoned him to inspect a certain pumping station, located in another town, to increase his efficiency, and he was injured while driving his automobile, although the accident apparently occurred after he had turned the machine toward home.

So, a millwright whose duties were to assist in the manufacture and assembling of machinery, and who, whenever his employer secured a contract for the installation of machinery in any particular place, was required to go to that place for the purpose of installing it, is entitled to compensation for injuries in an automobile accident which occurred while he was traveling to a place to install machinery. London & L. Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 35 Cal. App. 681, 170 Pac. 1074.

V. While waiting or resting.

Attention may also be called to Re Bollman (1920) — Ind. App. —, 126 N. E. 639, where one employed as an engineer with a threshing outfit, going from farm to farm, was required to stay with the outfit at night to watch the machinery, and was killed by a wagon body falling on him while he was sleeping in a barn on a farm to which the machinery had been moved for threshing, and it was held that the injury arose out of and in the course of the employment.

A commercial traveler who goes to a town, but makes no attempt to transact business, and becomes intoxicated, and while at the station awaiting the train home is injured by a passing train, does not suffer injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. R. & J. M'Crae v. Renfrew (1914) 51 Scot. L. R. 467, 7 B. W. C. C. 898. The lord justice clerk said: "The only statement of fact regarding his being there is that he got himself into such a state of intoxication that when he went to a second public house, his condition was such that he was refused when he asked for a drink because he was intoxicated. He was therefore unfit for business, and was not in the course of his employment. He had chosen to take a course of conduct which was inconsistent with his actions being in the course of his employment. I cannot for my part accept the idea that, having gone out of the course of his employment, he entered it again that night because he set off in his staggering, drunken state to endeavor to get home. To me it appears just to say that a man, the course of whose ordinary employment would cover his return home after a journey, may break off from the course of his employment, and that it is entirely a question of circumstances whether he can be held to have taken up the course of his employment again merely because he later proceeds to make his way home."

VI. While going toward station, hotel, conveyance, or home.

In Re Harraden (1917) 66 Ind. App. 298, 118 N. E. 142, it was held that an insurance agent suffered an injury arising out of his employment, when he slipped on an icy sidewalk in going from the station to a hotel, in a town to which the insurance company had sent him. The court said: "In the case at bar the duties of the employee required him to visit towns and cities at a considerable distance from the home office, without regard to conditions of the weather. The localities to which he was sent in the discharge of the duties of his employment constituted the place or places in which he was required to work. By reason of his employment he was at the place where he was injured. He was where his employment took him, and the hazard of the icy street was incidental to such employment. This proposition is not changed by the fact that the public, generally, in that vicinity, was exposed to the hazards of the icy street. The facts show that Harraden's employment exposed him to increased hazards, generally, among which was the one which caused his injury. The admitted facts compel the inference that the injury of Harraden resulted from conditions produced by the weather, and likewise because he was in the particular locality at the time in question. The latter fact is due to his employment. The facts admit of no other inference but that for his employment he would not have been in that locality at the time of his injury. His employment was, therefore, a contributing proximate cause of his injury. By reason of it, he was exposed to a hazard which, in all reasonable probability, he would not otherwise have encountered. The work he was employed to do required travel and made him particularly subject to hazards, to an extent far greater than like hazards encountered by the general public."

And in Bachman v. Waterman (1918) 68 Ind. App. 580, 121 N. E. 8, where a salesman was employed to sell flour in Indianapolis and surrounding territory, the evidence was held to justify a finding that the injury arose out of and in the course of his employment, there being testimony that he was struck by an automobile about 5 o'clock in the afternoon while crossing the street, going in the direction of prospective customers' places of business, and also proceeding toward a street car which would have taken him to his home, from which it was his custom to telephone the orders he had taken to the office.

And in J. E. Porter Co. v. Industrial Commission (1921) 301 Ill. 76, 133 N. E. 652, it was held that the injury to a traveling salesman arose out of and in the course of his employment, where, on his return from a trip, he went to his home for his lunch, and as he was about to board a street car to go from his home to his employer's factory to settle up for the week, turn in his expense account, and collect his salary, he was struck by an automobile.

And in Haddock v. Edgewater Steel Co. (1919) 263 Pa. 120, 106 Atl. 196, where an engineer employed on a salary, with no fixed hours of service, was instructed by the president of the company for which he worked to go to a certain city and inspect a plant for the purpose of obtaining information to be used by the company, it was held that he was injured by accident during the course of his employment, upon it appearing that he went to the place in question, examined the plant, and returned by train to his home city, where he arrived at night, and that while on the way to his residence to spend the night he was struck by an automobile. The court said: "This is not the case of an employee injured, after regular working hours, on the way to his home; and we agree with the court below that there is nothing upon the record to show Haddock had, at the time of the accident, 'ceased to be active in the furtherance of his employer's business.' True, the facts as found indicate that plaintiff's husband intended stopping at his own residence, to sleep for the night, before reporting the results of his trip of investigation to the president of the defendant corporation; but, none the less, he was still upon his employer's errand, and, in that sense, actually engaged in the furtherance of the latter's business or affairs. Since deceased was compelled to return to the city at an hour when he could not at once communicate with his superior, and had to stay somewhere until he could report, he cannot be charged with a departure from his employer's service because, when hurt, he was going to his home for a lodging, rather than to a hotel; hence the findings of the referee are ample to sustain the ultimate conclusion upon which the award of compensation rests, to the effect that plaintiff's husband met his death by accident during the course of his employment with the defendant company."

And a salesman engaged in selling the wares of his employer in any territory to which he was sent, who was paid by commission on the amount of his sales, and who, by the direction of the employer, used a horse and conveyance which belonged to another employee, and who was injured while being driven back to the stable after the day's work was done, suffered injury by accident arising out of his employment. Duffield v. Peers (1916) 37 Ont. L. Rep. 652, 32 D. L. R. 339.

And in Chase v. Emery Mfg. Co. (1921) 271 Pa. 265, 113 Atl. 840, an injury to a traveling salesman, growing out of courtesy extended to a customer, was held to have been within the course of his employment, where it appeared that his duties required him to be attentive in securing orders, and also courteous and obliging, and frequently, to aid in making sales, to perform services not strictly relating to sales.

But an employee of a sugar company whose duty required him to inspect plants in different places is not, after his return from a tour of inspection to his own city, within his employment when injured by slipping upon the ice while running to get a street car to return to his home, so as to render his employers liable to compensation, the danger of slipping upon the street not being a hazard incidental to the employment of those who are called upon to make journeys between towns on business missions. Hopkins v. Michigan Sugar Co. (1915) 184 Mich. 87, L.R.A.1916A, 310, 150 N. W. 325.

And it has been held that a traveling salesman, who, after completing his business with a customer in a town away from the employer's place of business, slipped on the ice and received an injury while on his way to an electric car to go to another place where he was to transact business, did not suffer an injury arising out of the employment, the court holding that the risk of slipping upon the icy pavement was common to the public who had occasion to pass over it on foot. Donahue's Case (1917) 226 Mass. 595, L.R.A.1918A, 215, 116 N. E. 226, 14 N. C. C. A. 491. The court said: "An injury arises out of the employment when there is a causal connection between the conditions under which the work is to be performed and the resulting injury. An injury cannot be found to have arisen out of the employment unless the employment was a distributing proximate cause. If the risk of injury to the employee was one to which he would have been equally exposed apart from his employment, then the injury does not arise out of it." This seems to be an extreme decision. It is to be noted that the place where the employee received his injury was not the place of the employee's business, nor in the vicinity of his own home. He was required to be in this place solely because of the employment, and the evidence showed that the sidewalks were very slippery from the ice, and he was obliged to walk in the street because of the condition of the sidewalks. It would appear that the decisions of the Indiana and California courts are more reasonable in their construction of the acts."

And in Wilson v. H. C. Frick Coke Co. (1920) 268 Pa. 256, 110 Atl. 723, it was held that the injury was not due to an accident while in the course of his employment, where a day laborer, ordered by his foreman to go on a certain night to another place to be examined by a physician, did not go until the following night, and, when returning and crossing a river, was drowned.

And in Continental Casualty Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1920) — Cal. App. —, 190 Pac. 849, it was held that an injury to a sales manager did not arise out of his employment where he was spending his vacation on a ranch 5 miles from a railroad station, and went to the postoffice on horseback, filled out his questionnaire and finished a reply to a business letter to his employer, and, after mailing these, mounted his horse to return to the ranch, and was thrown therefrom and injured. The court stated that he was no more entitled to claim compensation from his employer for such injury than he would have been while he was traveling from his home to the place where his vacation was to be spent.

VII. While going home for week-end.

In State ex rel. McCarthy Bros. Co. v. District Ct. (1918) 141 Minn. 61, 169 N. W. 274, where a salesman for a Minnesota grain brokerage concern who received a salary and traveling expenses, excepting board and lodging, resided in North Dakota, and transacted business on Saturday across the Missouri river from his home, and was drowned while attempting to go home on Sunday by crossing the river, which flooded the railroad track, it was held that the injury arose out of and in the course of the employment. The court said: "It is urged that decedent was not within the protection of the Minnesota Workmen's Compensation Act at the time of his death, because it appears that he did not come to his death by reason of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment; that at the time of the accident he had been through with his work since the preceding day; that there was no necessity for his getting home on Sunday; that in order to do so he undertook an extremely hazardous trip for his own purposes, and not in connection with the business of his employers. We are unable to agree with these contentions. Decedent's duties required his traveling from place to place in his territory, which was several hundred miles from his employer's place of business. It was proper that he have some regular or fixed place for communicating with his employers. His home was near his field of labor. He made it his headquarters as well as his retreat for over Sunday, as he properly would, and as his employers must naturally have expected and intended he should do. Indeed all of the correspondence between them so indicates. We see no reason why he might not properly, and without stepping outside the scope of his employment, return to his home from his field of labor on the Sabbath day."

In International Harvester Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1918) 282 Ill. 489, 118 N. E. 711, where the deceased workman was employed to go to places within a radius of about 8 miles of Detroit to assemble agricultural machinery, and was expected to stay on each job until it was finished unless he received orders to the contrary, it was held that the accident resulting in his death did not arise out of and in the course of his employment, there being testimony showing that he was sent to a certain place to set up three machines, and that, while working on the last one, without instructions or authority, he started the middle of Saturday afternoon for Detroit to spend Sunday, and was killed when the jitney bus in which he was riding to the station was struck by a train, the trip being unauthorized and unnecessary so far as the company was concerned.

In Larke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1916) 90 Conn. 303, L.R.A. 1916E, 584, 97 Atl. 320, 12 N. C. C. A. 308, the injury was held to have arisen out of and in the course of the employment where one employed as a soliciting and collecting agent for an insurance company left home early on a cold winter morning, and drove 15 or 20 miles in the regular course of his business, going in and out of heated buildings while making calls, and suffered frostbites, which developed into erysipelas and death. The court said: "An attempt to frame an all-embracing definition so as to include all injuries arising in the course of one's employment would probably prove its inadequacy under the changing conditions of time. In a general way, sufficient for this case, and perhaps helpful in the consideration of other cases, we may say that an injury to an employee is said to arise in the course of his employment when it occurs within the period of his employment, at a place where he may reasonably be, and while he is reasonably fulfilling the duties of his employment, or engaged in doing something incidental to it. 'In the course of' points to the place and circumstances under which the accident takes place and the time when it occurred. . . . The period of employment has sometimes been held to cover a period other than that for which wages are paid. The place of employment in some cases has been held to include the places upon the master's premises traversed by the employee in going to and from his work, and the places used by the employee with the master's consent. The duty ancillary or incident to the employment has, in some instances, been held to include the doing of something primarily for the benefit of the employee, but ultimately, it is assumed, for the master, as the preparation of a noon-hour lunch, or the doing of something by the employee which he reasonably believes is for the master's interest. These distinctions and their application to given cases furnish difficult questions for decision. The circumstances surrounding the case of Mr. Larke are free from these difficulties. He contracted frostbite while driving from place to place upon his master's business in the customary way and in a way known to the master, and therefore he suffered his injury, as the trial court found, in the course of his employment. Passing the claim for a correction of the finding, the most seriously contested question is whether the injury of the decedent arose 'out of' his employment. An injury which occurs in the course of the employment will ordinarily arise out of the employment; but not necessarily so, for the injury might occur out of an act or omission for the exclusive benefit of the employee, or of another than the master, while the employee is engaged in the course of his employment. In order to restrict, beyond the reach of question, the words 'in the course of the employment,' the words 'arising out of' were added, so that the proof of the one without the other will not bring a case within the act. The term 'arising out of' in this act points to the origin or cause of the injury. Fitzgerald v. W. G. Clarke & Son [1908] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 799, 77 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1018, 99 L. T. N. S. 101, 1 B. W. C. C. 197. It presupposes a causal connection between the employment and the injury. Speaking generally, an injury 'arises out of' an employment when it occurs in the course of the employment and as a proximate cause of it. An injury which is a natural and necessary incident or consequence of the employment, though not foreseen or expected, arises out of it. . . . If the nature of the employment, or the conditions under which it was pursued, or the exposure to injury it entails, or the doing of something incidental to the employment, was a proximate cause of injury, it arises out of the employment. An injury of this description is one of the risks of the employment for it is due to it and arises from it, either directly or as incident to the conditions and exposure attending it. And the proximate cause of the injury is not necessarily that which immediately arises out of the employment, but may be that which is reasonably incidental to it. The conditions of employment which expose the employee to an injury which arises out of the employment are such as are peculiar to this employment, and not such exposures to which an ordinary person is subjected. It is therefore immaterial where the exposure originates, whether from the employment or outside of it. In the case the conditions of danger are the conduct of the employment itself: in the other the conditions of danger which arise outside the employment, but are peculiar to it, as in Amys v. Barton [1912] 1 K. (Eng.) 40, 105 L. T. N. S. 619, 110 W. N. 205, 81 L. J. K. B. N. S. 101, 10 Times L. R. 29, 5 B. W. C. C. 101. Mann v. Glastonbury Knitting Co. [1916] 90 Conn. 116, L.R.A. 1916D, 110 Atl. 368, 12 N. C. C. A. 891. But where the injury results from something which the employment neither required nor expected in a place where his employment exposed him to, it cannot be said to be out of the employment. Under the conditions under which Larke was employed his employment exposed him to the danger of frostbite, and this danger was peculiar to his employment and not shared by the ordinary workman. No causal connection between frostbite and the employment can be found. If the employment brings about no greater exposure to injury than results from natural causes, it neither contributes to produce nor to aggravate their effect, as lightning, or severe heat or cold, to which persons generally in that locality, whether so employed or not, are equally exposed, there is no causal connection between the employment and the injury; but where 'the employment brings with it greater exposure and injury results,' the injury does arise out of the employment. Turning to the finding, we think it presents a clear case of an employee injured as a result of a greater exposure to the elements than persons in that locality are ordinarily subjected. Mr. Larke's employment, which compelled him to drive 15 or 20 miles on a very cold day, going in and out of heated houses, in making upward of fifty calls, exposed him to the severity of the weather and to the danger of frostbite very much more than the ordinary person in that locality was exposed. The risk of frostbite to Mr. Larke was either created or greatly aggravated by his employment, which subjected him to open-air work in severe cold." And in State ex rel. Chambers v. District Ct. (1918) 139 Minn. 205, 3 A.L.R. 1347, 166 N. W. 185, where one was employed by a grain brokerage firm to solicit business in Minnesota and other states, and was killed by the overturning of an automobile, furnished by the employer, while he was using it in the course of his employment in North Dakota, the court stated that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment. The point at issue in the case, however, was as to whether compensation could be awarded for an accident occurring outside the state of Minnesota.

And where a workman was employed to travel and inspect scrap iron consigned to his employees at various railroad stations, it was held that his injury arose out of and in the course of his employment, upon its appearing that, in returning from an inspection to a warehouse and crossing the lines of the railroad while shunting operations were in progress, contrary to rules, he was killed. Sanderson v. Henry Wright (1914) 110 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 517, 30 Times L. R. 279, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 177, 7 B. W. C. C. 141. J. T. W.

v.

CARLOS CORBETT, Respt.

Judgment — bar to subsequent prosecution — separate killing by single act.

1. The shooting of three men by separate shots as fast as they could be fired, in an attempt to protect the habitation and person of the one doing the shooting from their aggression, is not a single act within the rule that acquittal upon trial of an indictment for shooting one is a bar to a prosecution for shooting another by the same act.

Pleading — effect of demurrer.

2. A demurrer to a plea admits the allegations of fact contained in it.

Appeal — exceptions to properly striking testimony from record.

3. Exceptions to the striking out of testimony improperly incorporated in a transcript for appeal will be dismissed.

Pleading — demurrer — admission of inference drawn from facts.

4. A demurrer does not admit an inference drawn by the pleader from the facts stated.

Judgment — separate offenses from single act.

5. Even though the killing of several men in rapid succession in an attempt to defend the person and habitation of the one doing the killing from their attacks could be regarded as but a single act, the result may constitute more than one offense, so that acquittal on a trial for killing one will not prevent a prosecution for killing another.

Pleading — right to answer over after overruling of demurrer.

6. The state may, upon overruling of its demurrer to a plea in a criminal case, be accorded the privilege of answering over.

APPEAL by the state from an order of the General Sessions Circuit Court for Orangeburg County (Shipp, J.) overruling a demurrer to a plea of former acquittal and sustaining the plea to an indictment charging defendant with murder. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

The ruling of Shipp, Circuit Judge, on motion to direct a verdict on the ground of previous acquittal, was as follows:

The defendant in this case sets up the plea of former acquittal, autrefois acquit; he alleges substantially in his plea that he was indicted on March 27, 1920; that heretofore in September, 1920, he was arraigned, and pleaded not guilty to the indictment found against him by the grand jury of Orangeburg county, charging him with the murder of Bryan Salley on the 27th of March, 1920; that the jury was impaneled and that he was duly acquitted on that charge. He further states that he is now called at the bar of the court to answer to an indictment charging him with the murder of one Julian Cooper on the 27th of March, 1920; he alleges that he was in former jeopardy in the trial for the murder of Bryan Salley, because he alleges the evidence necessary to prove the charge against him for the murder of Julian Cooper would be the same evidence as was used against him in the case charging him with the murder of Bryan Salley. He goes on in his plea to state that at his former trial it was in evidence that at his home, in his front yard, on the night of March 27, 1920, he fired several shots in quick succession at three men, mentioning them, Bryan Salley, Julian Cooper, and Hugh Fanning; that these three parties were making an attack upon him jointly in his own yard, and that he shot from the necessity of defending and protecting his life and home. He further alleges that the act of shooting at these three men, alleged aggressors, constituted one act and one volition; that he shot at no particular one, but was endeavoring to protect himself and his home against aggression; that he killed all three of these men at one time, and that it was in pursuance of one act and one volition.

The defendant further alleges that all of these facts came out in the trial for his killing Bryan Salley, and that at that trial three issues were submitted to the jury who tried the case; that three theories were presented to the jury. The three theories that he sets up in his plea are: (1) That the defendant purposely fired at and killed Bryan Salley with malice; (2) that the defendant fired at Julian Cooper and Hugh Fanning, and, missing them, killed Salley; (3) that with a reckless disregard of human life the defendant fired at the three men, killing them. He says that those three issues were submitted to the jury, and that he was duly acquitted by the jury, and he alleges that the action of the jury in acquitting him is the equivalent to finding that he was excusable in the act that he committed on that occasion. That is substantially what he alleges.

When a defendant puts in a special plea of former acquittal or former conviction, two courses are open to the state—the state may traverse the plea by denying the allegations thereof, and the question would then be one of fact to be tried by a jury, or the state may demur to the plea, and then it becomes a question of law; not a fact for the consideration of the jury, but a question of law for the court. When the defendant demurs to a paper, that is an admission of the facts stated in the paper; it is not an admission of any legal conclusions, but it is an admission of the truth of any fact pleaded in the paper that is properly pleaded. That is held in the case of State v. De Wees, 76 S. C. 74, 56 S. E. 674, 11 Ann. Cas. 991.

In considering a question of former acquittal it involves a consideration of the record. Two indictments involved in the case are made a part of the plea and a part of the demurrer; that is for the consideration of the court. The court considers the record, the indictments, and it also considers partially in a question of fact, where there is the allegation in the plea that it is the same act, the same transaction, and the same volition; that is a question of fact. If the indictment shows that the offenses charged are so distinct and separate that, notwithstanding the demurrer on the part of the state, if the indictment shows that the charges were so separate and distinct, notwithstanding the admissions, the court comes to the conclusion that they are separate and distinct, the court would have to sustain the demurrer. That involves a question of fact; still, if the indictment shows on its face that it could not result from the same act, the state would lose nothing by the demurrer. If, on the other hand, there can be shown, or if they might have been the result of the same act, that is an admission on the part of the state.

It is unfortunate that in South Carolina the supreme court of this state has never ruled on the precise question in this case in any similar case. The state relies on the case of State v. Thurston, 27 S. C. L. (2 McMull.) 382, in which it was held that the indictments in the Thurston Case were so separate and distinct, that notwithstanding the admissions by the demurrer, the court was justified in holding that the offenses charged were not the same act. An examination of the Thurston Case shows—and I have not had as much time to examine these cases as I would like to have had, because I have to rule promptly—an examination of the Thurston Case shows that the indictment in that case involved the question of larceny; where a person is charged with the stealing of goods belonging to A, he cannot be convicted for the stealing of goods belonging to B. That is true, of course, because, to convict of larceny, you have to prove the owner is not a different person, the very nature of the ownership or the possession of the property, and where the case could not be the result of one act. It remains to be seen that where a person kills two persons, that may be shown to be the result of the same act.

Counsel for the state has cited the case of State v. Evans, 33 W. Va. 417, 10 S. E. 792, a West Virginia case. An examination of the Evans Case shows that the plea was not set out in that case, and I have not the benefit of knowing exactly what was alleged in the special plea set up. The court held in that case that it could not be one act, because the circumstances alleged showed that there was aggravation from one separate and distinct from the other. The judge who rendered the opinion stated that he could conceive of a case in which the principle might apply, and he cited the case referred to by Mr. Raysor, where an engineer was charged with killing a number of people through the negligent running of a train, and the plea interposed was that it was accidental; he was charged with the murder of one of the passengers, and the jury rendered the verdict of acquittal, and it was held that that was an adjudication, and no further criminal liability attached, and he could not be held for the death of other passengers resulting from the same act.

It is recognized by the court that there may be cases where a person may kill more than one person as the result of the same act. That is one case. I can conceive of another case; a sheriff is charged with the custody and with the safety of the prisoners in jail; he stands there for the purpose of protecting those prisoners; an attack is made on him, and he kills ten men, and he is called for trial for the killing of one of the ten men; he sets up the defense that he killed the ten men in the discharge of his official duty; that a mob came there for the purpose of taking the prisoners from the jail, and in defense of their lives he took the lives of ten men who were killed. He is tried for killing one of those men, and that question is submitted to the jury, and the jury say he is not guilty; that he was excusable in taking life. There is one act and one purpose to protect the prisoner; that is an adjudication the sheriff acted within the law. There is an instance where the sheriff shot repeatedly, but it was from one design and one purpose, and an adjudication in one case would be an adjudication in all.

No one can testify as to the intent of a person. I cannot testify as to what is in the mind of any other man, but I can testify as to my own intent, and the only person who can testify as to the intent of any person is that person himself. We have in this paper here, admitted by the demurrer, the declaration of the defendant under oath that he had one purpose and one intent, and that was to defend himself against his aggressors. It has been held in a number of cases that the defendant may testify as to his purpose and intent. That is the only evidence we have in the case, and that is admitted by the demurrer.

I am sorry that the state admitted these facts in the demurrer. I am called on to rule on this paper with an admission on behalf of the state; it becomes a question of law, and I am bound; I could not rule otherwise with this admission of intent, the admission of one purpose and one act, I could not rule other-that the demurrer must be overruled in the case, and therefore becomes a question of law, being admitted that the killing of the three men was the result of impulse, and it being alleged that it was done in defense of the defendant's home and person, I cannot say that that does not state a defense.

It is necessary to overrule the demurrer, for the reasons stated above. The demurrer is overruled.

T. M. Rayson, A. H. Moss, and J. Hydrick for the State.

Wolfe & Berry, Cole L. M. L. Smith, J. L. Dukes, J. Fanning, and B. J. Wingard for the defendant.

Justice J. J. delivered the opinion of the court:

At the May term of the court of appeals for Orangeburg County, upon separate indictments, were returned against the defendant, charging him with the murder, respectively, of Bryan Julian Cooper, and Hugh Fanning, on March 27, 1920. At the September term he was tried on the indictment charging him with the murder of Bryan Salley, and was acquitted. At the following January term he was called for on the indictment charging him with the murder of Julian Cooper. He thereupon filed a plea of not guilty, based upon the ground that the three homicides resulting from a single act, of impulse, and volition, constituted but one offense, and that, having been acquitted of any criminal connection therewith, as shown by his acquittal as stated, he was entitled to be discharged.

His plea the state demurred. The ground that the indictment was defective in that the acquittal was in a case in which the acquittal was in a case and that in the case at bar that the offenses charged in the indictments are distinct and require proof of different facts.

The circuit judge heard argument on the plea and the demurrer, and announced his ruling (which is incorporated in the record and should also be in the report) overruling the demurrer. He then passed a formal order, reciting the fact that he had overruled the demurrer, and adjudging that the plea of former acquittal be sustained. From said ruling and order the state appeals.

Upon the presentation of the plea two courses were open to the state: To traverse the plea, or to demur.

The state adopted the latter course, Pleading—effect of demurrer. and the legal effect thereof was to admit the allegations of fact contained in the plea. State v. De Wees, 76 S. C. 74, 56 S. E. 674, 11 Ann. Cas. 991.

The question at issue must therefore be decided upon the plea, the demurrer, and the two indictments, without reference to the testimony taken upon the trial which has been had. It was unnecessary and improper that this testimony be incorporated in the record for this appeal. The exceptions of the state to the order of the circuit judge striking out this testimony, in settling the case for appeal, are therefore dismissed.

Appeal—exceptions to properly striking testimony from record.

The main facts, pertinent to the present inquiry, alleged in the plea and admitted by the demurrer, are the following, omitting those already stated herein and certain argumentative statements therein:

On the night of March 27, 1920, while the defendant was in his front yard, several men, among whom were Bryan Salley, Julian Cooper, and Hugh Fanning, advanced upon him; that in self-defense, to protect his person and habitation from their joint and confederated attack, the defendant fired at them several times with an automatic revolver, firing as rapidly as the pistol would fire, not aiming particularly at any one of them, but shooting at them one and all, whereby the three men named were instantly killed; that in said shooting the defendant was actuated and moved by the same and identical impulse, a single act of volition to do anything and everything against said three men to protect his person and habitation against their joint and confederated aggression.

The validity of the defendant's plea of former acquittal depends upon a solution of the following questions, battle ground upon which the defendant has pitched this controversy:

(1) Were the three homicides a single act on the part of the defendant?

(2) If the three homicides were a single act on the part of the defendant, is he entitled to claim that the act constituted but one offense?

It is apparent that if each homicide was a separate act, then necessarily each act constituted a distinct and separate offense; or, if the three homicides were a single act from which distinct and separate results flowed, each homicide was a separate offense.

1. Were the three homicides a single act on the part of the defendant?

The defendant so alleges in his plea, and now contends, that the state by its demurrer had admitted that to be a fact. We do not so regard the demurrer. The allegation in the plea is nothing more than a characterization, in the interest of the defendant—an inference favorable to him, which he draws from certain alleged facts; the issue is one of law, therefore, not of fact; and a demurrer admits only facts.

As is declared by the court in State v. De Wees, 76 S. C. 75, 56 S. E. 675, 11 Ann. Cas. 991: "If the two indictments charged offenses which in their nature are so separate and distinct as to be incapable of legal identity, then defendant's allegation that they charged the same offense would not make it so, since the demurrer only admits the facts properly pleaded."

So here, when the defendant alleges the circumstances of the affray; that the three men and another were advancing upon him; that he shot them down, inferentially, one at a time; that he fired his pistol as rapidly as it would turn the cylinder; that he was determined to do anything and everything to stop their confederated aggression, which, of course, included as many shots and reloadings as might be necessary,—it is not for him to decide or for the state to admit by its demurrer, that such intense, determined, continuous, and effective warfare, defensive though it may have been, was a single act.

Assume, as we must, that the defendant acted not in malice or in the hot blood of aggravation and exasperation, but in defense of his home and person, a circumstance which goes to the merits of his defense, and not to the discussion of the question whether or not his shooting down three men with separate shots was a single act, the circumstances cry out against his favorable interpretation. His purpose, as he states, was to halt this confederated aggression; at least four men were advancing upon him; he had a pistol as his weapon of defense; he knew that it fired only one shot at a time, he could not possibly kill all four at one shot; he necessarily, therefore, predetermined to fire at least four times, each firing being a separate act, and each, as events developed, followed by the fall of a man. The admitted facts, aside from the argumentative characterization of the shooting as a single act, show a predetermined and pursued series of acts, to shoot, and shoot, and shoot; to do "anything and everything against the three men . . . to protect his person and habitation." We are concerned here with what he did, not with the purpose; and in the attempted justification of his conduct he reveals the character of his conduct as a series of acts, and not a single act.

The authorities are simply overwhelming that under the circumstances stated the defendant was guilty of a separate crime (if a crime) against each one of his victims, and that the acquittal of one charge is not a bar to a further prosecution.

"But where one assaults or kills two persons by separate shots or strokes, although in the same riot or affray, an acquittal or conviction of one assault or homicide is no bar to an indictment for the other, as they are distinct acts." 12 Cyc. 289.

In Gunter v. State, 111 Ala. 23, 20 So. 632, 56 Am. St. Rep. 17, the court declared: "If, in the same affray, one person shoots and kills one person, and by a second act shoots and wounds another, in such case the two results—the killing of the one and the wounding of the other, by different acts of shooting,—cannot be said to grow out of the same unlawful act, but out of two distinct acts, and the party shooting is responsible for the two results from the two separate acts, and may be indicted and punished separately for each."

In Bell v. State, 120 Ark. 530, 180 S. W. 186, the defendant was incensed with the sister of his wife, her husband, her father, and her brother, on account of their alleged participation in the separation of himself and wife. He determined to exterminate the entire family; armed with a repeating shotgun he went to their home, and in turn killed each one. It was one intent, one volition, one transaction, one impulse. He was convicted of the murder of the husband and sentenced to life imprisonment. Upon the trial for the killing of his wife's sister, he pleaded former conviction. The court said: "The court did not err in overruling appellant's plea of former conviction. The conviction of appellant at a former term of the court for the crime of murdering Eard Bearden was a conviction for an entirely separate offense than that of the murder of Abbie Beard-en. The proof shows that the killings were not simultaneous; that they were not the result of one shot, but were the result of entirely separate acts. The question as to whether the murder of two persons by the same act would constitute but one offense is not presented. Therefore a conviction in one of the cases could not be set up in bar of a prosecution for the other."

In Morris v. Territory, 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 617, 99 Pac. 760, 101 Pac. 111, the defendant claimed to have been attacked by father and son, and that in self-defense he killed them both, shooting as fast as he could with a shotgun and a pistol. The father was killed by shots from the gun; the son, from the pistol, not more than thirty seconds later; the transaction was one; the intent, purpose, volition, impulse, were one. The defendant was acquitted of the murder of the father, and pleaded that acquittal as a bar to the indictment for killing the son. The court, upon full discussion of the subject, ruled, quoting from the syllabus: "If in the same affray a person shoots and kills one person, and by a second shot kills another person, he may be separately prosecuted for killing each of them, and may be properly acquitted in one case and convicted in the other."

In Com. v. Anderson, 169 Ky. 372, 183 S. W. 898, the defendant, in an alleged effort to defend himself against a confederated attack by two brothers, rapidly firing, killed one of them and wounded the other. He was acquitted of murder in the one case, and, to a separate indictment for assault upon the other brother, pleaded former acquittal. The court refused to sustain the plea, holding: "But we have been unable to find any case holding that where, by two separate and distinct acts of the defendant, two separate and distinct offenses were committed, they could in any sense be called 'the same offense' as is required to successfully invoke the constitutional provision. The, fact that these two distinct offenses were committed in close proximity as to time, and while engaged in one affray, cannot be allowed to unify the two offenses, when as a matter of fact they are not so. The time intervening between the commission of the two offenses can have no effect on the case whatever,"—citing 12 Cyc. 289, and many cases from Kentucky; Keeton v. Com. 92 Ky. 522, 18 S. W. 359; Com. v. Browning, 146 Ky. 770, 143 S. W. 407.

The case of Com. v. Browning, supra, cited in the Anderson Case, is stronger for the defendant than the Anderson Case or the case at bar, and while we are not called upon to approve its conclusions, the facts are interesting in this connection and its reasoning instructive. In that case the defendant, with one shot from a pistol, wounded two men with whom he was engaged in a fight. Defendant was convicted of assault upon one of the men, and to a separate indictment for assault upon the other he pleaded former conviction. The court overruled the plea, saying:

"Manifestly, appellee, if first tried for the shooting and wounding of Caywood, could not be convicted on proof that he shot Stewart, though both Caywood and Stewart were wounded by one and the same shot. As well might it be argued that, in the killing of several of the same family by putting poison in the food eaten by them, conviction of the poisoner for the death of one of them would bar a prosecution for the killing of the others. . . .

"The offenses committed by appellee were not included within one another, though resulting from the same act, but were separate and distinct offenses. Therefore he was not protected by § 13, Bill of Rights, against a prosecution for either by a conviction or acquittal for one of them."

In Keeton v. Com. 92 Ky. 522, 18 S. W. 359, it was held, quoting from the syllabus: "Presenting a pistol at two persons at the same time, coupled with a demand of their property, and compelling a surrender thereof by both at the same time, constitutes distinct offenses against them,—an assault on and robbery of each."

In Kelley v. State, 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 40, 62 S. W. 915, the defendant and the two De Walt brothers were working in adjoining fields, a wire fence separating them; one of the De Walts accused defendant of sending a valentine reflecting upon their sister; hot words ensued, and the two De Walts made for the defendant, and as they were in the act of breaking down the strands of wire to cross the fence to attack the defendant, he fired, killing one and wounding the other. He was tried for the murder of the one killed, and acquitted; upon the trial for assaulting the other, he pleaded former acquittal. The court held that the plea was insufficient.

In Augustine v. State, 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 59, 96 Am. St. Rep. 765, 52 S. W. 77, the defendant was one of a mob which fired at and killed two men, they being killed by different shots from different members of the mob. The defendant was acquitted of the murder of the one whom he had not shot, and upon trial for the murder of the other, whom he had shot, he pleaded former acquittal. The court overruled the plea, saying: "But here the testimony shows that the parties were killed by distinct acts. Mr. Bishop says: 'Obviously, there is a difference between one volition and one transaction, and on the view of our combined authorities there is little room for denial that in one transaction a man may commit distinct offenses of assault or homicide upon different persons, and be separately punished for each.'"

In State v. Robinson, 12 Wash. 491, 41 Pac. 884, the defendant in an affray killed two men, Schultz and Smith; he was acquitted of the murder of Schultz, and then, upon trial for the murder of Smith, he pleaded former acquittal. We quote at length from the interesting opinion of the court: "It follows that, if the killing of each of the men constituted a distinct crime, there was no proof tending to show that the appellant had been formerly acquitted of the crime alleged to have been committed in the killing of Smith. The fact that the same line of proof was introduced for the purpose of showing that he was guilty of the killing of Schultz as that introduced to show his guilt in the killing of Smith would in no manner tend to show that an acquittal for the killing of the former would constitute an acquittal for the killing of the latter, if the killing of each was a distinct crime. That such proofs in reference to two prosecutions for the commission of a single offense would be proper to go to a jury upon the question of former acquittal or conviction is beyond question, but to us it seems equally clear that proof which was necessary and competent to convict of one crime would have no weight upon such question in the prosecution for another, even although the same criminating circumstances were relied upon in the latter as in the former case. Was the killing of each of these men a distinct crime? They were killed in a single affray, and the connection of the appellant was substantially the same in his relations to such affray, as it related to each of such men. If the result of the meeting at which the two were killed had been the death of only one of them, a prosecution for murder could have been founded upon his death, and under the circumstances of this case this would have been true whether the one so killed had been Schultz or Smith; and there can be no good reason why that which would have warranted a prosecution for murder should lose force by reason of the fact that another circumstance, which in itself would warrant such a prosecution, occurred at the same time and place. If the prosecution had been founded upon the killing of the two, and the case had gone to trial upon a plea of not guilty, proof of the killing of either of them would have warranted a conviction. It follows that the killing of each was, so far as the homicide was concerned, a distinct transaction. The taking of a human life with certain intent constitutes murder, and neither law nor public policy will justify a holding that each life is of less value when taken with another than it would be if taken alone. If a person without justification intends to kill A and does so, he will be guilty of a crime; if he intends to kill B, he will be guilty of another and a different crime; and the fact that he entertains the intent to kill both, and carries such intent into effect at the same time and place, should not be held to make of that which would otherwise be a foundation for two distinct prosecutions a foundation for only one. In our opinion, the undisputed proofs, when interpreted in the light of the law which it was the duty of the court to find, clearly showed that the appellant had never been on trial for the killing of Smith."

In Winn v. State, 82 Wis. 571, 52 N. W. 775, the defendant had an altercation with one De Foy in a saloon, and was assaulted by him; he went home, secured a pistol, and returned; De Foy was on the sidewalk with others, including one Coates; the defendant snapped his pistol at De Foy, and in the struggle to disarm him the pistol was discharged, killing Coates; the defendant was acquitted of the murder of Coates, and was then indicted for the assault on De Foy; he pleaded former acquittal. The court disallowed the plea, holding: "The rule is that the offenses charged in two indictments are not identical unless they concur both in law and in fact, and that the plea of autrefois acquit or convict is bad if the offenses charged in the two indictments be distinct in law, no matter how closely they are connected in fact. In order to determine whether there is a concurrence in law, that is, whether a conviction or acquittal on one indictment is a good bar to a prosecution on another, the true inquiry is whether the first indictment was such that the accused might have been convicted under it by proof of the facts alleged in the other indictment. If he could not, the conviction or acquittal under the first indictment is no bar. The result of an application of this test to the present inquiry is obvious. Winn could not have been convicted of the murder of Coates merely upon proof that he made a felonious assault upon De Foy. Proof that he killed Coates would also be required. Hence an acquittal on the information charging the murder of Coates is no bar to this information for a felonious assault on De Foy, and the special plea was properly overruled."

In a note to Roberts v. State, 58 Am. Dec. 540, Judge Freeman says: "When same act constitutes two or more distinct offenses, each is separately indictable. The defendant may be separately punished for each offense, and an acquittal or conviction or pardon of one of these distinct offenses is no bar to the prosecution of the others. [Citing cases.] And the test will here apply. In each case the plea of autrefois acquit or convict is bad, because the facts of the two offenses are different. The proof of the allegations of the second indictment would not secure a legal conviction under the allegations of the first. A well-settled example of this, of two offenses distinct from each other, arising from the same act occurs when the criminal act affects two different persons"—citing State v. Fife, 17 S. C. L. (1 Bail.) 1.

Further the learned annotator observes: "So, where the defendant, by his act, injures in fact two or more persons, though it be accomplished in the same transaction, yet as many distinct offenses are committed. The facts of one are materially variant from those of the other. Such is the case where two or more persons are shot at the same time."

We conclude, therefore, that the killing of Bryan Salley physically could not have been the same act as that which took the life of Julian Cooper, and that the law, so far from compelling a disregard of what we know the fact to have been, is in harmony with the dictates of reason, physical laws, and common sense.

2. If the three homicides were a single act on the part of the defendant, is he entitled to claim that the act constituted but one offense?

Assuming, however, for the sake of argument that the defendant's contention in this regard may be sustained, it by no means follows necessarily that but a single offense has been committed. On the contrary, the rule in this state is that under certain circumstances more ^{separate offenses from} than one offense ^{single act.} may follow from a single act.

In State ex rel. Burton v. Williams, 11 S. C. 292, the court declared: "And of the other result—that of subjecting an offender to two punishments for the same act, not the same offense—it may be said that it is not so monstrous as might at first be supposed, inasmuch as we find that our own courts have decided that for the same act a man may be twice punished, because by the one act he has violated two distinct statutes of the state, committed two distinct offenses, and is therefore liable to two distinct punishments."

In State v. Switzer, 65 S. C. 187, 43 S. E. 513, the court says: "It is not sound to say unqualifiedly that more than one criminal offense cannot be predicated upon a single act; for when a single act combines the requisite ingredients of two distinct offenses, the defendant may be separately indicted and punished for each, as shown in State v. Taylor, 18 S. C. L. (2 Bail.) 49, and State v. Thurston, 27 S. C. L. (2 McMull.) 395."

In State v. Thurston, 27 S. C. L. (2 McMull.) 382, the defendant was charged in three separate indictments with having stolen at the same time cotton belonging to three separate individuals. The act, intent, and volition were one and the same. The court held (quoting from syllabus) "that the cotton so stolen by the defendant belonged to three different individuals, and he was very properly indicted in three cases, and a conviction in one case was no bar to a conviction in the two others. The stealing of the goods of different persons is always a distinct larceny."

In State v. Sonnerkalb, 11 S. C. L. (2 Nott & M'C.) 280, the defendant raised the question of being liable to two indictments for separate offenses, both growing out of a single act. The court said: "But let it be admitted that the defendant committed physically but one act; two offenses may be committed by one act, even at the common law; a person fires a gun, kills one, and wounds another; if he escapes for the homicide (that is, if his life be not taken), he may be indicted for the assault on the other; or suppose he severely wounded two, he may be indicted for two assaults."

In Hellams v. Switzer, 24 S. C. 39, the action was brought by several plaintiffs severally owning land, claiming damages on account of a dam of the defendant. The court held that they could not maintain a joint action; that their injuries were several. The opinion contains this statement pertinent to the pending issue: "The principle underlying is that it is not the act, but the consequences, which are looked at. Thus, if two persons are injured by the same stroke, the act is one, but it is the consequences of that act, and not the act itself, which is redressed; and therefore the injury is several."

In a full note by Judge Freeman to People v. McDaniels, 92 Am. St. Rep. 120, he points out the two lines of decisions in reference to a single act causing death to two or more persons, placing this state in line with others holding that two offenses have been committed, though rather leaning to the opposite holding. He points out very clearly, however, that whatever doubt may exist upon that proposition there is none where more than one act has been committed. He says: "If one shot is fired and injures two people, there is, as we have seen, a conflict of authority as to the possibility of separate and successive prosecutions. But where several shots are fired, each injuring one person, the mere propinquity, in point of time or action, of the two assaults, does not make them a single assault, and all the authorities agree in holding that there may, in such a case, be as many prosecutions as there were assaults."

A familiar illustration of the rule is where the single act is a separate and distinct offense under municipal, state, and Federal statutes, or where the single act is a distinct infraction of more than one state statute. Surely, if a single sale of liquor may constitute three statutory offenses, or if a single act of theft may constitute more than one offense, a single murderous shot may constitute a separate offense as to each human being whose life is cut short. If a malpractising physician, in producing an abortion, should cause the death of the mother and of the child breathing after its forced birth, can there be a question that from his single act, actuated and moved by a single intent, impulse, and volition, there would spring three separate offenses?

If, the act being single, only one offense has been committed, the rule should apply to civil actions as well as to criminal prosecutions; and yet we do not apprehend that, if the defendant should have prevailed in an action by the administrator of Bryan Salley for damages on account of his alleged wrongful death, he could defeat a similar action by the administrator of Julian Cooper upon the ground of former adjudication; or that that rule would apply in the case of a negligent collision at a railroad crossing by which the lives of several persons were lost. It would, indeed, be anomalous to hold in the criminal prosecution that the act was single, and only one offense was committed, and in the civil actions the act was single and several offenses (civil) were committed; the plea of former adjudication being sustained in the one case and denied in the other upon opposite conclusions from the identical state of facts.

Mr. Van Fleet in his work on Former Adjudication, vol. 3, ¶ 622, states that the rule that, if several persons are injured in person or property by the same act, there is but one offense, is maintained in the courts of several states named, but that the contrary is held in Arkansas, California, Kentucky, New York, South Carolina, and Virginia.

There is another view of this question which, however, it is really not necessary to discuss, in view of the foregoing conclusions, but which is equally fatal to the defendant's plea. The constitutional provision invoked is: "Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or liberty." Const. art. 1, § 17.

Note that the identity of the offense, and not of the act, is referred to. Hence, in order to claim the benefit of this protection it must be made to appear that the latter indictment contains a charge of the same offense of which the defendant may have previously been acquitted or convicted.

From a common-sense, layman's view there could be no hesitation in saying that the first indictment charges the murder of Bryan Salley, one distinct crime; the second, of Julian Cooper, another distinct crime. But we are expected to throw to the winds this chart and compass, and be guided by a strained technicality of the law. The law does not compel this conclusion. In determining the question of the identity of the offenses, the law prescribes the following test:

In State v. Glasgow, 23 S. C. L. (Dud.) 40, the court declares: "The test by which the question is to be determined, whether a former conviction is a bar to another prosecution, is this: Would the evidence necessary to support the second indictment have been sufficient to procure a legal conviction on the first?"

The same test is applied in the case of State v. Thurston, 27 S. C. L. (2 McMull.) 382, and in State v. Risher, 30 S. C. L. (1 Rich.) 219, in practically the identical terms. In State v. Parish, 42 S. C. L. (8 Rich.) 322, the court declared (referring to former conviction): "To constitute this a good defense the offense must be identical or necessarily included the one within the other."

In State v. Jenkins, 20 S. C. 351, the court lays this down as the test: "Could the accused have been convicted at the first trial and under the first indictment of the offense charged in either of the other two? . . . If, then, the accused could not, under any circumstances, have been convicted of the present offense in the former trial, how then can it be said that upon the present trial he has been put in jeopardy twice for the same offense?"

In State v. Switzer, 65 S. C. 187, 43 S. E. 513, the court says: "In determining whether both indictments charged the same offense, the test generally applied is 'whether the evidence necessary to support the second indictment would have been sufficient to procure a legal conviction upon the first.'"

In State v. Switzer, 65 S. C. 191, 43 S. E. 513, it is held that the plea of former acquittal must be sustained when it appears that the offense charged in the second indictment is not legally distinct from that in the first.

In State v. Van Buren, 86 S. C. 297, 68 S. E. 568, the court declares: "The test laid down as useful and generally adequate, though not infallible, by which it may be decided whether two indictments charge the same offense, is: 'Would the evidence necessary to support the second indictment have been sufficient to procure a legal conviction upon the first?'"

In State v. Rodgers, 100 S. C. 77, 84 S. E. 304, the same test was applied as in the case of State v. Jenkins, 20 S. C. 351.

In Burton v. United States, 202 U. S. 344, 50 L. ed. 1057, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 688, 6 Ann. Cas. 362, it is said: "A plea of autrefois acquit must be upon a prosecution for the same identical offense. 4 Bl. Com. 336. It must appear that the offense charged, using the words of Chief Justice Shaw, was the same in law and in fact. The plea will be vicious, if the offenses charged in the two indictments be perfectly distinct in point of law, however nearly they may be connected in fact."

In Ebeling v. Morgan, 237 U. S. 625, 59 L. ed. 1151, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 710, it is said: "The principle applied in Gavieres v. United States, 220 U. S. 338, 55 L. ed. 489, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 421, is applicable, where this court held that, when in the same course of conduct, and upon the same occasion, certain rude and boisterous language was used, and an officer insulted, two offenses were committed, separate in their character, and this, notwithstanding the transaction was one and the same. The principle stated by the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts in Morey v. Com. 108 Mass. 433, was applied, where it was held that a conviction upon one indictment would not bar a conviction and sentence upon another indictment, if the evidence required to support the one would not have been sufficient to warrant the conviction upon the other without proof of an additional fact."

In Morgan v. Devine, 237 U. S. 632, 59 L. ed. 1153, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 712, it is said, quoting from Bishop: "The test is whether, if what is set out in the second indictment had been proved under the first, there could have been a conviction; when there could, the second cannot be maintained; when there could not, it can be."

In Blair v. State, 81 Ga. 629, 7 S. E. 855, the rule is thus stated: "If the evidence required to convict under the first indictment would not be sufficient to convict under the second indictment, but proof of an additional fact would be necessary to constitute the offense charged in the second indictment, then the former conviction or acquittal could not be pleaded in bar of the second indictment."

In a note to Com. v. Vaughn, 45 L.R.A. 858, it is said: "For this reason, therefore, a conviction of one offense will not bar a prosecution for the other, or entitle the defendant to the plea of former jeopardy, autrefois convict, or autrefois acquit, as such plea can only avail a defendant who has already been convicted or acquitted upon the same charge or offense for which he is charged the second time, or, in other words, when the two offenses are identically the same."

In Morey v. Com. supra, cited with approval in Gavieres v. United States, 220 U. S. 342, 55 L. ed. 490, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 422, it is said: "A conviction or acquittal upon one indictment is no bar to a subsequent conviction and sentence upon another, unless the evidence required to support a conviction upon one of them would have been sufficient to warrant a conviction upon the other. The test is not whether the defendant has already been tried for the same act, but whether he has been put in jeopardy for the same offense."

The Massachusetts case was also cited with approval in Carter v. McClaughry, 183 U. S. 394, 46 L. ed. 250, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 193, where the court said: "The offenses charged under this article were not one and the same offense. This is apparent if the test of the identity of offenses that the same evidence is required to sustain them be applied. The first charge alleged 'a conspiracy to defraud,' and the second charge alleged 'causing false and fraudulent claims to be made,' which were separate and distinct offenses, one requiring certain evidence which the other did not. The fact that both charges related to and grew out of one transaction made no difference."

In Kelly v. United States, 169 C. C. A. 408, 258 Fed. 392, it is said: "This was in effect a plea of autrefois acquit. Such a plea, however, is unavailing unless the offense presently charged is precisely the same in law and fact as the former one relied on under the plea; thus, as Mr. Justice Harlan said (Burton v. United States, 202 U. S. 344, 380, 50 L. ed. 1057, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 688, 698, 6 Ann. Cas. 362), in adopting language of Chief Justice Shaw, it must appear that the offense charged 'was the same in law and in fact. The plea will be vicious, if the offenses charged in the two indictments be perfectly distinct in point of law, however nearly they may be connected in fact.'"

In Bens v. United States (C. C. A.) 266 Fed. 152, it is said: "The prohibition of the Constitution is against a second jeopardy for the 'same offense;' that is, for the identical crime. The offenses charged in the two prosecutions must be the same in law and in fact. Burton v. United States, supra; Thomas v. United States, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 720, 34 C. C. A. 477, 156 Fed. 897, 16 C. J. 263. If the facts which would convict on the second prosecution would not necessarily have convicted on the first, then the first will not be a bar to the second, although the offenses charged may have been committed in the same transaction."

In United States v. Farhat (D. C.) 269 Fed. 33, it is said: "The test of identity of offenses, when double jeopardy is claimed, is whether the same evidence is required to sustain them. If not, then the fact that both charges relate to and grow out of one transaction does not make a single offense, where two are defined by the statutes."

In People v. Majors, 65 Cal. 138, 52 Am. Rep. 295, 3 Pac. 597, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 486, the defendant had counseled and advised another to rob a certain man at his home; the emissary took with him a confederate; they found unexpectedly a friend at the home of the man to be robbed: in the attempt to carry out the design of robbery both the man to be robbed and his friend were killed at the same time by the emissary and his confederate. The defendant was convicted of murder in the case of the man who was to have been robbed, and to an indictment in the case of his friend he pleaded former conviction. The court overruled the plea, saying (quoting from syllabus): "The murder of two persons constitutes two separate crimes; for each of which a defendant is liable to a separate prosecution and trial, though the killing be by the same act; and a conviction or acquittal in one case does not bar a prosecution in the other on the plea of once in jeopardy."

Applying this test, it must be apparent that the plea must fail. In the first case, the defendant was charged with the murder of Bryan Salley. The state was required to make good the allegation that the defendant took the life of Bryan Salley; it was compelled to prove the corpus delicti. In the second, the same burden was upon it with reference to Julian Cooper, necessarily a difference in the proof. The proof of Cooper's death would not have answered the obligation resting upon the state in the first case to prove the death of Salley, and, conversely, the same could be said of the second case.

In People v. Alibez, 49 Cal. 452, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 345, an indictment charged the defendant with the murder of three persons by the administering of strychnine at the same time. The court arrested the judgment upon the ground that three distinct offenses had been charged in one indictment.

We take occasion to say that it did not necessarily follow from the order overruling the demurrer that the defendant was entitled to an order sustaining his plea of former acquittal. Assimilated to demur-ers in civil actions, the demurrant is usually accorded the privilege of answering over; and doubtless this privilege, that of traversing the plea, would have been allowed the state if it had been applied for. In the absence of such a request the defendant was entitled to and the circuit judge was authorized to pass the order in question, subject, of course, to review on appeal.

Pleading—right to answer over after overruling of demurrer.

The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be reversed, and that the case be remanded to the Court of General Sessions for Orangeburg County for trial.

Eugene B. Gary, Ch. J., Fraser, J., and Prince, Wilson, Sease, Frank B. Gary, Moore, Bowman, Townsend, and Peurifoy, Circuit Judges, concur in the opinion of Cothran, J.

De Vore and Rice, Circuit Judges, concur in the result.

Eugene B. Gary, Ch. J., concurring:

The defendant was charged in three separate indictments for the murder of Bryan Salley, Julian Cooper, and Hugh Fanning. He was tried under the indictment charging him with the murder of Bryan Salley, and the jury rendered a verdict of not guilty. At the next term of the court, he was called upon to answer to an indictment charging him with the murder of Julian Cooper, and set up the plea of former jeopardy. It does not appear that a motion was made to consolidate the cases and try them together. If they had been tried at the same time, and the jury had rendered a verdict of not guilty as to the homicide of Bryan Salley alone, the defendant could not again have been placed in jeopardy. But those were not the facts. Having failed to make such motion, he was not in jeopardy for the killing of Julian Cooper when he was only tried for the murder of Bryan Salley.

It would be an anomaly to allow a plea of former acquittal, unless there had been a former trial for the homicide of Julian Cooper.

Watts, J., concurring:

For the reasons assigned by Judge Shipp, I think the exceptions should be overruled and the judgment affirmed.

Writ of error dismissed by the Supreme Court of the United States, March 20, 1922 (U. S. Adv. Ops. 1921–22, p. 365) — U. S. —, 66 L. ed. —, 42 Sup. Ct. Rep. 315.

ANNOTATION.

Conviction or acquittal upon charge of murder of, or assault upon, one person as bar to prosecution for like offense against another person at the same time.

- I. General rule, 341.
- II. Application of rule, 342.
- III. Exceptions to rule, 346.

Cases in which the defendant unintentionally assaults or kills one person while assaulting or killing another person are excluded from this annotation, since they will be found in the note in 2 A.L.R. 606, upon the subject of acquittal on charge as to one as bar to charge as to another, where one person is killed or assaulted by acts directed at another.

I. General rule.

The general rule is that the conviction or acquittal of one charged with the murder of, or an assault upon, one person, is not a bar to his subsequent prosecution for the murder of, or an assault upon, another person at the same time.

The plea of former jeopardy where more than one person is assaulted or murdered at the same time by the same person rests upon the idea of identity of the two or more offenses, that each offense occurred during or in the same transaction or difficulty, and as the result of it. It is an ancient right which has been incorporated into all American constitutions, that no person shall, for the same offense, be twice put in jeopardy of his life or limb. In order, however, to entitle one to the benefit of, and to successfully invoke the protection of, this constitutional right, the facts in the case wherein the plea is interposed must be the same as in the charge wherein the defendant was placed in jeopardy. If no identity of offense exist, the plea will not be allowed. Com. v. Anderson (Ky.) supra.

II. Application of rule.

Murder of two persons.

The fact that the killing of two persons was so closely connected in point of time that it is impossible to separate the evidence relating to each of them would not necessarily make the killing of the two one act or one offense, and therefore a plea of former conviction of the murder of one person is not good as against a demurrer upon a prosecution for the murder of another person at the same time, although the testimony in the subsequent case will be the same as in the former case, and the same facts, circumstances, and matters urged against the defendant in the former trial will, in every respect, be the same that will be urged against him in the subsequent trial, the plea being defective because of its failure to state that the two persons were killed by the same act and volition. Jones v. State (1895) 61 Ark. 88, 32 S. W. 81.

A plea of former acquittal of murder of one person upon a subsequent indictment for the murder of another person at the same time is demurrable, where it fails to allege that both homicides were produced by the same act of the person indicted. State v. Rosa (1905) 72 N. J. L. 462, 62 Atl. 696.

And in State v. Evans (1890) 33 W. Va. 417, 10 S. E. 792, the court held demurrable a similar plea which alleged that the crime charged against the defendant in the present indictment was the same felonious act charged against him in a former indictment for the murder of another person at the same time, and that the evidence whereby the state can or will attempt to prove the present indictment will be the same as that produced against him on the trial of a former indictment, where the facts, as stated in the plea, clearly establish that the offenses charged in the respective indictments were separate and distinct.

A plea of former jeopardy to an indictment for murder cannot be based upon the fact that, upon the trial of two consolidated indictments for two other murders, committed by defendant on the same day as the one charged in the indictment in question, he was found not guilty on the issue of insanity, which is the defense set up to such indictment. Hotema v. United States (1901) 186 U. S. 413, 46 L. ed. 1225, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 895.

In the following cases a conviction of the murder of one person was held not to be a bar to a prosecution for the murder of another person at the same time:

—where the killings were not simultaneous, and were not the result of one shot, but were the result of entirely different acts, Bell v. State (1915) 120 Ark. 530, 180 S. W. 186;

—where the defendant counseled and advised a man, who took another man with him, to commit robbery, and, in attempting to commit the robbery, they killed two persons; and the court said that on the trial of the defendant for the murder of one of such persons, he could not have been convicted of the murder of the other, and that the two crimes, although committed at one time and by the same act, were entirely different in their elements, and the evidence required to convict in the one case was very different from that essential to a conviction in the other, People v. Majors (1884) 65 Cal. 138, 52 Am. Rep. 295, 3 Pac. 597, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 486;

—where a father and son, in execution of a conspiracy to kill another, lay in wait for him, and, upon his approach with his father-in-law, the father shot and killed the father-in-law, and the son shot and killed the son-in-law, and both father and son were indicted for the murder of the father-in-law, resulting in the conviction of the father and the acquittal of the son, State v. Vines (1882) 34 La. Ann. 1079, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 296. The court said that while the conspiracy and a malicious intent may have been common elements of both crimes, that was not sufficient to constitute identity of the crimes themselves, which comprised not only those elements, but also objective acts; and, further, that the two killings were distinct and different offenses, although both were done in execution of the same conspiracy.

In the following cases an acquittal of the charge of murdering one person was held no bar to a prosecution for murdering another at the same time:

—where two persons were shot and killed by separate shots in the same affray, Com. v. Anderson (1916) 169 Ky. 372, 183 S. W. 898;

—where the defendant and his brother-in-law lay in ambush, each armed with a gun, and shot and killed, by two distinct, but almost simultaneous, shots, two men riding along the highway, Teat v. State (1876) 53 Miss. 439, 24 Am. Rep. 708;

—where in the same affray a person shot and killed one person, and by a second shot killed another person, Morris v. Territory (1909) 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 617, 99 Pac. 750, 101 Pac. 111 (in this case it was contended that, as not more than thirty seconds elapsed between the killing of the two persons, the two killings constituted one transaction, and therefore an acquittal of the former was a bar to the prosecution for the latter; but it appeared that it was not the same shot that killed both parties, but that one was killed by the first or second shot fired by the defendant with a shotgun, while the second was killed by a shot fired by the defendant with a pistol, and the court said that the two killings were two separate offenses committed with different weapons);

—where two men were killed at the same time by a body of armed men, the defendant killing one of the decedents, while the other was killed by another member of the defendant's party, Augustine v. State (1899) 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 59, 96 Am. St. Rep. 765, 52 S. W. 77.

Assault upon two persons.

Treating as two different offenses assaults on two different individuals does not place the accused twice in jeopardy for the same offense, within the meaning of the Act of July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. at L. 692, chap. 1369, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1141) § 5, even if these assaults occurred very near each other in one continuing attempt to defy the law. Flemister v. United States (1907) 207 U. S. 372, 52 L. ed. 252, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 129.

The acquittal of assault with intent to murder one person is not a bar to a prosecution for an assault with intent to murder another person, although both assaults were committed at the same time, since they constitute different offenses. McNish v. State (1904) 47 Fla. 66, 36 So. 175.

Nor is a conviction of an assault with intent to murder one person a bar to a prosecution for assault with intent to murder another person, although the two assaults grew out of the same difficulty between the parties. Crocker v. State (1873) 47 Ga. 568.

And in Ashton v. State (1893) 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 482, 21 S. W. 48, holding the same, where a railroad porter successively struck, with an iron poker, two men outside a depot, after an altercation with them within it, the true test was stated to be that if the intent to kill the one was an intention formed and existing distinct from and independent of the intention to kill the other, the two assaults could not constitute a single offense, and there were held to be two separate assaults in the case at bar under such test.

And in Fews v. State (1907) 1 Ga. App. 122, 58 S. E. 64, where the counsel for the prisoner contended that, under the recognized construction of the provision of the Constitution that no person shall be put in jeopardy more than once for the same offense, the "same-transaction test" should be applied to the prisoner's plea of former jeopardy, with which contention the counsel for the state agreed, the court held that under such test the successive shooting of two different men was not the same transaction, so that the conviction of the assault with intent to murder in the case of the first was not a bar to the prosecution for a like offense against the second, saying that the assault upon each of them was separate, that they made no joint attack upon him, and that the intent to kill was directly against them individually, and that the fact that the interval between the two shootings was slight did not make the transactions identical.

A conviction of an assault and battery upon one person is not a bar to a prosecution for an assault and battery upon another person, committed during the same evening, at the same ball, during a period of excitement. Greenwood v. State (1878) 64 Ind. 250, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 154.

An acquittal of assault upon, assault with intent to rob, and robbery of, one person is not a bar to a prosecution for similar offenses in relation to another person, although the offenses were committed at the same time, and the robbery was of the same property which was in the charge of both of the persons assaulted. Novak v. State (1921) 139 Md. 538, 115 Atl. 853.

Likewise, an acquittal of an assault and battery upon one person is not a bar to a prosecution for assault upon another participant in the same affray, with intent to do great bodily harm less than murder. People v. Ochotski (1898) 115 Mich. 601, 73 N. W. 889.

And where a number of persons went to another's house with guns, horns, and pans, and marched around the house and, when about to leave, fired off the guns, and the latter thereupon fired a shot at them, and in the direction of the crowd, twice, in rapid succession, and two of them were shot, an acquittal of an assault and battery upon one of them is not a bar to a prosecution for an assault and battery upon the other, since to support a plea of former acquittal, it is not sufficient that the two prosecutions should grow out of the same transaction, but they must be for the same offense—the same, both in fact and in law. State v. Nash (1882) 86 N. C. 650, 41 Am. Rep. 472.

The pointing of a pistol at two persons at the same time, with a demand for their property, constitutes a separate assault upon each and a separate robbery upon the person of each, for which an indictment in both cases can be maintained. Keeton v. Com. (1892) 92 Ky. 522, 18 S. W. 359.

A conviction of malicious shooting and wounding one person is not a bar to a prosecution for malicious shooting at, without wounding, another person at the same time and in the same difficulty or quarrel. Baker v. Com. (1898) 20 Ky. L. Rep. 879, 47 S. W. 864.

And this is so, although the defendant shot at both persons in the same difficulty, and wounded both by the same bullet, since the offenses were not included within one another, though resulting from the same act, but were separate and distinct offenses. Com. v. Browning (1912) 146 Ky. 770, 143 S. W. 407.

Two separate and distinct offenses are committed by one who shoots another and immediately thereafter points his revolver at a third person, so that his conviction of an assault upon the first is no bar to a prosecution for assault upon the second. State v. Temple (1905) 194 Mo. 228, 92 S. W. 494, 5 Ann. Cas. 954. In this case the court said that the test was that if, upon the trial of defendant for assaulting the first person, he could not have been convicted of the crime charged in a second information, though the jury were satisfied that the defendant assaulted the second person as charged, his former conviction for assaulting the first person is no bar to his prosecution for assaulting the second person.

The acquittal of the crime of mixing poison with flour, and causing it to be administered to one person with intent to kill him, is not a bar to a subsequent prosecution for mixing poison with flour and causing it to be administered to another person, with intent to kill him. People v. Warren (1852) 1 Park. Crim. Rep. (N. Y.) 338.

And where two persons are shot by the same discharge of a shotgun, the acquittal of the charge of shooting one of them is not a bar to a prosecution for shooting the other. Vaughan v. Com. (1821) 2 Va. Cas. 273.

Murder of one and assault upon another.

The acquittal of the murder of one person is not a bar to a prosecution for assaulting with intent to murder another person in the same affray. State v. Standifer (1837) 5 Port. (Ala.) 523.

And a plea to that effect, which alleges that the murder of which the defendant was formerly acquitted and the assault with intent to commit murder for which he was subsequently indicted were one and the same assault, and committed at one and the same time, is demurrable because of its failure to allege that both were committed by the same act, the allegation that the assaults were one and the same assault being merely a conclusion of law, rather than of a fact. Gunter v. State (1895) 111 Ala. 23, 56 Am. St. Rep. 17, 20 So. 632.

A plea of former acquittal of an assault with intent to kill a woman was adjudged bad upon demurrer in McCoy v. State (1885) 46 Ark. 141, upon a prosecution for the murder of the woman's husband in the same transaction or conflict, although the defense was the same in both prosecutions, namely, an alibi, the court saying that it was not by the same shot that the wife was wounded and the husband killed, and that there was no identity of accusation, that the injured persons were not the same, that the grade of punishment of the two offenses were different, that the indictments were not founded on the same physical act, and that their legal effect was different.

And in holding an acquittal of murder of the mother as no bar to a prosecution for an assault with intent to murder the daughter, the court in Johnson v. State (1880) 65 Ga. 94, said that even if the mother had been killed at the very time and place when and where the daughter was assaulted, it would not have been the same offense, and the plea of former jeopardy would hardly be held good; but the mother was killed at the house, and the daughter was assaulted at some distance therefrom, which put the case beyond doubt.

The acquittal of murder of one person is not a bar to a prosecution for assault with intent to murder, committed upon another person, whom the defendant shot at the same time as the other. Kelley v. State (1901) 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 40, 62 S. W. 915.

And an acquittal of murder of one policeman is not a bar to a prosecution for an assault with intent to murder another policeman at one and the same time, where the offenses were accomplished by separate shots in quick succession, with a formed design as to each man. People v. Stephens (1921) 297 Ill. 91, 130 N. E. 459.

A conviction for assault with intent to rob the express messenger on a train is not a bar to a prosecution for the murder of the fireman, in connection with the same train robbery. Taylor v. State (1900) 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 564, 55 S. W. 961. In this case the court said that while the offenses were committed in the same transaction, that is, in the offense of robbing the train, they were so distinct in point of time and action as to constitute separate offenses.

And the same holding as in the preceding case was made in the companion case of Keaton v. State (1900) 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 631, 57 S. W. 1125, involving the prosecution of another of the robbers engaged in the same train robbery.

III. Exceptions to rule.

An exception to the rule is made in some jurisdictions in cases where the assault upon, or the murder of, two or more persons, is committed by one and the same act; as, for example, by the single discharge of a firearm, or by one stroke of a knife or other similar weapon.

Thus, in Clem v. State (1873) 42 Ind. 420, 13 Am. Rep. 369, the court held good as against demurrer to an indictment for murder in the first degree for the killing of one person, a plea of former jeopardy alleging that the defendant had been indicted for murder in the first degree for killing another person at the same time, and had been convicted of murder in the second degree, thereby acquitting him of the crime of murder in the first degree, and that the crime charged against the defendant in the first indictment, of which he was tried and acquitted, was identical in all its parts, incidents, and circumstances with the crime charged in the second indictment, and that the evidence whereby alone the state can or will attempt to support and prove the second indictment is the same and in no wise different from that employed and produced against the defendant upon the trial of the first indictment. This plea was held to state in effect that the same act caused the death of both persons for whose killing the defendant was separately indicted, and was sustained under the rule, held to have been established by the authorities, that the killing of two or more persons by the same act constitutes but one crime, and that the state cannot indict the guilty party for killing one of the persons, and, after a conviction or acquittal, indict him for the killing of the other, because it cannot divide that which constitutes but one crime and make the different parts of it the bases of separate prosecutions. The court said that where, by the discharge of a firearm (the case in question), or a stroke of the same instrument, an injury is inflicted upon two or more persons, or death is produced, there is but one crime committed.

And in Sadberry v. State (1898) 39 Tex. Crim. Rep. 466, 46 S. W. 639, where it appeared that the defendant, on account of some indignities heaped upon him during the day by some fishermen, approached their tent at night with a loaded shotgun while they were seated around the camp fire, and fired one shot at them, wounding four of them, it was held that the defendant's conviction of assault with intent to murder, committed by shooting one of them, was a bar to a prosecution for the same offense in relation to another of them. This case, unlike the great majority of the cases, makes a distinction between a plea of former conviction and former acquittal, and the opinion states that the doctrine followed in the case at bar is the well-settled rule in Texas, and cites in support of its holding the cases of Simco v. State (1880) 9 Tex. App. 338, and Wright v. State (1884) 17 Tex. App. 152. The first case cited states the difference between the defense of former conviction and former acquittal as follows: "There is a marked difference in modern practice between the rules which govern the two pleas of autrefois acquit and autrefois convict, notwithstanding the immense amount of dictum and loose expression to the contrary found in the books. Autrefois acquit is only available in cases where the transaction is the same and the two indictments are susceptible of, and must be sustained by, the same proof. These two elements must combine, and are both sine qua non to the sufficiency of the plea. Autrefois convict only requires that the transaction, or the facts constituting it, be the same. To illustrate: If a party be indicted separately for the theft of three horses, the property of A, B, and C, taken at the same time or in one transaction, and he be tried on the first for the theft of A's horse, and the state fails from misnomer, or the defendant, by proving A's consent, should be acquitted, would the plea of that acquittal operate a bar to the conviction on the other trials because the transaction was one and the same? By no means. Why? Simply because the proof necessary to a conviction in the latter cases would not convict in the former. . . . But suppose the party was convicted of the theft of any one of the horses, would a plea of former conviction be a bar to conviction on the other two indictments? Clearly so. And why? Because the transaction—the taking of the three horses at the same time—would constitute but one offense in law, . . . and the plea would be good upon the strength of, and by virtue of, another rule, well settled in criminal practice, which allows the prosecutor to carve as large an offense out of a single transaction as he can, yet he must cut only once. . . . Here is where the doctrine of carving would come in and support the plea." The second case sets out this distinction in practically the same words.

And in the case of Taylor v. State (1900) 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 564, 55 S. W. 961, where a former conviction was held no bar, because the offenses, though committed in the same transaction, that is, in robbing a train, were so distinct in point of time and action as to constitute separate offenses, the court said: "It is conceded that there is a distinction made in our authorities between a former acquittal and a former conviction growing out of the same transaction; that the principle of carving applies with more force to a former conviction than to an acquittal,—as, where a number of cattle belonging to different owners are stolen at one and the same time and place, a party may be charged by distinct indictments for thefts of the cattle from various owners, and an acquittal as to one will not bar a prosecution alleging theft from another owner, but a conviction for theft from one owner will bar a prosecution for theft from another owner, committed at the same time and place.”

It would appear from the report of Lillie v. State (1916) 79 Tex. Crim. Rep. 615, 187 S. W. 482, that the court in that case was of the opinion that if two persons were killed or injured by the same shot, a conviction of the murder or assault of one of them would be a bar to a prosecution for the murder or assault of the other. In this case the defendant shot three distinct times and wounded his wife and killed a little girl, and was convicted of an assault with intent to murder his wife, and pleaded such former conviction upon being indicted for murdering the girl. The trial court refused a request to charge that if the jury believed from the evidence that the girl was shot in the same transaction in which the defendant's wife was shot, they should acquit him. This request was held to be properly refused. But the court, in response to another request, charged that unless the jury believed beyond a reasonable doubt that the shot that killed the girl was a separate and distinct shot from that which wounded the wife, that they should acquit the defendant. The appellate court said that the fact that the defendant killed the girl on the same occasion on which he shot at his wife would not make it the same transaction, as the shot that killed the girl was a separate and distinct shot from that which struck the wife, and held that the requested charge given by the trial court submitted the defendant's plea of former conviction, and that he got the benefit of such plea by such charge, and affirmed the conviction.

Where one wounds two persons in the same affray at the same instant of time, with the same knife, and with the same stroke thereof, a conviction of assault and battery on one of them is a bar to a prosecution for assault and battery upon the other. State v. Damon (1803) 2 Tyler (Vt.) 387. The court said that this was not a question between either of the persons injured by the assault and battery and their assailant,—redress has been or may be obtained by them by private actions,—but it is a question between the government and its subjects, and the defendant, having committed but one offense against the government by the single act of wounding two of its citizens, cannot, after being convicted of the assault as to one of them, be held again to answer the assault as to the other.

And in Com. v. Veley (1916) 63 Pa. Super. Ct. 489, the former acquittal of the defendant of the charge of involuntary manslaughter in causing the death of two women by drowning, upon the breaking of a dam, by reason of his gross negligence in the management and control of such dam, was held a bar to a prosecution of the defendant for the crime of involuntary manslaughter in causing the death of another woman likewise drowned at the same time, and the defendant, being under arrest under the second charge, was held to be entitled to be released on habeas corpus upon such plea of autrefois acquit. The court said: “There is identity of person, causal act, evidence, and time in regard to the cases in which the defendant was acquitted, and the one which he is again called to answer. . . . When the record shows that, as here, the alleged facts are identical in each case, and on the whole record, the trial judge would be obliged to direct a verdict of acquittal, the defendant should not be again subjected to the expense of another trial for the same cause, when the result is made certain by our decisions. . . . Where a party is accused of a crime, and acquitted by the verdict of a jury, such acquittal will be a complete protection against any subsequent prosecution for the same offense, provided the first indictment was such that he could have been lawfully found guilty upon it. This well-settled rule, while it shields the citizen against the peril of repeated prosecutions, is broad enough for all the purposes of public justice.

. . . The records present the case of several persons losing their lives through the same disaster, . . . which, in each of these prosecutions, is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the relator through defective construction of the dam. The negligent act, if any, which caused the breaking of the dam, was the act which caused the deaths of the three women named. There was but one causal effect, though the result affected many parties. . . . The criminal prosecution is for the injury done the commonwealth, and not for the injury done to the individual, who may, if entitled, obtain redress through a civil action. Where there is but one act of cause of injury, or death of a number of persons, there is but one injury to the commonwealth, but where the acts or causes are separate, they are separate injuries to the peace and dignity of the commonwealth."

In Gunter v. State (1895) 111 Ala. 23, 56 Am. St. Rep. 17, 20 So. 632, holding a plea of former acquittal demurrable because of its failure to allege that both assaults were committed by the same act, the court said: "It is the settled rule of this court that a defendant cannot be lawfully punished for two distinct felonies growing out of the same identical act, and where one is a necessary ingredient of the other; that a series of charges cannot be based upon the same offense, and subdivided into two or more indictable crimes. So, it has been held that, where the same act of unlawful shooting resulted in the death of two persons, an acquittal or conviction on the trial of one would be a good defense on a second trial for the alleged murder of the other, for the reason that the killing constituted but one crime, which could not be subdivided and made the basis of two prosecutions. . . . And again, where one blow produces two separate assaults and batteries on two different persons, a conviction of one may be pleaded in bar to an indictment for the other, for the reason that the defendant cannot be punished for two distinct assaults growing out of the same identical act. . . . It must not be overlooked, however, that the same individual may, at the time and in the same transaction, commit two or more distinct criminal offenses, and the acquittal of one will not bar punishment for the other, as if, in the same affray, one person shoots and kills one person, and by a second act shoots and wounds another. In such case, the two results, the killing of the one and the wounding of the other by different acts of shooting, cannot be said to grow out of the same unlawful act, but out of two distinct acts, and the party shooting is responsible for the two results from the two separate acts, and may be indicted and punished separately for each."

Some of the previously cited cases, holding that under the particular circumstances the former conviction or acquittal was no bar, employ language from which the inference may be drawn that where the two assaults or homicides are committed by the same shot, or by one stroke of the same weapon, a conviction or acquittal of one is a bar to a prosecution for the other.

So, in holding a plea of former acquittal bad, the court, in McCoy v. State (1885) 46 Ark. 141, said that the two persons were not wounded and killed by the same shot, and that the indictments were not founded upon the same physical act.

And a plea of former conviction was held defective in Jones v. State (1895) 61 Ark. 88, 32 S. W. 8, because of its failure to allege that the two persons were killed by the same act and volition.

And a former conviction was held no bar in Bell v. State (1915) 120 Ark. 530, 180 S. W. 186, because the killings were not the result of one shot.

The court said in the case of People v. Ochotski (1898) 115 Mich. 601, 73 N. W. 889, that the prosecution was not for the same offense within the meaning of the constitutional provision against trying a person for the same offense after acquittal upon the merits; that while the two offenses grew out of the same affray, no claim was made that the two persons were injured by the same blows; that it was the same transaction, but not the same volition; that there is a difference between one volition and one transaction.

And, in denying the contention that a former acquittal was a bar, the court, in Morris v. Territory (1909) 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 617, 99 Pac. 750, 101 Pac. 111, stated that it was not the same shot that killed both parties.

And in Augustine v. State (1899) 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 59, 96 Am. St. Rep. 765, 52 S. W. 77, the court said that the contention that a former acquittal was a bar might be urged with some force if the killing of both parties was done by one and the same act; that is, if the proof showed that but one shot was fired and it caused the double death, then it might be a good plea in bar.

The court said in Keaton v. State (1900) 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 621, 57 S. W. 1125, that "the true criterion in pleas of this character is, if the act for which defendant is being prosecuted is the same violence or act relied upon in the case wherein he was previously convicted, or if the two offenses constituted but one continuous transaction, in which appellant was the actor, this prosecution could not stand; but if the acts were distinct and separate transactions, and the prosecution is maintained to conviction against defendant in one, this fact cannot be pleaded in bar of a subsequent prosecution for a different offense by sheer force of the fact that the last offense occurred at one and the same time."

And in State v. Evans (1890) 33 W. Va. 417, 10 S. E. 792, holding a plea of former acquittal demurrable, the court said: "A case can be conceived where such a plea might be held good. For example, the engineer of a railway train might be charged with negligently and feloniously causing the death of one passenger in a wreck, and, being tried and found by the jury entirely blameless for the accident, such acquittal might, perhaps, constitute a perfect defense to a subsequent indictment for killing another passenger, who was on the same train. But this case presents no such question. The killing was the result of a separate act in each case, committed under degrees of provocation not necessarily identical, accompanied by apprehensions not necessarily the same. In fine, every element to constitute two separate offenses appears on the face of the plea to exist in this case, and therefore the demurrer was properly sustained."

But in Com. v. Browning (1912) 146 Ky. 770, 143 S. W. 407, the former conviction was held no bar although the two assaults were committed by the same shot. And see Keeton v. Com. (1892) 92 Ky. 522, 18 S. W. 359, supra. And in Vaughan v. Com. (1821) 2 Va. Cas. 273, it was held that, assuming that it was a shot by the same discharge of a shotgun, the acquittal of the charge of shooting one of them is not a bar to a prosecution for shooting the other.

And in the reported case (STATE v. CORBETT, ante, 328), where the defendant fired several shots in quick succession at three men who were making a joint attack upon him, it is held that, assuming that it was a single act, the killing of the three constitutes three separate offenses, and the court says that a single murderous shot may constitute a separate offense as to each human being whose life is cut short. Another view of this question is held to lead to the same result, that is, the view that the constitutional protection from being put twice in jeopardy makes the test the identity of the offense, and not of the act.

And in People v. Warren (1852) 1 Park. Crim. Rep. (N. Y.) 338, holding the acquittal of poisoning one person no bar to a prosecution for poisoning another, the court said that, assuming that the defendant by the

So far as the ultimate rights of the litigants are concerned, it makes no essential difference whether the will be construed so as to vest in Lizzie Benham one third of the trust fund held for her benefit, or whether she is excluded, because the same beneficiaries would inherit through her as would take in the event that she is excluded.

Rand v. Butler, 48 Conn. 293; Thomas v. Castle, 76 Conn. 447, 56 Atl. 854; Nicoll v. Irby, 83 Conn. 530, 77 Atl. 957.

Mr. William H. Comley, Jr., for defendant Close.

Mr. Edward J. McManus for defendant administrator of estate of Lizzie Benham.

Wheeler, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Those provisions of the will of Junius N. Benham which we are asked to construe gave two thirds of his estate in trust to pay the net income therefrom equally to his daughters, Mary B. Close and Lizzie Benham, during their lives. Upon the decease of either, one half of the two thirds was given to the issue of the deceased daughter, equally and per stirpes; and, in case the deceased daughter left no issue, this share was given to the testator's "next of kin," to be divided among them equally per stirpes. Lizzie Benham died without issue, and the share whose income she had enjoyed vested in the next of kin of the testator.

The first question for our decision is: When did the title to this share vest—at the testator's death, or at the death of the life tenant? The second: Who are the next of kin, the nearest blood relatives, or those entitled to take under the statutory distribution of intestate estates? And the third: Is the estate of Lizzie Benham entitled to a one-third part of this share?

1. The gift to the "next of kin" was one to a class. We have uniformly held that, unless the will sufficiently expresses a contrary intent, a limitation over, after a life estate, to the issue of the life tenant, and, failing issue, to the heirs, or heirs at law, or to the children or grandchildren of the testator, or to children of another than the testator, are gifts to a class, and vest in point of right upon the testator's death, although their right of possession is postponed until the termination of the life estate.

Will-remainder to next of kin—when vests.

We have adopted this rule in the belief that it leads to the early vesting of estates, and will carry out the probable intent of the testator, where the will indicates no contrary intent.

Norton v. Mortensen, 88 Conn. 28, 89 Atl. 882; Allen v. Almy, 87 Conn. 517, 89 Atl. 205, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 112; Bartram v. Powell, 88 Conn. 86, 89 Atl. 885; Wilde v. Bell, 86 Conn. 610, 87 Atl. 8; Nicoll v. Irby, 83 Conn. 530, 77 Atl. 957. This ruling is equally applicable to every class gift, and hence to the gift to "next of kin." Authorities elsewhere so hold with marked unanimity. Note to Tatham's Estate, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 855, 859.

This will, read in the light of the circumstances surrounding the testator, does not indicate in any particular an intention of the testator to postpone the vesting of the estate until the termination of the life estate. And we have expressly held that the creation of the life estate is insufficient to base thereon an implication that the testator intended such postponement. Thomas v. Castle, 76 Conn. 452, 56 Atl. 854.

If "next of kin" designates a class, and the title to this share vests in the class at the death of the testator, our next question is: What persons are included within this term? It is used in the law with two meanings: (1) The nearest blood relations according to the law of consanguinity; and (2) those entitled to take under the statutory distribution of intestate estates. We are to ascertain in which sense it is used in this will. Of course, the intention of the testator, adequately expressed, will determine. Where this is not manifest, some courts adopt the first, and some the second, meaning. The greater number of the cases attribute to this term, when used without qualifying words, the meaning of nearest blood relatives. This is the construction now adopted by the courts of Great Britain, Massachusetts, and Michigan. Elmsley v. Young, 2 Myl. & K. 780, 39 Eng. Reprint, 1142; Swasey v. Jaques, 144 Mass. 135, 59 Am. Rep. 65, 10 N. E. 758; Clark v. Mack, 161 Mich. 545, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 479, 126 N. W. 632. While in Ohio, New Hampshire, and North Carolina the term is held to designate those entitled to take under the Statute of Distributions.

In Godfrey v. Eppele, 100 Ohio St. 447, 11 A.L.R. 317, 126 N. E. 886, a life estate was given to the wife, and after her death the estate remaining was directed to be "equally divided between my and my wife's nearest kin." The court held that nearest of kin meant those entitled to take under their Statute of Distribution. Nearest of kin and next of kin are synonymous. The opinion of Chief Justice Nichols expresses our thought as to the meaning of "next of kin" in a will where there are no qualifying words: "In a primary sense, some authors say these expressions indicate the nearest degree of consanguinity. . . .

If it were followed, it would mean that, if a married man by his last will should provide simply that his property should pass to his nearest of kin, his wife, should she elect to take under the will, would be barred from all participation in the estate; and yet it is indisputable that, if the married man in whose home domestic felicity reigned were asked as to his conception of the personnel of his nearest of kin, his certain reply would be, 'My wife.' The primary sense, it is therefore fair to say, is not by any means the universal, or even popular, sense of the term.

. . . . There is a primary rule, applicable to the construction of wills, that the heir-at law shall not be disinherited by conjecture, but only by express words, or necessary implication. . . . We do not feel inclined to favor a construction unless it be a necessary one, against all principles of natural justice and against the well-settled policy of inheritance as provided by our law. We believe that the children of a testator's deceased brothers and sisters have just as much claim on his bounty as his living brother and sister would have. . . . Having the choice, therefore, of construction, we are disposed to adopt the interpretation that appears to us to be most consonant with the principles of natural justice, and which conforms to the well-settled legislative policy of the state, as well as the later judicial construction given the same phrase when found in our statutes." Ibid.; Pinkham v. Blair, 57 N. H. 245; May v. Lewis, 132 N. C. 115, 43 S. E. 550.

If "next of kin" be construed to mean nearest blood relatives, then the right of representation is denied, and children take to the exclusion of wife or husband. In common speech and general understanding, next of kin would include the children of a deceased child and the wife and husband. We are persuaded that it will carry out the testator's intent more often if we hold that this term, in the absence of qualifying words, was intended by the testator to include those who fall within the designation in the general speech and understanding of men, rather than in their primary and original sense as the nearest in blood. If we construe this term in connection with the other clauses of the will, as read in the light of the circumstances surrounding the testator, we find strong corroboration of his intention not to exclude the child of his deceased son. The will gives one third in fee simple to an only son, Frank N. Benham, who died February 13, 1918; the use for life of two thirds to two daughters equally, with remainder to their issue, and upon the decease of either to the testator's next of kin.

Here is the manifest intent of the testator to give his property to his blood, one third to his son outright and one third to the issue of each daughter after the mother's life use. And there is also the manifest intent to give equal shares to the son and the issue of the two daughters. If the right of representation is denied, and Lizzie is held to be one of the next of kin of the testator at his death, she may give her interest to whomsoever she will, and the intention of the testator will thus be defeated. If Frank N. Benham survived the testator's daughters, he would thus have had a two-thirds share of this estate; and if Mrs. Close survived both Frank and Lizzie, she would have had a two-thirds share of this estate, and if Lizzie survived Frank and Mrs. Close, she would take a one-third share of this estate. This would destroy the scheme of equality of the will.

Would it be natural for him to intend to make it possible for Lizzie to exclude his grandchildren from one third of his estate? The testator must be presumed to have known our Statute of Distributions and to have made his will with reference to that law. Its division must be regarded as the policy of our law. The gift to the issue and to the next of kin, equally and per stirpes, is significant of the intention of the testator to recognize the right of representation in his only grandson.

In Heath v. Bancroft, 49 Conn. 220, we expressed the view that, in the absence of words indicating a contrary intent, a will is to be interpreted as intending to distribute an estate per stirpes, and in accordance with the Statute of Distributions: "A further consideration in favor of the per stirpes rule is that this rule has for two centuries commended itself to the judgment of the community as one of justice, and has been and is the rule applied by the law in case of intestate estate. In these circumstances, this rule will be applied in the construction of a will, where the language of the will leaves the intent of the testator in serious doubt."

In the absence of an indicated intent, the policy of the law requires that the distribution to the next of kin should follow the statutory rule of distribution. We have not heretofore decided the point; the better reason appears to us to construe "next ^{-who are next} of kin" to mean ^{of kin.}

those who would be entitled to take under our Statute of Distributions.

The next of kin having been determined to be those who would take under the Statute of Distributions at the death of the testator, it remains to ascertain who the next of kin were. Mrs. Close, who survived her sister Lizzie, and Frank N. Benham, who was her brother and left issue in his son, F. Nelson Benham, admittedly were of the next of kin. Whether Lizzie Benham, the testator's daughter, was included in this class depends upon whether or not the testator so intended. In view of the relationship of Frank N. Benham and of Mrs. Close to Lizzie, and of the fact that she died intestate, it will make no practical difference to them or their issue, as to the share in the one third of which Lizzie enjoyed the life estate, whether she is included in or excluded from this class of the next of kin, since the same beneficiaries would inherit through her as would take if she were excluded.

The question, however, is one which we must determine. When the testator gave to Lizzie a life use, with remainder to her issue, he indicated his intention that she should have no share in or disposition of the remainder; and the subsequent provision that, in the event of her decease, the next of kin should take, was not intended to include her among the next of kin, and so to take a share of this interest upon the death of the testator should not be presumed to have made her a beneficiary in the share of which she had the life use upon failure of her issue to take, when at the very time he gave to her issue the remainder after her life estate. The language of the will gives to the next of kin on Lizzie's death, and this assumes that they shall be those living at her death. The testator should not be assumed to have made a disposition so unnatural; for, if he had intended that Lizzie should be one of the next of kin, he might have accomplished this, as we pointed out in Nicoll v. Irby, 83 Conn. 535, 77 Atl. 957, by a direct devise, or to such persons as Lizzie should by will appoint.

Wherever a life use is given, with remainder over to his issue, and, failing such, to the testator's children, heirs, or next of kin, or other class, we think it must be presumed that the testator intended to exclude the life tenant from this class, unless a contrary intent is manifest in the language of the will. In this case we do not have to rest this question upon this presumption. The language of the will discloses a plain purpose on the part of the testator, as we have observed before, to keep his estate in his own blood. If Lizzie be held to be one of the next of kin, she could at any time have transmitted it by will or descent; but she could not herself enjoy it. And her power of transmission might be exercised in favor of strangers to the exclusion of the blood of the testator.

The testator, as we hold, intended by the gift over to his next of kin to exclude Lizzie from that class. Practically the same question arose in Nicoll v. Irby, 83 Conn. 530, 77 Atl. 957, where a life estate was given to a brother, W., who was next of kin to the testator, and the remainder to any children begotten of W. who might survive him, and if he died without children the remainder should go to "my own heirs" in equal shares. We held that the testator's own heirs were to be determined as of the testator's death, and that by his own heirs he intended to designate those persons who should take at W.'s death, and that he intended to exclude from this class the life tenant, W. The case is of controlling authority upon this question, because its facts are so similar to the facts of this case.

The administrator on Lizzie Benham's estate relies upon Rand v. Butler, 48 Conn. 293, and Thomas v. Castle, 76 Conn. 447, 56 Atl. 864. The distinction between these cases and Nicoll v. Irby, supra, was definitely pointed out by Mr. Justice Thayer in Nicoll v. Irby, supra, and this difference was further illustrated in Wilde v. Bell, 86 Conn. 610, 87 Atl. 8. Unless a contrary intention is found in the will, when read in the light of its circumstances, this construction of similar language in these two cases must be regarded as of binding authority.

The Superior Court is advised that the plaintiff trustee should deliver the share of which Lizzie Benham enjoyed the life use to the persons and in the proportion as follows: To Mrs. Mary B. Close a one half, and to F. Nelson Benham, administrator on the estate of Frank N. Benham, the remaining one half, thus answering question 2 in the affirmative.

No costs will be taxed in this court.

ANNOTATION.

Right of devisee of precedent estate to take under limitation over to heirs or next of kin of the testator.

- I. Introduction, 356.
- II. Time for ascertaining membership of class, 356.
- III. Exclusion of first taker from class, 357.

I. Introduction.

This annotation supplements an earlier one on the same point in 13 A.L.R. 615, which discusses the questions: First, whether the circumstance that the devisee of the particular estate is an heir or next of kin supports the inference of an intention that the members of the class to take under the gift over are to be ascertained upon the termination of the particular estate, rather than at the time of testator's death; and second, whether, where the class is to be ascertained at the death of the testator, the first taker is to be excluded from taking as a member of the class.

II. Time for ascertaining membership of class.

The rule, which in the earlier annotation is stated to be generally recognized, that the circumstance that the first taker is one of the class to whom the limitation over is made, or that the first takers are the sole members of such class, is not of itself sufficient to vary the rule that a class described as testator's heirs or next of kin, to whom a remainder or executory interest is given by the will, is to be ascertained at the death of the testator, is also supported by the reported case (CLOSE v. BENHAM, ante, 351), Buzby's Estate (1922) — N. J. Eq. —, 115 Atl. 909, and Baugham v. Trust Co. of Washington (1921) 181 N. C. 406, 107 S. E. 431.

Although not of itself sufficient to overcome the prima facie meaning of the words of limitation, the fact that the first taker is among the members of the class or the sole member thereof at the time of testator's decease may be taken into consideration in ascertaining the testator's real intention. See, in addition to the decisions cited to this point in 13 A.L.R. 620, Lee v. Roberson (1921) 297 Ill. 321, 130 N. E. 774, and American Builder's Corp. v. Galligan (1921) — N. J. Eq. —, 114 Atl. 329.

In Lee v. Roberson (1921) 297 Ill. 321, 130 N. E. 774, where testator, after a devise to his son Nathaniel, further provided that, should such son "die without heirs, the estate which I have willed to him as above stated, it is my will shall be equally divided with my living heirs," it was held that, it being apparent that the testator did not use the word "heirs" in its technical sense, because it would not be possible for Nathaniel to die without heirs if the testator died leaving "living heirs," as his heirs might also be the heirs of Nathaniel, the term "living heirs" must be taken as meaning "living descendants;" that it was clear that the testator did not intend to include his son Nathaniel within the designation; and that it referred to descendants living at the death of Nathaniel.

In American Builder's Corp. v. Galligan (N. J.) supra, where testator gave his residuary estate to his brothers and sisters during the natural life of each and of the survivor of them, and after the decease of the last survivor "to such persons as would by law inherit the same," it was held that the natural deduction from the language used was that the remaindermen were to be ascertained at the termination of the precedent estate, rather than at the death of the testator, as it could not reasonably have meant that those for whom he had expressly provided for life were to be the remaindermen as well, such inference being also supported by testator's use of the word "would," importing futurity or contingency, and the fact that the testator used the phrase "such persons as would by law inherit," instead of the technical legal words "heirs at law," or "next of kin."

The foregoing decision was held controlling in Buzby's Estate (1922) — N. J. Eq. —, 115 Atl. 909, in which the form of gift was substantially the same.

III. Exclusion of first taker from class.

(Supplementing annotation in 13 A.L.R. 620.

The statement made in the reported case (CLOSE v. BENHAM, ante, 351), that wherever a life use is given with remainder over to the life tenant's issue, and, failing such, to the testator's children, heirs, or next of kin, or other class, it must be presumed that the testator intended to exclude the life tenant from this class unless a contrary intent is manifest from the language of the will, seems to be at variance with the holding of the cases reviewed in the earlier annotation, that the circumstance that one who is a member, or the sole member, of the class to which the limitation over is made, is the first taker, is not of itself sufficient to prevent the first taker from participating.

It is to be noted, however, that the decision in CLOSE v. BENHAM is not rested upon this presumption, but upon an intention disclosed by the will to keep the testator's estate in his own blood, which would have been defeated by giving the life tenant the power to transmit by will or descent a remainder which she could not herself enjoy. v.

MRS. AMANDA LEE BATTLE.

North Carolina Supreme Court—November 17, 1920.

(180 N. C. 375, 104 S. E. 658.)

Real property — parol purchase — acceptance of check — Statute of Frauds.

1. The receipt and collection by indorsement of a check tendered in payment of real estate purchased by parol and which identifies the property bought, is sufficient to take the transaction out of the Statute of Frauds.

[See note on this question beginning on page 363.]

— effect of execution of deed.

2. The preparation and execution of a deed to convey property contracted for by parol, and leaving it with the grantor's attorney for delivery, is sufficient to take the transaction out of the Statute of Frauds.

[See 25 R. C. L. 643.]

Trial — abandonment of contract — question for jury.

3. The question of abandonment of contracts is, on conflicting evidence, for the jury.

Rescission — contract for sale of real estate — disagreement as to payment of taxes.

4. A disagreement between the parties to a contract for purchase and sale of real estate, as to which shall pay the taxes for a certain year, does not affect the existence or validity of the contract.

Specific performance — delay in enforcing — effect on right to rents and profits.

5. Mere delay of purchaser to enforce specific performance of a contract to sell real estate does not deprive him of the right to rents and profits from the time the contract required the conveyance to be made.

CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the Superior Court for Durham County (Calvert, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to compel specific performance of a contract for sale of a house and lot; defendant appealing from the judgment in favor of plaintiff; and plaintiff appealing from so much of the judgment as refused to allow rents claimed by her. Affirmed on defendant's appeal. Modified on plaintiff's appeal.

Statement by Hoke, J.:

The action is for specific performance of a contract of sale of a house and lot in Durham, North Carolina, and there was evidence on the part of plaintiff tending to show a definite contract in writing on part of defendant to sell and convey this house and lot on Watts street in Durham, North Carolina, at the price of $8,650, the papers to be formally prepared and take effect as of June 1, 1918, and breach of same by defendant.

There was denial of any valid contract, defendant contending that no sufficient writing had been given, and defendant alleged further and offered evidence tending to show an abandonment by the parties of any contract they may have made concerning the property before action instituted. On issue submitted there was verdict for plaintiff.

Mr. James S. Manning, for defendant:

The evidence was incompetent until after a written memorandum sufficient under the Statute of Frauds was offered.

Gulley v. Macy, 84 N. C. 434; Winders v. Hill, 144 N. C. 617, 57 S. E. 456; Fortesque v. Crawford, 105 N. C. 29, 10 S. E. 910; Wade v. Newbern, 77 N. C. 460; Jordan v. Greensboro Furnace Co. 126 N. C. 143, 78 Am. St. Rep. 644, 35 S. E. 247.

The check given in part payment of the property was not a sufficient memorandum, nor was the property sufficiently described to be aided by parol.

Farthing v. Rochelle, 131 N. C. 563, 43 S. E. 1; Murdock v. Anderson, 57 N. C. (4 Jones Eq.) 77; Modlin v. Roanoke R. & Nav. Co. 145 N. C. 218, 58 S. E. 1075; Carson v. Ray, 52 N. C. (7 Jones L.) 609, 78 Am. Dec. 267; Speed v. Perry, 167 N. C. 122, 83 S. E. 176.

Mr. W. J. Brogden also for defendant.

Messrs. McLendon & Hedrick and R. P. Reade for plaintiff.

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is chiefly urged for error on the part of the defendant, that there was no sufficient evidence of a written contract to convey on her part within the effect and meaning of the Statute of Frauds; and, second, that on the entire evidence, if believed, there was an abandonment of the contract, and the court should have so instructed the jury. But, in our opinion, neither position can be sustained on the record presented. In reference to the first objection the pertinent facts in evidence tended to show:

That in early part of 1918 defendant had agreed by parol to sell to plaintiff her house and lot in the city of Durham at the price of $8,650, $1,000 to be paid in cash, and the remainder evidenced and secured by notes and deed of trust on the property, the papers to be prepared and to take effect as of June 1 of said year. That on March plaintiff drew a check in favor of defendant for $50 in terms as fol-

Durham, N. C., March 7, 1918.
The Fidelity Bank: to the order of Mrs. Lee $50, fifty and no/100 dollars.
on Watts street house.
[Signed] Mrs. J. E. Harper.

This check was collected by defendant, her written indorsement,
"Lee Battle," having been presented and entered on the check for its purpose.

Defendant further appeared by the advocate of defendant's answer, put in evidence, that, after making the agreement to sell the house in question, "defendant, on about June 1, 1918, executed a deed for the property described in the complaint, and delivered the deed to her attorney at Durham,

North Carolina, and at the same time defendant had her attorney execute a deed of trust describing the property and notes, all bearing date June 1, 1918, for plaintiff and defendant to execute," etc. On these facts our decisions are to the effect that either the check given in part payment on the bargain, collected by defendant through her written indorsement thereon in which the property is described as the "Watts house," or the written deed, conveying the property, formally prepared by de-
with her attorney for delivery, on receipt of the check as agreed upon, is a sufficient memorandum in writing without the intent and meaning of the Statute of Frauds, and this exception of defendant must be overruled.

See McPhail, 173 N. C. 238, 91
S. E. 947; Vinson v. Pugh, 173 N.
C. 91, 91 S. E. 888; Flowe v. Hart- man, 167 N. C. 448, 83 S. E. 841; Smith v. Smith, 179 N. C. 553, 103

S. E. 14; Lewis v. Murray, 177 N.
C. 17, 97 S. E. 750; Bateman v.
Hopkins, 157 N. C. 470, 73 S. E.
133, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 642. In reference to the deed, it was held in Vinson v. Pugh, 173 N. C. 190, 91
S. E. 838, that "where a vendor of lands has executed a deed reciting the consideration and expressed in conformity with a parol contract of sale theretofore made, and has given the deed to his agent to be delivered up on payment of the agreed purchase price, it is a sufficient writing within the meaning of the Statute of Frauds."

And on the sufficiency of the description as contained in the check the cases of Norton v. Smith and Lewis v. Murray, and the numerous authorities therein cited, show that the same is a full compliance with the statutory requirements on the subject.

The second objection is without merit. While there is much evidence on the part of the defendant tending to show an abandonment of the contract by the parties, there is evidence for the plaintiff to the contrary, and these opposing views were submitted to the jury on the issue as to abandonment, and they have determined the matter for the plaintiff. Trial—abandonment of contract

jury.

The clear and correct charge of his Honor is in full accord with our decisions on the subject, and we find no reason for disturbing the verdict of the jury on the issue. Robinett v. Hamby, 132
N. C. 353-356, 43 S. E. 907, citing Miller v. Pierce, 104 N. C. 389, 10
S. E. 554, and Faw v. Whittington, 72 N. C. 321. True, that after making the parol contract of sale, the parties seem to have had considerable discussion as to which of them should pay the taxes for 1918. The agreement being silent on that question, the position taken by plaintiff would seem to be correct, as the taxes became a lien on the property on June 1. Consol. Stat. § 7987;

Revisal, § 2864. But, however that may be, the difference referred to was only as to the effect and meaning of the contract the parties had made, and in no way involved or affected its existence or validity.

We find no error in the record in defendant's appeal, and the judgment for plaintiff is affirmed.

Plaintiff's Appeal.

Plaintiff excepts and appeals for the reason that the court declined to allow plaintiff for the rents of the property from June 1, 1918, the date when the contract was to take effect, the portion of the judgment which embodied the ruling being as follows: "In making the above calculation as to the amounts due by the respective parties, and in considering the suggestion of the defendant that specific performance should not be decreed in this case, the court took into consideration the testimony in respect to the laches of the plaintiff, the increase in the value of the property, and all the other facts and circumstances testified to, and, in passing upon the right to specific performance of the contract, considered in its discretion that, if specific performance were granted, the defendant should not be required to account for the rents from June 1, 1918, until demand was made for the deed in July, 1919, and said rents are not included in the amounts above set forth."

It is the accepted position with us that a vendee is entitled to specific performance of a binding contract to convey land (Combes v. Adams, 150 N. C. 64, 63 S. E. 186, citing in illustration Rudisill v. Whitener, 146 N. C. 403, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 81, 59 S. E. 995; Boles v. Caudle, 133 N. C. 528, 45 S. E. 835; Whitted v. Fuquay, 127 N. C. 68, 37 S. E. 141), and, when such right is properly established, it must be enforced as the parties have made it or as far as practicable under existent circumstances. This is a legal or recognized equitable right, and may not be modified or withheld in the discretion of the court merely because of some delay of the claimant to move in the matter, unless such delay be of a kind and extent as to create an abandonment or some recognized legal or equitable modification of the right under the contract or the remedy to enforce the same. On the facts presented, the jury have established a breach of defendant's contract to convey her house and lot to plaintiff, the papers to be drawn and take effect as of June 1, 1918, and in the judgment plaintiff has been held to account for interest from that date on the contract price. On an issue submitted, and under a correct charge, the jury have found that there has been no abandonment of the contract by the parties, and the right to specific performance has been established by the verdict as of June 1, 1918. In such case and under the rules ordinarily prevailing, plaintiff is entitled to the rents from the time when, by the term of the contract, the deed should have been made. We find nothing on the record to justify a modification of plaintiff's rights in the premises. Combes v. Adams, supra; Miller v. Jones, 68 W. Va. 526, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 408, 71 S. E. 248; 36 Cyc. p. 789; 25 R. C. L. p. 341; Fry, Spec. Perf. 5th ed. § 1147.

In the citation to Cyc., the principle applicable is stated as follows: "The decree should conform to the contract. It cannot add to the contract a promise not made. The court will not make a contract for the parties, but, where exact enforcement of the contract is impracticable, plaintiff may sometimes have approximate relief in some other form which will secure to him the substantial advantages of his contract."

On the facts presented, we are of opinion that the judgment should be reformed so as to allow plaintiff for the rents from June 1, 1918, the day when the deed should have been made, and plaintiff charged with interest from that date on the contract price.

Defendant's appeal: No error.

Plaintiff's appeal: Modified.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pike County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. R. H. Cooper and Childers & Childers for appellant.

Mr. Roscoe Vanover for appellee.

Hurt, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment in this action was for the defendant, who is the appellee here, and the plaintiff, who is the appellant here, has appealed. It is gathered from the pleadings, and from a stipulation of facts, upon which the action was tried, that on the 12th day of March, 1919, the plaintiff by a verbal contract sold a tract of land and a number of articles of personal property to the defendant, and, presumably in consideration of plaintiff's promise to convey the land to defendant and to deliver to him the personal property, the defendant promised, as a partial and first payment on the land and personalty, to pay the plaintiff the sum of $1,000, and pursuant thereto executed and delivered to plaintiff a check on a bank at Pikeville for that sum. Becoming dissatisfied with the contract, or for some other reason, the defendant notified the bank not to pay the check, and accordingly payment was refused. The plaintiff remained in possession of the land and personalty, and is yet in possession of same. There was no writing signed by the plaintiff evidencing the contract for the sale of the land, nor was there any written memorandum relating to the sale except the check, which defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff. The check was in the usual form, and requested the bank to pay to plaintiff the sum of $1,000, and in the space upon the check where a blank usually is, in which the person giving the check may write for what it was given, was inserted the words, "as payment on land." The defendant, as a defense to the promise on his part evidenced by the check, interposed the plea that it was without consideration, because it was given in part payment for land, which was sold by a verbal contract to him, and that such a contract was not obligatory, either upon him or the plaintiff, and for that reason he had received nothing, nor had the plaintiff parted with anything, in consideration of the check.

The plaintiff insists that the check was a sufficient memorandum in writing to take the contract out of the Statute of Frauds. The statute (Ky. Stat. § 470), so far as is necessary to be here considered, is as follows: "No action shall be brought to charge any person . . . upon any contract for the sale of real estate, . . . unless the promise, contract, agreement, representation, assurance, or ratification, or some memorandum or note thereof, be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by his authorized agent. . . ."

There must, in every transaction for the sale of land, be a writing signed by the vendor, as he has been held to be the party "to be charged therewith." Evans v. Stratton, 142 Ky. 615, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 393, 134 S.W. 1154; Murray v. Crawford, 138 Ky. 25, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 680, 127 S.W. 494. A writing evidencing a sale of land makes an obligatory contract when signed by both parties, or when signed by the vendor alone and is accepted by the vendee. In this case the check is signed only by the vendee, so far as the record demonstrates. Assuming that it was indorsed by the signature of the vendor, the words "as payment for land" in such a writing would not be a sufficient description of the thing sold to take the transaction out of the Statute of Frauds. The memorandum required by the Statute of Frauds to constitute evidence of a sale of land is such a written declaration of the parties that the court will be relieved from relying on parol evidence to ascertain the subject of the contract. The words in the check would afford no means by which the property sold could be designated. Nor would it identify the property. In such case the writing has invariably been held to be insufficient to take the transaction out of the Statute of Frauds. Campbell v. Preece, 133 Ky. 572, 118 S.W. 373; Tyler v. Onzts, 93 Ky. 331, 20 S.W. 256; Ellis v. Deadman, 4 Bibb, 466; Fugate v. Hansford, 3 Litt. (Ky.) 262; Henderson v. Perkins, 94 Ky. 207, 21 S.W. 1035.

The plaintiff, by a pleading filed nearly six months after the date of the transaction, offers to convey the land by a general warranty deed, and to deliver the personal property to defendant, and avers his ability to convey a good title, and further avers that he tenders a deed, but the record does not contain the deed which was said to be tendered. This, however, would be unavailing, as a deed alone, to take the transaction out of the statute, would not only have to be signed by the vendor, but would have to be accepted by the vendee. A verbal contract for the sale of land is not obligatory upon either the vendor or vendee, until a writing evidencing the sale, sufficient to satisfy the statute, has been executed by the vendor and accepted by the vendee. Curnutt v. Roberts, 11 B. Mon. 42; M'Dowel v. Delap, 2 A. K. Marsh. 33; Murray v. Pate, 6 Dana, 335; Lewis v. Grimes, 7 J. J. Marsh. 336; Fite v. Orr, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 349;

1 S. W. 582; Allen v. Stailey, — Ky. —, 119 S. W. 755; Todd v. Finley, 166 Ky. 546, 179 S. W. 455; Newburger v. Adams, 92 Ky. 26, 17 S. W. 162; Asher v. Brock, 95 Ky. 270, 24 S. W. 1070. If a vendor who is not obligated to perform a contract, because it is not in writing and signed by him, could make it obligatory upon a vendee by tendering him a deed a great time afterward, it would certainly be unfair. No legal obligation resting upon him to perform the contract, it should not be obligatory upon the vendee either. A contract which is not obligatory upon either party should not be made obligatory upon both, by the wish of one of the parties alone. The obligation must be mutual. Of course, it is not meant to be held that a verbal contract for the sale of land shall not be executed by the parties, but it is void because there is no such evidence in existence as the statute requires to be made in order to prove it.

It is contended that, the promise to pay the $1,000, evidenced by the check, being in part a promise to pay for personalty, it was not without consideration—in part, at least—as the sale of personal property was not affected by the Statute of Frauds. The contract, as alleged, was an entire contract; that is, the land and personal property were sold by one and the same contract. The contract was entire and indivisible. There was no sum fixed as the price of the personalty, separately from the price of the land, so that the sale of one could be held valid and the other invalid. The contract for the sale of the land being indivisible, the contract for the sale of the personalty must also fail, as the two cannot be separated. An entire contract which is not divisible and part of it is within the Statute of Frauds, all of it must share the same fate. Contract—to sell real estate and personal property—right to divide.

Holloway v. Hampton, 4 B. Mon. 415; Grant v. Grant, 63 Conn. 530, 38 Am. St. Rep. 379, 29 Atl. 15; Pond v. Sheean, 132 Ill. 312, 8 L.R.A. 414, 23 N. E. 1018; Mauck v. Melton, 64 Ind. 414.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Check or note as memorandum satisfying Statute of Frauds.

- I. Contract for sale of land:
 - a. Where check or note refers to contract, 363.
 - b. Where check or note does not refer to contract, 367.
- II. Contract other than for sale of land, 368.

I. Contract for sale of land.

a. Where check or note refers to contract.

As to whether a note or a check given for the purchase price of land, and referring expressly to the contract, is sufficient to take the contract out of the Statute of Frauds, the decisions are not altogether in harmony. In several cases it has been held that where the check or note contains the essential terms of the contract, expressed with such certainty that they may be understood from the writing itself, the instrument is a sufficient memorandum. Reynolds v. Kirk (1894) 105 Ala. 446, 17 So. 95 (note); Little v. Pearson (1828) 7 Pick. (Mass.) 301, 19 Am. Dec. 289 (note); HARPER v. BATTLE (reported herewith) ante, 357 (check). And see Work v. Cowhick (1876) 81 Ill. 317 (note); Purtell v. Bell (1918) 179 Ky. 356, 200 S. W. 644 (check); Mizell v. Burnett (1857) 49 N. C. (4 Jones, L.) 249, 69 Am. Dec. 744 (note); Neaves v. North State Min. Co. (1884) 90 N. C. 412, 47 Am. Rep. 529 (draft).

Thus, in Reynolds v. Kirk (Ala.) supra, wherein it appeared that a note recited the consideration as being the purchase of the land on which the maker then lived, and also contained a complete description of the property, the court said: "This was sufficient to take it out of the Statute of Frauds. It contains the essential terms of the contract—describes the land sold, the price to be paid, and the date of the payment—all expressed with such certainty as that they may be understood from the writing itself, which was signed by the purchaser, the complainant. It was, on the payment or tender of the purchase money, capable of specific enforcement."

So, in Little v. Pearson (Mass.) supra, a note for the purchase price of land, to which was subjoined a signed memorandum stating the obligation of the vendor, was held to be sufficient.

In Work v. Cowhick (1876) 81 Ill. 317, it was held that a note signed by the purchaser at an administrator's sale, reciting that it was "for land purchased by Elizabeth Work, this day, at administrator's sale, the sum of $480, etc., was a sufficient compliance with the statute.

In HARPER v. BATTLE (reported herewith) ante, 357, a check signed by the purchaser and indorsed by the vendor, which recited that it was given as a "payment on Watts street house," was held to be a sufficient memorandum. The court said: "The check given in part payment on the bargain collected by defendant through her written indorsement made thereon, in which the property is described as the 'Watts street house,' . . . is a sufficient memorandum in writing within the intent and meaning of the Statute of Frauds."

In Purtell v. Bell (1918) 179 Ky. 356, 200 S. W. 644, it was held that a check taken in connection with a letter stating the terms of the sale was sufficient where it not only contained in its body a statement showing it to be a "payment on the Bell property," but also a statement written on the back of it by the agent of the seller showing his acceptance of it "for delivery to Geo. G. Bell," the seller, and the application of the proceeds as a cash payment "on residence Bath avenue, Ashland, Ky." which was the property sold. The court said: "If, as argued by counsel for appellees, the evidence thus furnished by the check should not be held sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, the letter shortly thereafter written appellees by their agent, informing them of all the terms of the contract, describing more fully the property sold, and directing their early compliance with the terms of sale, together with the check, presents such a memorandum of the contract as should be held to substantially conform to the requirements of the statute, and such is our conclusion. The facts that the indorsement upon the check, showing the purpose of its acceptance and the application made of the proceeds, and that the latter [was] signed by the agent of appellees, constitutes as much a signing of these writings by the person to be charged as if both had been signed by the latter, and the two together furnish all the means necessary, not only to an understanding of the terms of the contract, but also to the designation and identification of the real estate constituting the subject thereof."

On the other hand, it has been held that a check or note given for the purchase price of land or an interest therein is insufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds where, though it recites the consideration, the recital does not state the essential terms of the contract. Thompson v. New South Coal Co. (1902) 135 Ala. 630, 62 L.R.A. 551, 93 Am. St. Rep. 49, 34 So. 31 (check); Hibernian Petroleum Co. v. Davies (1919) 41 Cal. App. 59, 181 Pac. 836 (check); Swisher v. Conrad (1919) 76 Fla. 644, 80 So. 564 (check); Second Nat. Bank v. Rouse (1911) 142 Ky. 612, 134 S. W. 1121 (note); Davis v. Dilbeck (1921) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 232 S. W. 927 (note). And see the reported case DUTEIL v. MULLINS, ante, 361).

Thus, in Swisher v. Conrad (1919) 76 Fla. 644, 80 So. 564, it was held that a check bearing an indorsement, "For 1st payment Conrad property Foot of Waddell St.," did not disclose the essential elements of an enforceable contract for the sale of lands. The court said: "If the agreement or the promise, or the note or memorandum thereof that is in writing, does not of itself, or by permissible and proper reference, disclose the essential terms of the contract to which the signed agreement or promise, or the note or memorandum thereof, refers, no action can be brought thereon, since the statute is designed to prescribe the only mode by which an otherwise enforceable contract may be evidenced. In other words, a note or memorandum in writing duly signed will not satisfy our Statute of Frauds unless such writing contains the essential elements of an enforceable contract. In this case a check drawn by plaintiff to the order of defendant's alleged agent bears an indorsement, 'For 1st payment Conrad property Foot of Waddell St.,' and the indorsement of the alleged agent of the defendant, with perforations showing payment. This check, with its indorsements, obviously does not disclose the essential elements of an enforceable contract for the sale of lands. The indorsement as to the check, being the first payment on property, does not show the existence of an enforceable contract for the sale of lands."

So, a check given for earnest money which contained the words, "part payment on coal lands," was held, in Thompson v. New South Coal Co. (Ala.) supra, not to be sufficiently specific to ascertain the lands meant without resort to parol evidence, and hence not a memorandum satisfying the Statute of Frauds. The court said: "One theory seems to be that the indorsement of the check was a sufficient subscription by the coal company of the contract, within the purview of the statute. Of course, if this be sound, the retention by the defendant of the money collected upon it is of no consequence. If it be true that the indorsement by the company of its name across the back of the check was the equivalent of its subscription of the contract under the statute, this made the contract its in fact—just as though it had affixed its name at the bottom of it—and there would be no need for the invocation of the doctrine of estoppel. But we do not think that the check was any part of the contract itself, although it may have been attached to it. They are not only separate and distinct pieces of paper, but separate and distinct obligations. The check was a sequence to the contract, and constituted no part of it. It was nothing more than the payment of a part of the purchase money after the terms of the contract had been fully agreed upon, reduced to writing, and signed by Montgomery. It came into existence necessarily after the contract had become a completed executory one. Indeed, the dates of the two papers show this to be so. The fact that the check was attached to the contract did not make it a writing containing any part of the negotiations leading up to and resulting in the contract, and, therefore, does not bring the case in that category of cases in which several writings containing the negotiations between the parties culminate in an agreement of sale. . . . There is nothing on its face that shows it was given in part payment for the particular lands described in the alleged contract. It is true it does contain the words 'part payment on coal lands,' but what lands are there referred to would have to be ascertained by resort to parol evidence, which, of course, could not be done. It is, therefore, not in and of itself a sufficient memorandum of the sale of the lands within the requisites of the statute, if it be conceded that the indorsement by the coal company of the check is a subscription within the meaning of the statute."

It was alleged in Hibernian Petroleum Co. v. Davies (1919) 41 Cal. App. 59, 181 Pac. 836, that the defendant entered into a contract with the plaintiff corporation whereby he agreed that on the payment to him of a bonus of $10,000, he would execute and deliver to the plaintiff a lease of certain land for oil and gas purposes. It appeared that the first payment on the bonus was made by a check on which was written the following memorandum: "Hibernian Petroleum Company $1,000, to J. F. Davies, Dr. Bakersfield, Cal., May 15th—first instalment of bonus on lease in Sunset

Field, northwest quarter and west half of northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of sec. 4, township 11 north, range 23 W., S. B. & M. sixty acres more or less." The check also contained the following indorsement: "In full settlement of within account. [Signed] J. F. Davies." A second check in the sum of $4,000 was in the same form except as to the date and amount. When the balance of the amount was tendered the defendant refused to execute the lease. The court said: "The principal question on this appeal arises on this point: Did the acceptance of these checks, with the recitals therein that they were from the Hibernian Petroleum Company, and on account of bonus on the lease that Sinclair had contracted for, and the fact that they were approved by Sinclair as president and countersigned by the secretary of the company, create any liability on the part of the defendant, Davies, to the plaintiff company? Plaintiff's counsel contend that these checks, either or both of them, with defendant's indorsement and signature thereon, constitute a memorandum in writing, signed by the party to be charged, sufficient to evidence a contract to execute a lease to the plaintiff company of the lands in question, and within the Statute of Frauds. No justification in law is shown in support of such a conclusion. The memorandum indorsed on the checks does not indicate to whom the lease was to be executed, and it was not signed by the defendant, the party to be charged. His signature on the back of the check was an acknowledgment of receipt of the payments 'in settlement of the account,' referring, we must assume, to the instalments on the bonus agreement he had entered into with H. E. Sinclair personally. The evidence justifies the conclusion that he accepted these checks as payment of the obligation of Sinclair, and in pursuance of his agreement to execute a lease to Sinclair, but there is nothing in the transaction to indicate that Sinclair, or the defendant, or the plaintiff company itself, understood as intended by this memorandum anything more than a direction of the payment of this money on account of the agreement previously made between Sinclair and the defendant. It is true, as appellant sets forth in its brief, that defendant was notified by the contents of these checks that Sinclair and the secretary of the corporation had drawn them on the Hibernian Petroleum Company, and that they had no implied authority to use the corporation's funds for Sinclair's personal contracts; but he might properly assume, what doubtless is a fact, that the corporation was acquiring an interest in this lease through and in the name of Sinclair, as it legitimately could have done."

The reported case (DUTEL v. MUL-LINS, ante, 361) holds that the words "as payment for land" indorsed on a check are not a sufficient description of the thing sold to take the transaction out of the Statute of Frauds. The court states the rule which is supported by all the cases in this subdivision, viz., that the memorandum required by the Statute of Frauds to constitute evidence of a sale of land is such a written declaration of the parties that the court will be relieved from relying on parol evidence to ascertain the subject of the contract.

Likewise, in Davis v. Dilbeck (1921) — Tex. Civ. App. — 232 S. W. 927, the court held to be an insufficient memorandum a note which contained the following memorandum: "This note is given as a forfeit on 331½ acres land, and in case I give perfect title thereto in a reasonable time, then this note is null and void, and as soon as I deliver deed to 331½ acres of land out of J. Burns's survey to J. W. Dilbeck. L. F. Davis." The court said: "The instrument of writing relied on as taking the case out of the Statute of Frauds is insufficient, because it does not describe the land referred to with that degree of certainty which the authorities hold to be requisite."

In Second Nat. Bank v. Rouse (1911) 142 Ky. 612, 134 S. W. 1121, a promissory note which recited that it was given "for all the timber on 486 acres of land on George's creek, from 18 inches at the ground up, and the privilege to remove it," was held to be insufficient on the ground that it did not bind the vendor, and it was also held that a subsequent indorsement of the note by him did not make it sufficient. The court said: "This note was signed by J. B. Preston, the buyer, not the seller of the timber. It is a promise to pay $400, with 6 per cent interest, one year from the date thereof. It was not intended to evidence the contract of sale, was not to be held by the purchaser as a protection to him, or to guarantee to him any rights, and when indorsed by S. G. Preston it was not his intention, in indorsing it, to give it vitality as a contract representing the sale of this timber. His purpose was to invest the bank with the title to the note. This his indorsement did, and beyond this it had no effect whatever. The purchaser of the timber, J. B. Preston, had nothing whatever to show that he had bought it. S. G. Preston had signed nothing to show that he had sold it. A contract, to be binding, must be mutual. One party cannot be bound while the other has the option to accept or reject its terms. The minds must have met, and the contract, to be binding upon one, must be such that the other is likewise bound. The execution of the note bound J. B. Preston to pay the $400, with interest at the date of its maturity. This was the extent to which he was bound. If it took the indorsement of S. G. Preston to complete the contract, then it was never completed, but remained open until he indorsed the note to the bank, and might never have been closed unless he had elected to indorse it. The note cannot be accepted as an evidence of the contract of sale within the meaning of the statute, which contemplates that some memorandum, at least, evidencing the contract, must be signed by the seller and delivered by him to the buyer or to someone representing him, as was expressly decided in Murray v. Pate (1838) 6 Dana (Ky.) 335. The note, even when indorsed by S. G. Preston, fails to meet the requirements of the statute, and the contract for the sale of this timber must be treated as a verbal contract."

So, the indorsement of the name of the owner on a check given for the earnest money has been held not to be a sufficient memorandum to comply with the Statute of Frauds, where the agreement of sale was entered into by an agent without authority to make the sale. Thompson v. New South Coal Co. (1902) 135 Ala. 630, 62 L.R.A. 551, 93 Am. St. Rep. 49, 34 So. 31 (check); Koenig v. Dohm (1904) 209 Ill. 468, 70 N. E. 1061 (check). Thus, it appeared in the case first cited that an agent of the defendant corporation entered into an unauthorized agreement for the sale of certain coal lands belonging to the corporation, signing the agreement as an individual, and not as agent. The agreement, to which was attached a check of the purchasers reciting that it was given in "part payment on coal lands," was forwarded to the corporation. It also appeared that the check was indorsed by it and the money retained, but that no formal consummation of the contract was ever made. It was held that the indorsement of the check was not a sufficient subscription of the contract under the statute.

b. Where check or note does not refer to contract.

A check or note given in connection with the sale of lands or an interest therein, which is in the ordinary form and contains no reference to the essential terms of the contract of sale, does not constitute a sufficient memorandum within the Statute of Frauds. McKinnon v. Mixon (1900) 128 Ala. 612, 29 So. 690 (note); Allen v. Stailey (1909) — Ky. —, 119 S. W. 755 (check); Hefford v. Lichtman (1921) 116 Misc. 692, 190 N. Y. Supp. 554; Burris v. Starr (1914) 165 N. C. 657, 81 S. E. 929, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 71 (note); Moore v. Powell (1894) 6 Tex. Civ. App. 43, 25 S. W. 472 (check).

Thus, in Allen v. Stailey (1909) — Ky. —, 119 S. W. 755, wherein it appeared that a check, which contained no recital as to the consideration, was claimed to have been given in payment for a passageway over the lands of the defendant, the court said: "The check is unavailing to take the contract out of the Statute of Frauds and perjuries. In the first place, it did not identify or describe the passway which was the subject of the contract. In the second place, it was not 'signed by the party to be charged.' While a written memorandum that will satisfy the statute may be an undelivered writing, or a writing other than the contract which rests upon it, it still is necessary for the parties to have entered into a contract respecting the land. In this case there was not a contract, for the minds of the parties never met. One supposed he was granting a passway for foot passengers, and nothing more. The other supposed he was obtaining a passway for vehicles, horses, and foot passengers, and nothing less. We have not the words of the agreement before us. The proof does not disclose them. So, we are unable to say that the contract was entered into between the parties. The check, aside from the deficiencies already indicated, was not a contract, as it was not accepted." To the same effect, see Moore v. Powell (Tex.) supra.

Likewise, in McKinnon v. Mixon (Ala.) supra, it appeared that a vendor accepted the note of the purchaser in payment of the purchase money, and agreed to deliver a deed to the premises on the payment of the note. The note was paid in part and credit was given, but the note was never paid in full and no deed was ever delivered. The proof was held to show no operative contract for the sale of lands, the court saying: "The validity of the contract relied on to estop the defendant being so put in issue, the plaintiff held the affirmative upon that issue, and the burden was on him to show a sale was made to Leslie in such way as to escape condemnation by the Statute of Frauds. . . . By the evidence it was not shown that in the attempt to sell, any writing was made other than the note referred to, and that fails as a note or memorandum of the sale in that it contains no reference to a sale of lands; and though part of the price was paid it does not appear that Leslie was put in possession of the lands by the plaintiff. Possession must concur with payment, and, to uphold the contract under the exception made by the statute, must be yielded and taken under and in pursuance of the agreement to sell." In that case it did not appear that any writing was signed by the vendor other than the undelivered deed.

In Burriss v. Starr (1914) 165 N. C. 657, 81 S. E. 929, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 71, the court said: "A signature to a paper imposes no obligation unless there is in its language sufficient for that purpose; and where there is such language, the signature of the party binds him, though it is not subscribed to the instrument, but appears in some other part of it, if the intention is that it should be his contract. It must be remembered that the requirement of the statute is not that the party shall sign a written memorandum merely, but that all contracts to sell or convey any lands, or any interest in or concerning them, shall be void, 'unless said contract or some memorandum or note thereof be put in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by some other person by him thereto lawfully authorized.' Revisal, § 976 (italics ours). It is, therefore, a contract to sell or convey the land that should be in the memorandum or writing to be signed. There is no such contract here. The note of the defendant, although written by the plaintiff, contained only a promise on his part to pay the money, but no reciprocal promise of the defendant to convey the land; that is, the dower tract. The court was, therefore, right in holding that plaintiff was not entitled to specific performance of any contract to convey land, or to damages for a breach thereof, and for the simple reason that there was no such contract."

II. Contract other than for sale of land.

It will be noted that the effect of a check or note as a part payment will satisfy the statute is not the scope of the annotation.

Giving of a note to secure the debt of another has been held to be a memorandum of a promise for the debt. McLanahan v. Berlin (1910) 85 Neb. 850, 17 W. 684; Saunders v. Bank of Newburg (1911) 112 Va. 443, 114 W. 714, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 982. Holmes v. Durkee (1883) 111 N. H. (Eng.) 23.

A note given for the purchase of chattels is a sufficient memorandum of the contract of purchase. v. Ocmulgee Mills (1876) 55 Ga. 88. Rachal v. Normand (1843) 1 La. 88.

Phillips v. Ocmulgee Mills (Ga.) the court said: "The trade, at the time it was made, was in parol, and it was urged that it is within the Statute of Frauds, and therefore void. The trade was made and the note was burned, and before this was brought, the defendant gave a receipt for the cotton, and dated it at the time of the trade. We should act on his part takes the note out of the operation of the statute—the contract be reduced to writing, signed by the party to be bound, any time before suit is brought, it is enough; especially if the note at the time of the contract relates back and becomes part of the contract, and it does not matter that it was written and signed after the thing sold was destroyed, if there is no fraud in procuring the note, and if the party charging himself with the destruction of what he destroyed. He should be commended for what, in honor and justice, he should have done, to wit, to put in writing the truth about the trade he had fairly made, though, without fault on the part of the seller, it had been of no profit at all to him. Such conduct approaches the rectitude of the man commended in Scripture, who 'sweareth to his own hurt,' and is all the more admirable in these times when such virtue is so rarely exhibited. The giving of the note, then, if it be not strictly in legal parlance a ratification of the parol contract, operates so to bind the defendant as to take the note out of the Statute of Frauds."

Likewise, in Rachal v. Normand (La.) supra, a promissory note reciting that it was given for the price of a slave was held to be a sufficient memorandum satisfying a statute requiring a contract for the sale of a slave to be in writing.

The note involved in Re Neff (1907) 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 349, 84 C. C. A. 561, 157 Fed. 57, appeal dismissed for want of jurisdiction and writ of certiorari denied in (1908) 212 U. S. 562, 53 L. ed. 652, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 688, was in the following terms: "Two years after date, I, we, or either of us promise to pay to the order of Miss Emily M. Nichols twenty-five hundred and no 100 dollars at the office of the Avery-Caldwell Mfg. Co., upon surrender of certificate No. 38 for 2,500 shares of preferred stock of said company, value received interest 7 per cent per annum." It was held that this was a written agreement to take and pay for the shares named, signed by the parties to be charged, and was not invalid under the Statute of Frauds because not signed by the claimants also.

but who are at the time engaged in a partnership business in which the real estate is used, is nevertheless community property and subject to the rights of their respective wives therein, in the absence of evidence that the real estate was acquired as a firm asset, and that the same was required to pay off firm debts or to adjust equities between the partners. A contract to convey such land by the two husbands alone, and in which the two wives did not join, will not be specifically enforced.

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the District Court for Bernalillo County (Hickey, J.) in favor of plaintiff in a suit brought to compel specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Thomas J. Mabry, for appellants:

A contract for the conveyance of community property, in which the wife does not join, cannot be specifically enforced.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit for specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate. The facts are all stipulated, and may be briefly stated as follows: W. H. Adams and Mrs. W. H. Adams were husband and wife on April 15, 1916. James L. Curd and Annie B. Curd were husband and wife on said April 15th 1916. In the year 1910 Curd and Adams began the operation of a dairy business as copartners under the firm name of Curd & Adams. There was no written partnership agreement, but they divided the profits and shared the losses equally. In 1912 the property involved was conveyed by one Ferguson and wife to the said James L. Curd and W. H. Adams as individuals, $600 of the purchase price of the land being paid; each of the said vendees contributing one half thereof. They thereupon borrowed $2,000, with which they completed the payment of the purchase price, and this loan was afterwards paid in due course out of the income of the dairy business. From the time of the purchase of this property until the 15th day of April, 1916, the firm of Curd & Adams operated their dairy business on the premises, and the two Adamses and the two Curds used the premises for their homes, neither family having any other homestead during all that time. On April 15, 1916, Curd and Adams, "doing business as Curd & Adams," leased to one Miller and one Blumen-shine a partnership under the name of Miller & Blumenshine, the premises involved for a period of five years from that date, and covenanted with said Miller & Blumenshine that, upon the payment of $3,000 at any time within the term of the lease, they would execute and deliver a warranty deed for the premises. This lease and contract to sell was not signed by the wives of said Curd and said Adams, and the women protested against the making of the said lease, and especially as to giving the option to buy the property, but no notice of said protest was ever brought home to said lessees. About April 1, 1916, the said Curd & Adams negotiated with said Miller & Blumenshine to sell their partnership dairy business, cows, equipment, and all personal property connected with said business, and also to leave the premises with an option to buy as heretofore mentioned. Curd & Adams remained in possession of all of said personal property and said real estate until April 15, 1916, when the lease was executed and possession delivered to the said Miller & Blumenshine. On said date the firm of Curd & Adams ceased to exist, except for the purpose of collecting the accounts due it. The rent under said lease was thereafter paid and divided between the said Adams & Curd until the time of Curd's death in 1919, since which time Curd's share has been paid to his widow, the said Annie B. Curd. The said sale of the partnership property and the lease and covenant to sell the real estate in question was not made for the purpose of paying partnership debts, but was done simply in the course and at the time of closing out the partnership business.

It is stipulated by counsel that there is but one question to be considered, and that is whether the real estate in question was partnership property, or whether it was the community property of the two families mentioned. The judgment of the court below was for specific performance of the contract to sell and convey, and the correctness of this judgment will turn upon the question, among other things, as to whether this real estate was partnership property or was community property.

In determining the question involved some general considerations will be first stated.

It may be said generally that a partnership, unaided by statute, cannot hold title to real estate. It is said by Mr. Parsons and others that the reason for this is that a partnership is not a person, and is consequently incapable of taking by deed. Parsons, Partn. 2d ed. p. 370.

Partners ordinarily hold real estate as tenants in common under a conveyance to them by name. 20 R. C. L. Partnership, § 56; Rowley, Partn. § 283.

The presumption is always against the inclusion in the firm assets of real estate held by the partners as tenants in common, and the presumption is that the ownership is where the muniments of title place it. 20 R. C. L. § 61; Goldthwaite v. Janney, 102 Ala. 431, 15 So. 560, 28 L.R.A. 161, 48 Am. St. Rep. 56, and note.

Real estate, however, may in equity be considered firm property, and will be so considered when such is the intention and agreement of the partners at the time of its acquisition. 20 R. C. L. § 61; Page v. Thomas, 43 Ohio St. 38, 1 N. E. 79, 54 Am. Rep. 788, and note; Goldthwaite v. Janney, supra.

There need be no express agreement to that effect; it may be implied; but in every case there must be such an agreement. The intention or agreement of the partners may be evidenced by parol proof, and need not be in writing. 20 R. C. L. § 62; Goldthwaite v. Janney, supra; Robinson Bank v. Miller, 153 Ill. 244, 38 N. E. 1078, 27 L.R.A. 449, 46 Am. St. Rep. 883, and notes; Johnson v. Hogan, 158 Mich. 635, 123 N. W. 891, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 889, and note.

Evidence of various kinds of facts is admissible to show such intention or agreement, such as the use to which the property is put, or the manner in which the accounts of the firm, in regard to the purchase price, are kept, and showing whether or not each partner's share of the purchase price is charged to him, or whether the item is carried as a firm item; whether the property was purchased with firm money, whether it was purchased for firm purposes, and perhaps other similar facts. 20 R. C. L. §§ 62-65.

Where real estate the title whereof is held by the partners as tenants in common is in fact acquired as, and intended by the partners to be, partnership property, that result is effectuated by means of the doctrine of equitable conversion, whereby the land is treated as personalty for the purpose of paying the firm debts, and adjusting accounts and equities between the partners. The basis of the application of this doctrine is that a trust is implied for the benefit of the partnership. 20 R. C. L. § 74; Adams v. Church, 42 Or. 270, 70 Pac. 1037, 59 L.R.A. 782, 95 Am. St. Rep. 740, and notes.

In England the doctrine of "out and out" equitable conversion—that is, that the real estate will be treated as partnership personalty for all purposes, even as against the right of dower and inheritance—is recognized both by decisions and later by statute. 20 R. C. L. § 75.

In America, however, the doctrine of equitable conversion is recognized only so far as is necessary to effectuate the payment of the partnership debts and the adjustment of the equities between the partners; and when this has been done, all real estate, remaining in specie, assumes all of its characteristics as such, and is subject to dower or other rights of the wife, and descends to the heirs as in ordinary cases. 20 R. C. L. §§ 76, 77, 79; Adams v. Church, 42 Or. 270, 59 L.R.A. 782, 95 Am. St. Rep. 740, 70 Pac. 1037; Darrow v. Calkins, 154 N. Y. 503, 49 N. E. 61, 48 L.R.A. 299, 61 Am. St. Rep. 637, and note; Sieg v.

Greene, 141 C. C. A. 79, 225 Fed. 955, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 1006.

The doctrine does not exclude the right of the partners to agree upon an "out and out" conversion of the real estate into personalty, but in the absence of such agreement the doctrine prevails without exception.

This doctrine is necessarily sound. A partnership can really own no property. The property of the firm is owned by the members thereof. It is charged in their hands with an implied trust for the payment of the partnership debts and the adjustment of the equities between the partners. When these things have been accomplished, the partners own the property discharged of the trust, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary.

Applying some of these considerations to the facts in this case, it becomes apparent that the appellee, plaintiff below, cannot recover. The real estate in question was purchased by the two partners in their individual capacity, each paying at the time $300 out of his individual funds. There is no evidence in the record that the partners at this time agreed or understood that the purchase was made for the partnership, or otherwise than as tenants in common. The partners gave a mortgage on the property in their individual capacities, and the mortgage was afterwards paid out of the profits of the dairy business in which the partners were engaged. There is no evidence in the record that these moneys were treated as firm moneys, or that they were not paid out as the individual moneys of the parties, share and share alike. It appears that the premises were used in carrying on the operations of the dairy business by the partners, but it likewise appears that each partner, with his wife, resided upon the premises, and used the same as his home, and that neither had any other home during the existence of the partnership.

The use of the premises was as much for a home-Husband and wife—community property—partnership real estate.
 stead for these parties as for the conducting of the dairy business, and such use for said last-mentioned purpose cannot, under the circumstances, be said to be controlling. The mere use of the property for firm business is only a slight circumstance tending to show that the premises were intended to be partnership property. 20 R. C. L. § 62. The partnership was free from debt. There were no equities requiring adjustment between the partners when they determined to sell out their dairy business to the appellee and his then partner. They sold out the dairy business, and at the same time executed the lease and the covenant to sell and convey. The real estate had served all of its purposes as a trust estate for the payment of debts and the adjustment of equities, if any there should be, and it was then released from said trust, and assumed all of its characteristics as real estate. So, even if it did appear from the evidence, which as we have shown it does not, that the partners intended and agreed, at the time they bought the land, that it should be partnership property, when the business of the partnership was closed up, it was released from the trust, and was reconverted into real estate to take its course as such and to be subjected to community property rights, descent, and distribution as in other cases. The only direct words in the record hinting at the fact that the real estate was considered by the partners as partnership property is in the recital in the lease and covenant that it was executed by "Curd and Adams, 'doing business as Curd & Adams.'" This recital cannot be deemed as sufficient evidence to show that these two partners had, at the time they purchased this property, agreed or understood that it was to be partnership property, or that they intended at the time of the making of the lease and covenant to then agree that it was to be considered partnership property, and to be converted into personalty for distribution as such, if, indeed, this could be done without the consent of the wives. The recital is to be held more properly to be merely a description of persons.

It follows that this real estate was not partnership property when acquired, and never became such, and, even if it had become such, it was reconverted into real estate by the winding up of the affairs of the partnership, and that the right of the respective wives of the partners attached to the same as community property.

If the premises were community property, then it became necessary for both husband and wife to join in any deed conveying the same under the provisions of chapter 84, Laws 1915; and any transfer or conveyance of the same attempted to be made by the husband alone was void and of no effect. If a transfer or conveyance of the property by these husbands without their wives joining would be void and of no effect, then a contract to make such a transfer or conveyance would likewise be void and of no effect, at least, so far as specific performance of the contract is concerned.

It follows from the foregoing that there is error in the decree, and that the cause should be reversed and remanded, with directions to set aside the decree for specific performance, and to enter a decree in favor of the appellants and against the appellee; and it is so ordered.

Raynolds, Ch. J., and Parker, J., concur.

ANNOTATION.

Community character of interest of a partner in partnership real property.

Seemingly the reported case (ADAMS v. BLUMENSHINE, ante, 369) is the only one to have squarely held that real estate acquired by husbands in carrying on a partnership business and used by them in such business, title being in them as individuals, constitutes community property so as to subject it to the rights of their respective wives therein, at least, in the absence of proof that it was acquired as a firm asset, and that it is required to pay off firm debts or to adjust equities between the partners. This, it will be recalled, was upon the theory that the partners held as tenants in common, and that the doctrine of equitable conversion applies only so far as is necessary to settle partnership affairs, and that, when this has been done, all real estate remaining in specie assumes all its characteristics as such so as to be subject to the rights of the wives of the partners. This, as is stated in the ADAMS CASE, is the generally accepted theory in the United States, whereas in England and Canada, partnership real estate is regarded as personalty for all purposes, rather than as real estate owned by the partners jointly or as tenants in common. WESTERN WORKMAN'S PUBLISHING SOCIETY, Appt.

Washington Supreme Court (Dept. No. 2) — November 30, 1920.

(113 Wash. 283, 193 Pac. 691.)

Bailment — admixture of funds — liability for loss.

1. A bailee who accepts money for safe-keeping, places it in a private safe mixed with his own funds, or deposits it in his private account at a bank, is guilty of conversion, which renders him absolutely liable in case the money is stolen or embezzled even without his fault.

[See note on this question beginning on page 378.]

Principal and agent — authority of agent — assumption by patrons.

2. Patrons of a corporation which receive money on deposit at a branch office may assume that the agent in charge of such branch has authority to receive money for such purpose, and that money left with him was left with the corporation, although the account books and receipts were in his individual name, and the corporation did not regard the money as in its possession until it reached its home office and permanent receipts were given for it.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County (Allen, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover money alleged to have been deposited with defendant for safe-keeping. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Meyers & Conden for appellant.

Mr. James B. Murphy, for respondent:

This is not a case of a bailee for the sole benefit of the bailor, but a case of debtor and creditor, and the transaction inured to the benefit principally of the defendant.

American Minerals Producing Co. 108 Wash. 569, 185 Pac. 609.

Mount, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover money alleged to have been deposited with the defendant for safe-keeping. The defense was that the money was not deposited with the defendant; that if any money was deposited it was deposited with defendant's manager personally, and the defendant is not liable. The case was tried to the court without a jury, and resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $1,613.50. The defendant has appealed.

The facts may be briefly stated as follows: The defendant is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Oregon, with its principal place of business in Astoria, Oregon. At its home office it published a daily newspaper in the Finnish language, called the "Toveri." Sometime prior to March, 1917, it had established a branch of its main office in Seattle, where it did business. At this place of business it conducted a large storeroom, or hall, where it kept for sale a stock of books, newspapers, magazines, cigars, tobaccos, pipes, and articles usually kept in a cigar store. It also maintained a lunch counter, sold soft drinks, kept billiard and pool tables, card rooms, etc., for the trade, which depended upon the Finnish people. This store was commonly called the "Toveri," or Toveri Hall. At this place the appellant maintained a safe and two cash registers, which were used by employees who attended the store. All the corporate officers of the appellant were residents of Astoria, Oregon. The place of business in Seattle in this state was conducted by an official called a "branch manager," who was selected by the board of trustees to act as manager of the appellant's business at Seattle. On the 1st of March, 1917, one F. E. Kangas was appointed to the position as branch manager, and assumed the duties of handling the business in Seattle. He opened a checking account in a Seattle bank in the name of the appellant, but no one could check out funds from the bank except Mr. Kangas. The only way that funds could be drawn from the bank was by a check signed, "Western Workman's Publishing Society, by F. E. Kangas." As a part of his duties Mr. Kangas was required by the appellant to keep a cashbook, wherein was entered all of the receipts and expenditures made in the ordinary course of business of the Seattle branch. He purchased all the goods used in the store, paid all the expenses from the receipts of the store, and at the end of each month would send his cashbook to the Astoria offices to be audited. He also kept a ledger, in which money which was left with him for safe-keeping was entered. It was his custom to receive deposits for safe-keeping by Finnish customers of the place, and when money was left with him it would not be put in the cash register, but would be put in the safe, and from the safe taken to the bank for deposit. When money was deposited he would issue an ordinary receipt therefor in his own name. When depositors desired to withdraw money he would take money from the safe or from money which he had on hand, and pay the amount demanded, and would indorse the same upon the back of the receipt which he had given for the deposit. He also made small loans, without interest, to customers. This ledger book was not sent to the Astoria offices to be audited. In the year 1919 it was discovered that Mr. Kangas was short in his accounts with the store, and on the 1st of March of that year he was discharged. Shortly thereafter this action was begun by the respondent upon several claims assigned to him by persons who had deposited money with Mr. Kangas, who, it is claimed, was the agent of the appellant to receive money.

The principal and controlling question in the case, as we read the record, is whether Mr. Kangas was the agent of the appellant authorized to receive money on deposit, or whether the deposits which were left with him were left with him personally. The trial court, after hearing the evidence, concluded that the money deposited with Mr. Kangas during the time he was manager of the store was left with him as agent of the appellant, and not in his personal capacity. The appellant vigorously argues that Mr. Kangas was not authorized by the appellant to receive money on deposit for safe-keeping, and also that when money was left with Mr. Kangas for safe-keeping it was left with him personally for that purpose, and that he alone is responsible for the money. We shall notice these two contentions briefly.

Mr. Kangas testified as a witness for the respondent. He testified, in substance, that he was authorized to receive money; that the agents of the appellant company knew that he was receiving money on deposit, and that he did not take the money to be accounted for by him personally, but that he took the money as agent for the appellant; that the money so deposited with him was used in the business, and what was not used in the business was deposited in the bank and mixed with the funds belonging to the respondent. The persons who deposited the money and who had assigned their claims to the respondent also testified that when they deposited the money they intended to deposit it with the respondent company; that they had read advertisements in the newspaper published by appellant at Astoria, to the effect that the company received money on deposit for safe-keeping, and for that reason made the deposits with Mr. Kangas, who was the agent here of the appellant. The officers of the appellant company in Astoria denied that they received money at the Seattle branch office for safe-keeping or for deposit, and denied that they knew that Mr. Kangas was accepting money in their behalf for safe-keeping.

The general manager of the appellant admitted that an advertisement was carried in their paper, which was circulated in Seattle and sold at the Toveri Hall, which, translated into English, is as follows:

Seattle. Book Store, 116 Fourth Avenue South, Telephone Main 4367. Copies on hand of all kinds of literature (that means Socialist literature and other merchandise; that would not exactly be merchandise, but other things people need), as well as tickets to Finland and vice versa by best lines—to Finland and return on the best lines—transfers—acts as agent—on money loans and savings and so on. Every party comrade should do all of his business of such nature in their own store."

He also testified, as quoted in the abstract, as follows:

"The word 'deposit' as used there means deposits in our business in Astoria. The Seattle branch company take money to be sent to Astoria, but not for savings in Seattle. That is what the advertisement means, that he can take money and send it to Astoria, but he cannot take money and keep it in Seattle. We have that understanding with our members, that all deposits must go to Astoria, and we give certificates on Astoria in Seattle for deposits.

"Our company sometimes took money for safe-keeping, but whatever the Seattle manager took for the business he would send to Astoria. He had authority to take money to send to Astoria, but not to keep it here, and when he took the money he was authorized to give a temporary receipt for it and send the money to Astoria and get a permanent receipt. All receipts were made out in the name of the company. That is the custom of the company. Such money as was taken for safe-keeping was kept at the company's account in the bank at Astoria. Such money went into the general banking account of the company in Astoria."

So it is apparent from this testimony of the general manager that the appellant did receive money for safe-keeping, and we think it is also apparent that the customers of the store, who were Finlanders, understood from the advertisement that money could be deposited for safe-keeping in the Seattle branch, and that the manager of the Seattle branch was authorized to take it and receipt therefor. It is true that the ledger in which these accounts were kept was headed "Moneys Left with F. E. Kangas," and "Moneys Paid Out by F. E. Kangas;" and it is also true that receipts which were issued by Mr. Kangas for deposits left with him were signed by him personally, but, according to the testimony of the general manager at Astoria, when moneys were deposited in Seattle, temporary receipts were to be given therefor, and permanent receipts were not given until the money was received in Astoria. But it is apparent from this evidence that the appellant was accustomed to receive money from its customers, and that this was a part of the business. The fact that the ledger in which these deposits were entered by Mr. Kangas seemed to be a personal ledger, and the fact that receipts issued by him are personal receipts, are explained by the fact that moneys received in this way were first to be received upon temporary receipts. But this fact would not relieve the appellant from accounting for the money before a permanent receipt would issue. If it was the custom of the appellant to receive money on safe deposit, the patrons of the appellant had a right to assume that Mr.

We are satisfied from the evidence of the general manager himself that Mr. Kangas was authorized to receive money on behalf of the appellant, and, having so received it, the appellant is liable, even though Mr. Kangas may never have accounted to appellant for money so received.

We are also of the opinion that the evidence shows that Mr. Kangas was the agent of the company in receiving these deposits for safe-keeping. The trial court therefore properly found that Mr. Kangas was the agent of the appellant and was authorized to receive money in the way he did. And we are also satisfied that there is no sufficient proof to overcome the finding of the court to the effect that Mr. Kangas received these moneys for the company, and not for himself personally. The rule is elementary that if a bailee accepts money and places it in a private safe, mixed with his own money, or deposits it with his bankers upon his own private account, such treatment of the funds is a conversion, and renders the bailee absolutely liable, even though the money is stolen or embezzled without his fault. 6 C. J. 1116. Mr. Kangas testified the moneys he received upon these deposits were sometimes loaned to customers of the store for short periods of time, part of it was placed in the bank to the credit of the appellant and mixed, but all of it was mixed with other moneys that belonged to the appellant. The appellant, it appears, never examined the bank account which was kept in its name in a Seattle bank, never examined the ledger in which the accounts of depositors were kept, and never audited this ledger. But even under the testimony of the general manager of the appellant, who lived at Astoria, we think it was the duty of the appellant to examine all these accounts and books, and to keep track of them, and to know what money was deposited in the Seattle branch, and that if the money so deposited was lost, then under the rule above stated the appellant was clearly liable, even though the money was lost by embezzlement of its local branch manager.

Upon the points discussed, we are satisfied the trial court was right in its conclusion, and the judgment must be affirmed. It is unnecessary to notice other points in the appellant's brief.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of a bailee of money who commingles it with his own funds.

The question of care and negligence of a bailee of money is presented in many of the decisions in the note in 4 A. L. R. 1196, on the subject of the duty and liability of a gratuitous bailee or mandatary.

The rule laid down in the reported case (PELTOLA v. WESTERN WORKMAN'S PUB. SOC. ante, 374) that a bailee who accepts money for safe-keeping, and places it in a private safe mixed with his own money, or deposits it with his bankers upon his own private account, is guilty of conversion, and liable for the money even though it is stolen or embezzled without his fault appears to be sound, and is supported by the cases cited in the note, although the authorities on the question are not numerous. It seems well settled that trover will lie for the conversion by a bailee of money intrusted to him for safe-keeping, where he is under obligation to redeliver to the bailor on demand the specific money received. See, for example, Royce v. Oakes (1897) 20 R. I. 252, 38 Atl. 371. In other words, there is nothing in the nature of money which makes it an improper subject of an action of trover so long as it is capable of identification. But it should be observed that trover lies for the conversion of money only when there is an obligation resting on the defendant not to convert to his own use the specific coin or notes. See 26 R. C. L. p. 1106. The question whether there is a loan creating the relationship of debtor and creditor, or a bailment, is often a difficult one in a particular case. It is assumed, of course, for the purposes of this note, that the relationship is that of bailor and bailee; and on this assumption there seems to be little doubt that the mingling of the subject-matter of the bailment with the bailee's own fund so that identification is impossible, is such a violation of the bailee's obligation as will render him liable for conversion, or entitle the bailor, at his election, to maintain an action against him as a debtor; and the bailee could not defend the action on the ground that the money was lost or stolen without his fault. Several cases are cited where the person who received the money appears to have been an agent or trustee rather than a bailee, strictly speaking. The note, however, does not cover that class of cases, the authorities of that kind which are cited being those which have distinguished between that class and bailment cases, or have regarded the case as in effect one of bailment, or which have a value for illustrative purposes.

In discussing the question whether a state manager of an insurance company could maintain an action of trover to recover from an agent insurance premiums collected by the latter, the court in Hazelton v. Locke (1908) 104 Me. 164, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 35, 71 Atl. 661, 15 Ann. Cas. 1009, said: In determining, from the circumstances and relation of the parties, whether trover or assumpsit is the proper remedy, it is necessary to consider the distinctive quality of money as differing from other kinds of property, and the character and conduct of the defendant in receiving and retaining the money in question. From its nature the title thereto passes by delivery, and its identity is lost by being changed into other money or its equivalent in the methods ordinarily used in business for its safe-keeping and transmission. An agent, unless restricted by the terms of his contract, would violate no duty assumed by him by adopting these methods in dealing with the money of his principal. Mere failure to deliver such property in specie on demand would not be a technical conversion, nor would the refusal to pay over its equivalent be conclusive evidence of conversion in the sense of the law of trover, but might be the ground for an action of assumpsit."

The rule was laid down in Anderson v. Foresman (1834) Wright (Ohio) 598, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 813, that if a gratuitous bailee uses the money intrusted to him and substitutes other money therefor, which is stolen, the money which he received becomes a debt for which he is liable.

And it has been held that a gratuitous bailee or agent who uses for his own purpose money intrusted to him is liable for it at all events, though he subsequently undertakes to replace it out of funds of his own, which was stolen from his pocket. Ulmer v. Ulmer (1820) 11 S. C. L. (2 Mott & M'C. 489. In this case, the defendant, who was about to make a trip to Charleston, received money from the plaintiff to purchase articles for her, and used the money, with other money of his own, to redeem cotton which had been levied upon, but sold the cotton on reaching the city, and started with the proceeds to purchase the articles, when the money was stolen from him. It was held that, having used it for his own purpose, he became a debtor and was liable notwithstanding the theft.

The secretary of a corporation whose duty it is to receive money for the corporation and turn it over to its treasurer, who places the money so received in his own private safe in the office, and sets up as a defense to an action for failure to deliver the money that the safe and its contents were robbed, must show, in order to avoid liability, that the funds of the company were kept separate and distinct from his own, and that the company's money was actually in the safe at the time of the robbery; if he treats money received as his own and his liability as that of a debtor for the amount received, this constitutes a conversion, and the loss will be his own; and unpaid checks of others, or his own unpaid checks substituted for money used, of which payment could be and was stopped, could not be regarded as lost. Fidelity Invest. Co. v. Carico (1892) 1 Colo. App. 292, 28 Pac. 1131. To the same effect is a later appeal in (1894) 5 Colo. App. 56, 37 Pac. 29, in which the court said that the defendant's evidence showed a mingling and confusion of the money in question with his own, which amounted to a conversion; and that, at the time of the alleged robbery, he was not a bailee, but the debtor of the company for the amount received by him.

One who receives money for safe-keeping may be held liable for a conversion thereof, if, in violation of his trust, without the bailor's consent, he deposits the money to his own account in a bank which fails, even though he is a gratuitous bailee and is without negligence; the material question is whether the deposit is made with the bailor's consent, either expressly given or fairly to be implied, since if such consent is given the gratuitous bailee is liable only for gross negligence. Cicalla v. Rossi (1872) 10 Heisk. (Tenn.) 67. In this case there was evidence that the bailee did not have any other funds in the bank at the time of the deposit, so that the question is not strictly one in commingling of money, but a violation of the trust reposed in the bailee.

And a cattle owner who accepted as a part of his herd which he was taking to market an animal of another for sale, and deposited the entire sum received from the sale of the herd, including that received from the sale of the animal not his own, to his credit in a bank which failed, was held liable to the owner of the animal, as a debtor, in Coleman v. Lipscomb (1885) 18 Mo. App. 443, the contention being overruled that the transaction constituted a mere gratuitous bailment. In this case it will be observed that as regards the money received from the sale the one receiving it was, as is pointed out, a trustee rather than a bailee, so that the decision should be regarded as representative of that class of cases wherein a trustee deposits trust funds in a bank to his own account, instead of the separate account of the trust estate.

So, as illustrating cases of trustees or agents who mingled trust money with their own, see also Young v. Noble (1859) 2 Disney (Ohio) 485, where an agent for the collection of a bill of exchange deposited in a bank, to his own account, the proceeds collected, and was held liable on the failure of the bank.

See also Robinson v. Ward (1825) 2 Car. & P. (Eng.) 59, Ryan & M. 274, among possibly other cases of a similar nature, where an attorney who had received a sum of money from the sale of his client's estate deposited it to his own credit in a bank which failed, and it was held that the client could recover the sum from him in an action of assumpsit, even though the attorney acted bona fide and had on deposit at the time of the failure a large sum of his own money.

And where by, or at least with, the consent of the president of an insolvent corporation which was engaged in loaning money, the proceeds of a loan, which had been made for a client and repaid, was placed in the corporation's safe, commingled with its own funds and deposited to its bank account, the client being kept in ignorance that the loan had been paid, it was held that such officer was guilty of a conversion. Milbrath v. State (1909) 138 (Wis.) 354, 131 Am. St. Rep. 1012, 120 N. W. 252.

Another case of gratuitous agent or trustee who was held liable for money which he collected for another, and placed to his own credit in a bank which failed, is Massey v. Banner (1819) 4 Madd. Ch. 413, 56 Eng. Reprint, 757, 20 Revised Rep. 317.

Apparently opposed to the general rule requiring the contemplation of the return of specific property in order to constitute a bailment is Knapp v. Knapp (1906) 118 Mo. App. 685, 96 S. W. 295, where the view was taken that although it was not the intention of the party that the identical money should be returned to the owner, the one receiving it may be a bailee if it was the intention of the parties to create a bailment, and that the relationship of bailor and bailee continued, even though the bailee deposited the money to his own account in a bank. In this case the defendant received from her mother $2,000, which was part of the proceeds of a draft sent to the mother by the defendant's brother. The defendant deposited the money to her individual credit as part of her own bank account. It was held that the defendant was liable as bailee to the administratrix of her brother for the amount so received. The court applied the doctrine of the cases involving the commingling of grain by a warehouseman. It was said: "In respect to the proposition that to constitute a bailment, the parties must have intended that there should be a return or delivery of the identical thing, it is well settled in law, and the nature of some transactions is such that the rule can only be sufficiently answered by returning other property of like value and kind. As said by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in Repplier v. Jacobs (1892) 149 Pa. 167, 24 Atl. 194, and as said by Judge Bland, in the opinion of the court in this case: 'For all ordinary purposes in law, as in the business of life, the same sum of money is the same money, whether it is represented by the identical coin or not.' This is certainly reasonable and we do not understand that it necessarily infringes upon the doctrine that a deposit in bank constitutes the bank the owner of the money; or, in other words, ipso facto, transfers the title of the money to the bank and creates the relation of debtor with respect to such bank in favor of the depositor, who is thereby constituted a creditor; for, in the very nature of things, when one in such circumstances has clearly indicated that no intention is present to create the relation of creditor and debtor, but, on the contrary, it is manifest that the parties intended to create the relation of bailor and bailee, we are unable to see why the court should not enforce such intention even though the bailee has employed in business, or transferred, the actual amount deposited to another, and was thereby rendered unable to make restitution of the identical subject of bailment. The question with which the court has to deal is the intention of the parties in creating the relation, rather than the manual possession of the subject of bailment; and we know no reason why, when it is apparent that a bailment was intended by the parties, that the bailor shall be precluded of his rights herein because, forsooth, the identical thing is incapable of being returned to the owner because of no fault on his part. We are persuaded that the authorities holding that the same sum of money in bailment, for the purpose of the law of bailment, is the same money when found to be in possession of the bailee under an arrangement whereby the parties intended such bailment, are sound."

The last case apparently conflicts with such statements of the rule as that for instance, in Larson v. Dawson (1902) 24 R. L. 317, 96 Am. St.

Rep. 716, 53 Atl. 93, that "the question whether money can be the subject-matter of an action of trover generally depends upon whether there is an obligation on the part of the defendant to deliver specific money to the plaintiff."

That the commingling by a bailee of the money received, with his own, is a conversion, may perhaps be inferred from such decisions as that in Price v. Brown (1886) 41 Hun, 645, 5 N. Y. S. R. 7, to the effect that where money is given to another for safe-keeping the bailor cannot recover interest unless the bailee has mingled the bailor's money with his own.

The fact that one who had received money commingled it with that received from other sources was referred to in Brewster v. Bates (1894) 81 Hun, 294, 30 N. Y. Supp. 780, as a circumstance aiding the construction of the transaction as a loan, where a written instrument was given as follows: "Received of Gilbert Brewster $2,541.36, to operate with in buying and selling crude oil for him, and we are to pay said Brewster the principal and proceeds over and above the cost and trouble of buying and selling, use of tanks, etc."

So, in Rankin v. Craft (1870) 1 Heisk. (Tenn.) 711, the fact that the complainant did not allege that the money which he had received from the defendant was kept separate from his own funds was regarded as tending to negative his contention that the case was one of special deposit, instead of, as the defendant contended, a loan.

And it was held that a general deposit or loan was created, and not a bailment requiring the return of specific money, and that therefore the one receiving the money was liable for its loss even without his negligence, where a servant gave his employer $40 to keep for him, and the employer placed the same, with other money of his own, in his wallet, from which it was stolen after the employer had taken out a small amount for use and added other money of his own. Shoemaker v. Hinze (1881) 53 Wis. 116, 10 N. W. 86. The court said: "We think the evidence shows conclusively that the parties did not contemplate or understand that the same identical money received by the defendant was to be kept for and returned to the plaintiff on demand, but only that a like sum of money should be repaid by the defendant. The transaction is not, therefore a bailment or special deposit, but rather what, in commercial language is termed a general deposit, which is not a bailment, but is in the nature of a loan. . . . So, we think the liability of the defendant in this case is precisely the same as the liability of a bank for a general deposit made with it; that is, he is not liable in tort for the money, but is liable in assumpsit for a sum equal to the sum deposited. His liability is absolute, and it is immaterial that the money was lost without his fault."

It will be observed that in the case last above cited the defendant was held liable, not because of his wrongful commingling of the money with his own, but on the ground that he was not a bailee, but a debtor. The commingling of the money seems to be regarded merely as evidence tending to show the intention of the parties on the question whether the identical money should be returned. And of course, apart from the question of commingling of money, if it can be shown that there was a general deposit or loan, the one receiving the money would be liable irrespective of negligence. As before suggested the note does not cover the question of distinction between a bailment and a loan, arising independently of that of commingling of money.

The decisions in several cases in which the bailor was denied recovery do not seem to be in conflict with these supporting the rule laid down in the reported case (PELTOLA v. WESTERN WORKMAN'S PUE. SOC. ante, 374), but appear distinguishable on the ground that there was in fact no commingling of funds so as to destroy the identity of the money received.

Harris (1901) 1 Neb. (Unof.) 535, 95 N. W. 779, that a bailee of money had son commingled it with his own money that he was liable therefor to the bailor even though it was stolen. But the evidence was held not to sustain the contention that the money had been commingled, although the bailee, a merchant who had received from a firm of grain buyers currency to be used in cashing checks issued by them, changed portions of the currency into silver whenever checks called for money of smaller denominations than those furnished, and put the silver with his own funds (the book account showing at all times how much belonged to the grain buyers). The theft in this case was only of currency which had been left in its original condition and it was only necessary to hold that as to such currency, kept separate and intact, the defendant's obligation remained that of bailee.

And where a gratuitous bailee or agent received money collected by him for rent, and placed it in his money drawer in his stateroom, where it was destroyed by fire which destroyed the building, it was held that the bailor could not recover; but the court does not discuss the question of the effect of commingling of money, which may not have occurred in this case, although it is said that evidence was properly admitted that the money collected "was placed in the money drawer, among the money and accounts of the defendant." Bronnenburg v. Charman (1881) 80 Ind. 475.

Another case in which a gratuitous bailee of money was held not liable where it was lost by theft, there being apparently no commingling of it with his own funds, although it was placed in a safe in which he kept his own valuables, is Johnson v. Reynolds (1865) 8 Kan. 257.

And where money intrusted to an agent for a specific purpose was stolen without his fault, it was held that it was not necessarily a conversion thereof, so as to render the agent liable, that the money was kept in the same safe drawer with his own money, it appearing that the fund was kept intact. Furber v. Barnes (1884) 32 Minn. 105, 19 N. W. 728.

So, it was held in Bissell v. Harris Neb. supra, that the fact that a bailee of money put a bag containing the money in a safe with some of his own money as a precaution, was not a conversion, since it did not destroy the identity of the deposit.

Also in Caldwell v. Hall (1882) 60 Miss. 330, 45 Am. Rep. 410, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 803, it was held that a depository of money was not liable where it was stolen without his fault, although he had permission to use it in his business, it appearing that he had not exercised this right, except that his bookkeeper had sometimes used small portions of the deposit in making change, dropping into the box in which it was kept a slip showing the amount of money withdrawn, which he always replaced within a few days.

In an action against the executrix of a bailee for special deposits, the court in Stevens v. Stevens (1908) 132 Mo. App. 624, 112 S. W. 35, said that as the money could not be identified, the plaintiff (the bailor) adopted the only remedy available to him, which was in the nature of an action for conversion. It does not appear, however, in this case that there was a commingling of the money, at least by the bailee, although he had made change out of the special deposit, which was kept in an envelop; but the court regarded the conversion, if any, as being by the executrix.

In Hunnicutt v. Higginbotham (1903) 138 Ala. 472, 100 Am. St. Rep. 45, 35 So. 469, where an executor was held liable in an action of trover for damages for the conversion of money delivered in a package by the plaintiff to the intestate, his wife, to keep for him, the commingling of his money, if any, was by the executor, as the decision appears to be on the ground that the intestate kept the money separate, and that for this reason the case was within the rule that trover will lie for the conversion of money where there is an obligation on the part of the defendant to return specific coin intrusted to him. If the decedent had commingled the money, this would apparently have precluded the plaintiff from maintaining trover on the theory that such commingling constituted an act of ownership by the decedent, and the plaintiff had elected to take under the will.

The right of the bailor to follow and recover funds which the bailee has converted by depositing in a bank to his own credit money which he has received for safe-keeping, on the theory of following trust funds, is beyond the scope of the note. As sustaining this right, see, for example, Beamish v. Lawlor (1915) 43 N. B. 426, 23 D. L. R. 141. R. E. H.

CARRIE MUNCIE et al., Appts.

Kansas Supreme Court—January 7, 1922.

(— Kan. —, 203 Pac. 1102.)

Will — construction — power of disposition.

1. By his last will, probated in 1896, the testator devised all his property to his wife "to have and to hold the same during her natural life, and at her death to dispose of all the remainder of the property among the children and their heirs as she may deem best." In 1918 the widow executed deeds conveying some of the real estate to certain of the children in consideration of "$1 and love and affection," and reserving to herself the use of the property during her life. In an action to set aside the conveyances, held, that the power to dispose of the estate is not limited to a will, either by implication or express terms, and therefore may be executed either by will or by deed, and that in this case the deeds, so far as they may operate simply in execution of the power, take effect only from the death of the widow, the words "and at her death" merely denoting the period when the disposition should take effect.

Powers — execution by will.

2. To the extent that a deed would be inoperative except as an execution of a power of appointment, it will execute the power, though no reference is made thereto.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Doniphan County (Stuart, J.) in favor of plaintiffs and from an order denying a motion for new trial, in an action brought to set aside certain deeds alleged to have been procured by false and fraudulent representations by defendants. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Bennett R. Wheeler, S. M. Brewster, and John L. Hunt, for appellants:

Under the terms of the will of Frederick Sinke, Sr., the power of appointment given to his widow was properly exercised by deed.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Frederick Sinke, a resident of Doniphan county, died in January, 1896, leaving surviving him Frederica Sinke, widow, and nine children, seven of whom are the plaintiffs; two, with the widow, are defendants. Frederick Sinke disposed of all of his property by a last will, which contained the following provision: "I give, devise, and bequeath all of my property, both real and personal and mixed of whatever kind and nature and wherever the same may be situated, to my beloved wife, Frederica Sinke, to have and to hold the same during her natural life, and at her death to dispose of all the remainder of the property among the children and their heirs, as she may deem best. And I hereby authorize her to have complete control of all of said property, with authority to sell and dispose of all or any part thereof and use and invest the proceeds of any such sale as she may need it or any and all of said property with the rents and profits thereof."

Since the probate of the will, the widow has been in possession of all the property, collecting the income, has purchased additional real estate, and has accumulated several thousand dollars, which she has invested in notes and mortgages. In the latter part of 1918 she executed deeds to her daughter Carrie, one of the defendants, conveying certain lots in the town of Wathena and a quarter section of land, the stated consideration in each deed being $1 and love and affection. She reserved to herself the use and profits of the property during her life. About the same time she conveyed to Frederick Sinke, Jr., a quarter section of land in Doniphan county for the same consideration, and with the same reservation of the use and control during her life.

This action was brought by the seven children to set aside the conveyances. The petition alleged that Mrs. Sinke, who is now past eighty-four years of age, has become enfeebled and weakened in her mind, and is under the influence of certain of the defendants, and that the deeds were procured by false and fraudulent representations of the grantees and by means of their control over her mind and will; that by similar false and fraudulent representations the defendants have procured possession of notes, money, and securities belonging to the estate.

The plaintiffs asked that the conveyances be canceled, that defendants be required to account for money and securities procured by them from their mother, that Frederica Sinke be adjudged incompetent to longer manage and control the estate, and that a receiver and trustee be appointed to take charge of all the property, and control the same under orders of the court, using so much of the income as was necessary for the support and maintenance of the widow, and to hold the remainder, "having regard to the wishes and directions contained in the will."

Issues being joined, the court tried the case, and found all the facts against plaintiffs, and held that when the deeds were executed Frederica Sinke was of sound mind and mentally capable, and that none of the conveyances were procured by undue influence; that no reason appeared why she should be deprived of the control of the estate. The court found that, in executing the deeds, she was attempting to exercise the power of appointment conferred upon her by the will; but the court held, as a conclusion of law, that Frederica Sinke could not exercise the power of appointment by deed, but could only exercise it by making and publishing a will and testament. As a further conclusion of law it was held that the deeds should be set aside because of lack of power in the grantor to execute them, and judgment was rendered accordingly. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the defendants appeal.

The point upon which the judgment turned, although not suggested by plaintiffs in their petition, is the only one for determination here.

The question is whether the power of appointment given to Frederica Sinke by the last will of her husband can be exercised by will only, and not by deed. The will gives all the property to her "to have and to hold the same during her natural life, and at her death to dispose of all the remainder of the property among the children and their heirs, as she may deem best." The same paragraph declares: "And I hereby authorize her to have complete control of all of said property, with authority to sell and dispose of all or any part thereof and use and invest the proceeds of any such sales as she may need it, or any and all of said property with the rents and profits thereof."

The question, very ably briefed by both parties, is by no means a novel one. The courts have frequently been called upon to construe substantially the same provision where the testator had devised property with a power of disposition to be exercised "at the death" of the devisee, as the devisee may deem best. A leading case cited in the brief is Tomlinson v. Dighton, 1 P. Wms. 149, 24 Eng. Reprint, 335, where the devise was to the testator's wife "for life and then to be at her disposal," provided it be to any of testator's children. It was held that she took an estate for life, with power to dispose of the fee. The widow remarried, and afterwards conveyed the property to a trustee and his heirs for her use for life. The conveyance was held a good execution of the power.

In Sugden on Powers, it is said: "A power to dispose of the estate to such persons and uses as the party should think fit would enable him to appoint the fee by will or act inter vivos." Page 319.

In an early case, the question was considered by the supreme court of Illinois in Fairman v. Beal, 14 Ill. 244. In the opinion it was said: "Where a power is conferred to dispose of an estate, without defining the mode in which the power must be executed, it may be exercised either by deed or will. But if it is required to be executed by deed, it cannot be done by will; and if a will is required, a deed will not suffice. Although courts cannot dispense with the form prescribed, for the execution of a power, yet they generally incline to put a liberal construction on the words of the power. Sugden, Powers, chap. 6, §§ 2, 3. In this case, a general power was given to the tenant for life, to dispose of the reversion. The mode in which it was to be exercised was not prescribed, unless it is to be implied, from the phrase 'at her death,' that a will was intended. These words do not restrict the execution of the power to a testamentary disposition. Sugden, in his valuable treatise on Powers, in chapter 6, § 3, says: 'But the mere circumstance of the estate being limited to A for life, and "after his death," or "then," to be at his disposal, will not, by implication, restrain the execution of the power to a will;' and the authorities referred to by him fully sustain his position. In Tomlinson v. Dighton, 1 P. Wms. 149, 24 Eng. Reprint, 335, land was devised to the wife for life, 'and then to be at her disposal.' The wife conveyed the inheritance by deed, and the court held it to be an effectual execution of the power. In a case reported in 3 Leonard, 71, the devise was of lands to the wife for life, 'and after her decease she to give the same to whom she will.' She made a grant of the reversion, and it was held to be a good execution of the power. Our opinion is that Mrs. Belch took a life estate under the will of her husband, with power to dispose of the inheritance; and that her deed to Waddle was a valid execution of the power. Under the will and deed, Waddle succeeded to all the title which the testator had at the time of his decease." 14 Ill. 246, 247.

The case was followed by Christy v. Pulliam, 17 Ill. 59, where "a husband made certain bequests to his wife, among others, certain lands, "to dispose of at her death to any person she may think best to live with her, and take care of her." It was said: "The power conferred on the wife by the will may be executed by deed or will, or other simple writing, if sufficient to convey the subject-matter of it; the intention of the devisor, by the power conferred on the wife, is too plain to admit of restriction." Syl.

In Burbank v. Sweeney, 161 Mass. 490, 37 N. E. 669, the testator left property to his wife "to dispose of as she may deem expedient, but in the event that she should make no disposition of the same during her lifetime, I give the remainder of my estate not disposed of above to my heirs at law." The court held that the wife was given a power of disposal by will as well as by deed during her life. To the same effect see the following authorities: 4 Kent, Com. 330; 2 Hilliard, Real Prop. 559, § 12; 1 Sugden, Powers, chap. 6, § 3, cls. 9, 13; Tiffany, Real Prop. 2d ed. § 323.

In 21 R. C. L. 792, it is said: "Where a general power to dispose of property is given, without specifying the manner of execution, the power may be executed either by deed or will."

In Loosing v. Loosing, 85 Neb. 66. 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 920, 122 N. W. 707, the provision was "that my beloved wife . . . shall have the use and disposition of all my personal property, also the income as long as she lives." The will also contained this provision: "I want my wife to dispose or distribute this property which I have not devised, as she sees fit, or deems best in her judgment."

Also a provision as follows: "The remaining children which I have not mentioned in this will, I will leave it to my wife, to give them as she sees fit out of the property I left for her to dispose of."

It was said in the opinion: "The testator did not specifically designate in his will the methods to be pursued by his widow in executing the power vested in her by him, and she therefore is at liberty to indulge her judgment or fancy by executing a deed or a will." 85 Neb. 72.

It is, in our opinion, thoroughly well established by the cases and text-writers that this rule obtains notwithstanding the appointment of the powers contains the words "at his" or "at her death," or, when the testator, after referring to the devisee's lifetime, employs the words, "and then" or "then." In most of the cases we have examined, the opinion refers to the rule stated by Sugden on Powers, supra, that "the mere circumstance of the estate being limited to A for life, and 'after his death,' or 'then,' to be at his disposal, will not, by implication, restrain the execution of the power to a will."

In Benesch v. Clark, 49 Md. 497, the provision read, "To be disposed with as my said wife sees fit, at her decease." She conveyed by deed of assignment, and the contention was that the power could not be exercised except by a last will and testament, stress being laid upon the use of the words "at her decease" as the time when the property was to be disposed of by the life tenant. There the court held that the power could be exercised either by deed or will, quoting Sugden on Powers, supra. In the opinion the court said further: "Such deed, so far as it may operate simply in execution of the power, could be operative only from the death of Mrs. Bramble, and in the event that she remained and died the widow of the testator; and therefore the words 'at her decease' only denote the period when the disposition should take effect." 49 Md. 506.

The plaintiffs cite the following extract from Perry on Trusts, 3d ed. § 254: "The general rule is that the power given must be strictly executed as given, or it will remain as a trust for the person or class in whose favor it is given; thus, if the donee is to dispose of the property to such person of a particular class as she shall select in a last will and testament, and the disposition is made by a deed, the power is not executed, and it will be construed into a trust for the whole class, or will go over, if there is a gift over in default of an appointment or execution of the power."

This is a mere statement of the general rule that the power must be strictly executed as given. In the present case, as we have seen, the power is not limited to a will either by implication or express terms; and where there is no limitation the power may be executed either by will or by deed.

The plaintiffs place some reliance upon the decision in Pearson v. Orcutt, 106 Kan. 610, 189 Pac. 160. In the brief it is said that in that case "there was no power of appointment, . . . but the donee exercised one and gave the property away by deed," and that in the present case "there is a power of appointment by will, but the donee gave the property away by deed. In both cases the donees, by these gifts, deprived themselves of the property, contrary to the intention of the testator. In each will the estate was intended for the benefit of the widow." We cannot agree with the contention that the will now under consideration contains a power of appointment by will only. Nor do we think that anything can be found in the four corners of the will calling for such construction. Nothing decided in Pearson v. Orcutt, supra, controls the present case.

It is argued, however, that the intention of the donor would be defeated by any other instrument than a will; it is insisted that it could not have been the intention of the testator to authorize the widow to execute the power by an irrevocable and absolute deed; that he must have intended that his wife should not execute the power except by will, in order that she might have the opportunity of changing her mind at any time before her death. We think the provisions of the will show that the testator imposed implicit confidence in the discretion and judgment of his wife to dispose of the property as she might see fit, so long as she retained the use of the property until her death.

There is a suggestion that the deeds cannot be construed to be an attempt to exercise the power of appointment, because no reference is made in them to the will of Frederick Sinke. The weight of authority seems to be that there is no necessity for a reference to the power in the instrument by which it is executed. 4 Kent, Com. 334. In 21 R. C. L. 798, it is said: "In any event it is clear that where a deed would be inoperative except as an execution of the power, it will execute the power though no reference is made thereto."

Powers—execution by will.

See Warner v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 109 U. S. 357, 27 L. ed. 962, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 221; also 31 Cyc. 1131.

It is clear that the court erred in holding that the power of appointment conferred upon the widow by the will of Frederick Sinke could not be exercised by deed; and since the court has found all the issues of fact against the plaintiffs, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the defendants.

All the Justices concur.

ANNOTATION.

Will as exclusive means of exercising power conferred by will to dispose of property.

This annotation is essentially narrow in its scope, and includes only such cases as discuss the precise question whether a general power of disposition conferred by a will, which does not designate the mode or manner of its execution, must be exercised by will or may be exercised by other means. Accordingly, cases are excluded which hold merely that, where the language used in a will creating a power is broad enough to indicate that the donee should have the absolute power of disposal, including a disposition by will, the donee may execute the power by will. And, of course, cases which hold that where the execution of a power is restricted by the terms of the will to a particular instrument, such as either a deed or a will, such restriction must be observed, and the power cannot be validly executed in any other way, do not fall within the scope of the annotation.

A power to dispose of property given by will, without specifying the manner or mode of execution, may be exercised by deed as well as by will, and the latter mode is not exclusive, although the power is to be exercised "at the death" or "decease" of the donee thereof.

Thus, in an early case, Fairman v. Beal (Ill.) supra, the court said: "Where a power is conferred to dispose of an estate, without defining the mode in which the power must be executed, it may be exercised either by deed or will. . . . In this case, a general power was given to the tenant for life to dispose of the reversion. The mode in which it was to be exercised was not prescribed, unless it is to be implied from the phrase 'at her death' that a will was intended. These words do not restrict the execution of the power to a testamentary disposition."

So, in Christy v. Pulliam (Ill.) supra, wherein it appeared that a testator had devised certain lands to his wife "to dispose of at her death to any person she may think best to live with her, and take care of her," the court held that the power might be executed by deed as well as by will, saying: "When the mode of executing the power is not defined, it may be executed by deed or will, or other simple writing, if sufficient to convey the subject-matter of it."

It appeared in Benesch v. Clark (1878) 49 Md. 497, that a testator devised to his wife real estate "to be disposed with as my wife sees fit, at her decease." She conveyed by deed of assignment, and the contention was that the power could not be exercised except by will, stress being laid on the use of the words "at her decease" as the time when the property was to be disposed of. The court held that the power could be exercised by deed as well as by will, saying: "Authorities are ample for holding that it was competent to Mrs. Bramble to execute the power by deed of assignment, and that she was not restricted to last will, as contended by the appellees. Such deed, so far as it may operate simply in execution of the power, could be operative only from the death of Mrs. Bramble, and in the event that she remained and died the widow of the testator; and therefore the words 'at her decease' only denote the period when the disposition should take effect."

In Tillett v. Nixon (N. C.) supra, the court construed a will which, after creating a life estate in land, provided that the beneficiary should "have the power to devise, or bestow, after her death, unto or upon whomsoever she will, all my estate not hereinbefore devised." The court held that the power of disposition so conferred might be exercised by deed as well as by will, saying: "No reason appears why the testator, having devised to his daughter a life estate, and having then the intention to give her the power of disposition for her own benefit exclusively, should have limited the exercise of this power to an appointment by will, which could not benefit the donee, thus nullifying his very purpose in creating the power. The contention of the defendants that the power can only be exercised through the form of a will by Mrs. Alice A. Tillett is further negatived, as plaintiffs contend, by the language of the power itself."

Similarly, it has been held that under a will creating a life estate in several devisees of land "to be disposed of by them at their deaths as they may think proper," the disposing clause did not limit the exercise of the power to a disposition by will, but it might be exercised as well by the execution and delivery of a deed. Goodloe v. Woods (1913) 115 Va. 540, 80 S. E. 108, wherein the court said: "It is not controverted that Samuel F. Woods took a life estate in the land assigned to him under the will of James Woods, deceased, with a power of appointment as to the remainder, but the appellants contend that whilst the deed to Paul, trustee, made in pursuance of the marriage contract, conveyed the life estate, it was unauthorized as to the remainder, because the power of appointment could only be exercised by will. The will of James Woods prescribes no method by which the power is to be exercised, nor is there anything to indicate that the testator intended that any particular method should be adopted, unless the language, 'to be disposed of by them at their deaths as they may think proper,' can be construed as an intimation that the power is to be exercised by will. In our opinion that expression is not sufficient to limit the exercise of the power to a will."

Likewise, where a testator devised real property to his wife "to have and to hold the same forever," with a remainder over to certain benevolent societies in the event that she, "at her decease, should make no disposal of the property," it was held that the full power of disposition thereby created might be exercised by deed as well as by will. Kimball v. Sullivan (1873) 113 Mass. 345, wherein the court said: "The proviso that if his wife, 'at her decease, should make no disposal of the property herein willed and bequeathed to her, and leave no child or children to heir the estate,' then the estate shall go to the three benevolent societies named, necessarily implies that she is to have the power of disposing of it by will. . . . And we are of opinion that the reasonable inference from the proviso, construed in connection with the prior devise giving her a fee, is that the testator intended to give her a full power of disposal by will or deed, and, . . . as she had an absolute power of disposal, her deed conveyed a fee."

A fortiori, where a will gives a power of disposition, and does not refer to the death of the donee as the time when it shall be exercised, it may be exercised by either deed or will. Cannon v. Laing (1922) — Ga. —, 111 S. E. 565; Hale v. Marsh (1868) 100 Mass. 468; Loosing v. Loosing (1909) 85 Neb. 66, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 920, 122 N. W. 709; Forsythe v. Forsythe (1885) 108 Pa. 129.

In Loosing v. Loosing (1909) 85 Neb. 66, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 920, 122 N. W. 709, supra, under the will of a testator providing that "my beloved wife . . . shall have the use and disposition of all my personal property, also the income as long as she lives off of the . . . land," a disposition by deed was held to be authorized by the following disposing clauses: "I want my wife to dispose or distribute this property which I have not devised, as she sees fit, or deems best in her judgment," and, "The remaining children which I have not mentioned in this will, I will leave it to my wife, to give them as she sees fit out of the property I left her to dispose of."

Under a will giving the testator's wife, who was also sole executrix, a life estate in the residue of the property, and providing that she might dispose of any piece of property, or any part of the estate that she thought to the best interest of the estate, it was held in Cannon v. Laing (Ga.) supra, that a lease for a definite term of five years, for a valuable consideration which on its face was a fair rental value, was a good execution of the power, and not terminable on the death of the life tenant.

So, in Forsythe v. Forsythe (Pa.) supra, it was held with regard to the general power of a devisee to dispose of property "as she may think best," without any reference to the time of disposition, that it was unlimited as to the mode, and therefore included any kind of disposition.

In Hale v. Marsh (Mass.) supra, it appears that a will devised and bequeathed to the testator's wife all his property, both real and personal, "with full and absolute power and authority to sell and dispose of the whole or any part or portion of the same, whether real or personal, at her own pleasure." The court held that the gift was of a life estate, with a full power of disposition, both by deed and by will, and the widow might convey in fee simple a portion of the real estate during her lifetime.

Also, where the power provides for disposition "during the lifetime" of the donee, it has been held that either a deed or a will is a valid execution. Burbank v. Sweeney (1894) 161 Mass. 490, 37 N. E. 669; Wead v. Gray (1883) 78 Mo. 59.

Thus, in Burbank v. Sweeney (Mass.) supra, wherein it appeared that the testator gave all his estate to his wife "to dispose of as she may deem expedient, but in the event that she should make no disposition of the same during her lifetime, I give the remainder of my estate not disposed of above to my heirs at law," the court held that the wife was given a power of disposition by either will or deed executed during her lifetime, saying: "The natural signification of the words 'during her lifetime,' as they are . . . used by this testator, is . . . to make it sure that she [the devisee] should have all her life in which to execute the power, by will or otherwise, as she might deem expedient."

So, in Wead v. Gray (Mo.) supra, the devisee of a life estate was given the following power of disposition: "I give and bequeath to my only child, Rachel, . . . all my property, real, personal, and mixed, . . . wishing my said daughter to have, use and dispose of the same absolutely in any way that may seem to her best, . . . it being the intention and meaning of this, my last will and testament, that my said daughter Rachel . . . have and dispose of all my property in her own right as absolute owner . . . and that the same, and its proceeds and increase, if not disposed of and expended by her in her lifetime, shall descend at her death to her children." The court held that "the absolute power of disposition given by the will . . . included the power to dispose of the property as well by will as by deeds to real estate or bills of sale of personal property."

However, it has been held in two jurisdictions that where property is given by will, with power of disposition at the beneficiary's death, the power cannot be exercised by deed, but only by will. Porter v. Thomas (1857) 23 Ga. 467; Weir v. Smith (1884) 62 Tex. 1. In the case last cited, the court said: "The fifth clause of the will gave to the wife the power, at the time of her death, to make a final disposition of such parts of the original estate, and of the increase and profits arising therefrom, as might then be undisposed of, as she, in her discretion, might think proper and right. This gave to the wife a very broad power, a power subject alone to her own discretion, through which she might pretermitt some of the children. This power, as it could only be exercised 'at the time of her death,' it would seem, in the nature of things, could only be executed by her will."

And a power to "leave" property has been construed as requiring execution by will. Doe ex dem. Thorley v. Thorley (1809) 10 East, 438, 103 Eng. Reprint, 842; Moore v. Ffolliot (1887) Ir. L. R. 19 Eq. 499. L. F. C.

RE ESTATE OF CECELIA DONOHUE.

RICHARD DONOHUE et al., Appts.

APPEALS by claimant and others from orders of the Orphans' Court for Westmoreland County (Beacom, President J.) allowing a note presented by claimant against the estate of his deceased mother, and rejecting his other claim, in a proceeding for the settlement of decedent's estate. Appeals dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. James L. Kennedy for appellant Richard Donohue.

Mr. Robert W. Smith for appellants Ewing et al.

Walling, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Cecelia Donohue died testate in 1919, leaving eight children, whose father had died in 1899. Reverend Richard Donohue, one of the children, here called "the claimant," received from his father's estate an annual income of about $1,500, in the form of checks for dividends, interest, etc. He was engaged in educational work as college president, without need of the income, and delivered the checks therefor properly indorsed to his mother, who mingled the same with her other funds, all of which she used as her own and for her own purposes. The claimant's understanding of the transaction is shown by a letter written by him July 7, 1920, to the attorney of other legatees, wherein he states, inter alia: "Permit me to say here that any and all moneys I have ever received since father's death in 1899, I turned over to mother . . . as a free gift, not expecting any return. However, in a letter under date of January 16, 1909, mother wrote to me, 'Lately I have been thinking of the disposal of my belongings, of course you are to receive back, with interest, all you have given me.' I still have this letter in my possession."

The mother's estate amounted to over $200,000, and at the audit thereof claimant presented a note as follows, omitting the judgment clause, viz.:

$13,070.86. August 30th, 1910.

I, Cecelia W. Donohoe, after date, August 30th, promise to pay to the order of Richard Donohoe, thirteen thousand and seventy dollars and 86/100 dollars without defalcation, value received, with interest at 6%.

Witness my hand and seal.

[Seal.] Hester Johnson,
Notary Public.

The note was on a printed form, and the words underscored above were in the handwriting of Mrs. Donohoe, as were also the words "I" and "me" written in the judgment clause. The notary public, who signed at the end of the note, was a resident of Maryland. The evidence is that Mrs. Donohoe said she had given the note to her son, and justifies the conclusion that it was done because of the income checks theretofore received by her, as above stated.

Between the date of the note and the decedent's death, claimant continued to turn the income checks over to her as before, amounting in all during that time to $14,896; for which sum, with interest, he also presented a claim at the audit. The mother, however, gave no acknowledgment of indebtedness for funds received after the date of the note, but did not say to other sons, in effect, that the amounts so received belonged to claimant and were to be returned to him at her death, or that such was her desire. There is, however, no pretense of an agreement on her part to return the funds to claimant. His statement that the money was a "free gift, not expecting any return," negatives any inference of such an agreement. Decedent's will, made two or three years after the date of the note, makes no reference to the funds in question. The orphans' court entered a decree allowing the note and rejecting the other claim, from which each side appealed.

Notwithstanding the son intended the money as a gift, the mother had the right to repay it, and her sealed note, given for that purpose, is valid. That Mrs.

Donohoe's signature appears in the body of the note, and not at the end, is unimportant, so long as she intended thereby to obligate herself for its payment. There is no law requiring a note to be signed at the end thereof, as in the case of a will; hence, whenever it can be found that the signature, wherever it appears, was intended as an execution of the note it is sufficient. For example, to write, "On demand, I John Smith, promise to pay Thomas Brown, one hundred dollars," is, in form, a good obligation, and that is essentially this case.

"It is not necessary that the signature of a party to a contract should appear at the end thereof. If his name is written by him in any part of the contract, or at the top, or the right or left hand, with intention to sign for the purpose of authenticating the instrument, it is sufficient to bind him." 9 Cyc. 301.

"When a signature is essential to the validity of an instrument it is not necessary that the signature appear at the end of the instrument. If the name of the party whose signature is required is written by him in any part of the instrument, for the purpose of authenticating it, it is a sufficient signature." 36 Cyc. 449.

The same rule applies to commercial paper. 7 Cyc. 614; and see Smith v. Howell, 11 N. J. Eq. 349. The fact that for greater solemnity Mrs. Donohoe called in a notary public, who was a stranger to the instrument and mistakenly wrote her name in the wrong place, is unimportant; the obligation remained that of Cecelia W. Donohoe, and, being perfected by delivery, is unsailable.

It was competent to establish the execution of the note by proof of the admissions of the maker (Williams v. Floyd, 11 Pa. 499; American Underwriter's Asso. v. George, 97 Pa. 238, 241; Stewart v. Gleason, 23 Pa. Super. Ct. 325), and also by proof of her handwriting (Clark v. Freeman, 25 Pa. 133).

The $14,896, like that for which the note was given, was, according to claimant's own statement, "a free gift, not expecting any return," which, when completed by delivery and used by decedent as her own, became her property. An acceptance of the gift will be implied where, as here, it operates entirely for the donee's benefit. 12 R. C. L. p. 934, § 10; Bryce's Estate, 194 Pa. 135, 44 Atl. 1076. Mrs. Donohoe might have obligated herself to repay this money, as she did that represented by the note, but failed to do so. Her loose declarations to third parties that the money was to be returned at her death fall far short of constituting a contract on her part to that effect. Claims against decedents' estates cannot be established by proof of such declarations. Gilbraith's Estate, 270 Pa. 288, 113 Atl. 361; Hertzog v. Hertzog, 29 Pa. 465. Mrs. Donohoe's letter, above referred to, was written in 1909, and her therein expressed intention of returning to claimant what he had given her is confined to funds theretofore received, and, while it may tend to support the note, has no bearing on the $14,896 claim. True, decedent probably intended that the funds received from her son should be repaid to him at her death, but unfortunately she made no provision, testamentary or otherwise, to that effect; and, in the absence thereof, her estate is not liable.

pay money—
sufficiency.

The transaction being intended by claimant as a gift, the mother cannot be treated as a trustee of the fund, in the absence of an agreement or declaration of trust.

Trust—gift—
how established.

See Robinson v. Powell, 210 Pa. 232, 59 Atl. 1078. The fact that she mingled this money with her own, and used it for her own purposes, is not consistent with the theory that she regarded it as a trust, although she may have intended to repay it.

Referring to the letter from claimant, in part above quoted, his attorney made the following offer, viz.: "I propose to call Reverend Richard Donohoe, who wrote this letter, to explain any seeming ambiguity in the language of the letter, and to make it clear just what he meant by the letter."

This was properly rejected. There is no seeming ambiguity in the language of the letter, nor aught that requires explanation. When a letter or other writing is perfectly clear and capable of but one construction, it is not error to refuse to permit the writer to testify as to what he meant thereby. Of course Reverend Donohoe could not testify as to matters occurring prior to his mother's death.

Appeal—rejection of evidence —when not error.

The assignments of error are all overruled, and the appeals are dismissed, at the costs of the respective appellants.

ANNOTATION.

Place of maker's signature on bill or note.

- I. In general, 394.
- II. Signature in body, 395.
- III. Signature on back, 396.
- IV. Effect of signature in unusual places, 397.

I. In general.

The cases uniformly agree with the decision in the reported case (RE DONOHOE, ante, 392) that the maker's or drawer's signature to a bill or note need be at no particular part of the instrument. Lampkin v. State (1894) 105 Ala. 1, 16 So. 575; Eudora Min. & Development Co. v. Barclay (1898) 122 Ala. 506, 26 So. 113; Knox v. Rivers Bros. (1920) 17 Ala. App. 630, 88 So. 33; Palmer v. Grant (1822) 4 Conn. 389; Quin v. Sterne (1858) 26 Ga. 223, 71 Am. Dec. 204; Camden v. McKoy (1842) 4 Ill. 437, 38 Am. Dec. 91; Lincoln v. Hinzey (1869) 51 Ill. 435; Kistner v. Peters (1906) 223 Ill. 607, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 400, 114 Am. St. Rep. 362, 79 N. E. 311; Miers v. Coates (1895) 57 Ill. App. 216; Steininger v. Hoch (1861) 39 Pa. 263, 80 Am. Dec. 521; Taylor v. Dobbins (1720) 1 Strange, 399, 93 Eng. Reprint, 592.

In Tevis v. Young (1858) 1 Met. (Ky.) 197, 71 Am. Dec. 474, the court, in denying the validity of a draft in which the drawer's name does not appear at all, says obiter that the name of the drawer is usually written or subscribed at the bottom of the bill, but this does not seem to be absolutely indispensable; for if the bill is written by him and his name is inserted in the body thereof or is otherwise signed to it, so that it clearly appears that he is the drawer, it will be sufficient.

It is stated in Clason v. Bailey (1817) 14 Johns (N. Y.) 484, in a case involving a contract other than a bill or note, that "it is a point settled that if the name of the party appears in the memorandum, and is applicable to the whole substance of the writing, and is put there by him or by his authority, it is immaterial in what part of the instrument the name appeared, whether at the top, in the middle, or at the bottom."

A note containing a warrant of attorney to confess judgment is not defectively executed because the signature of the maker was not attached to the note proper, but only to the warrant of attorney at the foot of the same sheet of paper, upon which both the note and warrant of attorney were written. Heslip v. Anderson (1907) 134 Ill. App. 8.

In Armstrong v. Kirkpatrick (1881) 79 Ind. 527, an action on a note signed by several persons who were designated as the directors of an agricultural association, against the signers individually, it was urged that in order to bind the principal and make it his contract, the instrument must purport on its face to be the contract of the principal, and his name must be inserted in it and signed to it, and not merely the name of the agent, even though the latter be described as agent in the instrument. In answer to this contention the court states that it is not a universal or general rule that the name of the maker must be both inserted in, and signed to, the instrument.

A note in the usual form, signed by the principal, and under whose signature is written the words, "I acknowledge myself holden as surety for the payment of the demand in the above note," followed by the signature of the surety, was held to be the joint and several promise of the maker and surety in Hunt v. Adams (1809) 5 Mass. 358, 4 Am. Dec. 68. The court states that the legal effect of the note in this form is not different from a note signed by the principal, with that word annexed to his name, followed by the signature of the surety, with that word annexed.

An action on a draft signed by the drawer across the face of the paper was sustained in Patillo v. Mayer (1883) 70 Ga. 715, but there was no point made of the place of signature.

II. Signature in body.

In the application of the foregoing general rule, it is held immaterial that the signature forms part of the body of the writing, instead of being written at the foot or end thereof. Lampkin v. State (1894) 105 Ala. 1, 16 So. 575; Knox v. Rivers Bros. (1920) 17 Ala. App. 630, 88 So. 33; RE DONOHUE (reported herewith), ante, 392; Taylor v. Dobbins (1720) 1 Strange, 399, 93 Eng. Reprint, 592.

Notes in which the maker signed above a line designating the place of payment were sustained, with obligations of the maker, in Turnbull v. Thomas (1875) 1 Hughes, 172, Fed. Cas. No. 14,243.

A prosecution for the forgery of a writing in the form of a draft upon a person, requesting him to let the payee have a certain sum "and charge it to John Driver," was sustained in Lampkin v. State (Ala.) supra. The allegation of the indictment that the meaning of the writing was that it was "signed John Driver" was unnecessary, but was held to be, as a matter of fact and law, proved by the writing given in evidence.

An action upon a bill of exchange in the following form: "Pay to the order of L. J. Knox, $800, eight hundred dollars, for Rivers Bros., value received and charged to account of ———," was sustained in favor of Knox and against Rivers Brothers, upon an allegation of presentment to the drawee and the refusal of payment, in Knox v. Rivers Bros. (1920) 17 Ala. App. 630, 88 So. 33. It was alleged in the complaint that the bill of exchange was drawn by the defendant. The court says that when a bill of exchange is drawn it means not only the body of the writing, but the signing as well, and, further, the court says: "The makers or drawers may place their names on any part of the instrument where they may prefer to write them, and thus bind themselves as makers; as to whether they so signed is a matter of proof."

III. Signature on back.

It has been held in a number of cases that the signature of a joint maker may be on the back of the instrument. Eudora Min. & Development Co. v. Barclay (1898) 122 Ala. 506, 26 So. 113; Palmer v. Grant (1822) 4 Conn. 389; Quin v. Sterne (1858) 26 Ga. 223, 71 Am. Dec. 204; Lincoln v. Huinzey (1869) 51 Ill. 435; Kistner v. Peters (1906) 223 Ill. 607, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 400, 114 Am. St. Rep. 362, 79 N. E. 311; Pearl v. Cortright (1902) 81 Miss. 300, 33 So. 72; Schmidt v. Schmaelter (1870) 45 Mo. 502.

There are still other cases in which one who signed on the back of a note was held to be an original promisor. Rodocanachi v. Buttrick (1878) 125 Mass. 134; Dow Law Bank v. Godfrey (1901) 126 Mich. 521, 86 Am. St. Rep. 559, 85 N. W. 1075; McGraw v. Union Trust Co. (1904)

136 Mich. 521, 99 N. W. 758; Olansky v. Berlin (1902) 37 Misc. 775, 76 N. Y. Supp. 945; Miller v. Clendenin (1896) 42 W. Va. 416, 26 S. E. 512.

Of the class illustrated by the last above list of cases this note is, of course, not exhaustive. There are a large number of cases in which one who signed on the back of the instrument was held to be a joint maker, without any point being made of the power of one to bind himself as maker by a signature there placed. The question whether one who signs his name on the back of a bill or note before delivery to the payee is an indorser or joint maker is beyond the scope of the annotation.

A variety of facts have been involved in the cases involving signature on the back of the instrument. A note signed by one person in the usual place for the signature of a maker, and by three others upon the back thereof, was sustained as the joint note of four persons, in Eudora Min. & Development Co. v. Barclay (1898) 122 Ala. 506, 26 S. E. 113. An action was sustained on a note signed by two persons upon the face, in the usual place for the signature, and a third person on the back, of the note, by the payee against the three persons as joint makers, in Lincoln v. Hinzey (1869) 51 Ill. 435, the court saying that one may become liable as joint maker without reference to the position of his signature, or whether it be found upon the face or back of the note, if it is shown by satisfactory evidence that the party signing did so as joint maker. A note reading: "We, Grant and Wattles, as principal, and Daniel Carr and William Grant, as surety, promise to pay," etc., signed by Grant and Wattles as makers, but by Carr and William Grant on the back of the note,—was held to import one original entire transaction, by which Carr and William Grant described themselves as sureties and joint promisors with their principal. Palmer v. Grant (1822) 4 Conn. 389. A note containing a promise as follows: "We, A as principal and B and C as surety, promise to pay to the order of ourselves," signed by A and indorsed by A, B, and C,—creates a liability against C of surety and joint promisor in a note payable to the order of the principals and by them indorsed. National Pemberton Bank v. Lougee (1871) 108 Mass. 371, 11 Am. Rep. 367. One who signed his name before delivery, upon the back of a note which contained a promise that "we, the signers, indorsers, sureties, and all of us, in solido, promise to pay," etc., binds himself by an unconditional promise to pay, and thereby waives notice of dishonor which otherwise would be required to bind an indorser. Hibernia Bank & T. Co. v. Dresser (1912) 132 La. 532, 61 So. 561. It is stated in Palmer v. Grant (Conn.) supra, that to bind a party by his signature to a contract it is perfectly immaterial where it is placed, "if it appears from the instrument to have been made by him, with an intention to obligate himself."

In Quin v. Sterne (1858) 26 Ga. 223, 71 Am. Dec. 204, an action on a note signed by two persons in the usual place for the signature of makers, and by another person on the back of the note, the plaintiff charged all three of the persons with having made and delivered to him his note, that is, alleged that all three signed the note before it was delivered to the payee; this declaration was demurred to on account of a misjoinder of parties, as after the note was read the defendant moved to nonsuit the plaintiff; upon denial of the motion, the defendant excepted. Upon appeal the court says it is immaterial upon what part of the note the name of the maker is written. The declaration averred that all the parties to this note signed it before it was delivered to the plaintiff, the demurrer to the declaration admits this fact, which is no doubt true, and the note as written sustains the declaration, and it is concluded that the party who signed on the back may be made chargeable as maker under the case as it then stood.

A note in the usual form, containing on the back thereof an indorsement reading: "For value received, we, jointly and severally, undertake to pay the money within mentioned to the said" payee, signed by two persons, was held to bind each of the persons as an original promisor, in White v. Howland (1812) 9 Mass. 314, 6 Am. Dec. 71.

IV. Effect of signature in unusual places.

The only effect that signing in unusual places seem to have is as to the proof of the instrument. Where the signature is in the usual place for the signature of the maker or drawer, there is a presumption that the signature is in that capacity. Camden v. McKoy (1842) 4 Ill. 437, 38 Am. Dec. 91; Kripner v. Lincoln (1894) 54 Ill. App. 675. But where the signature is in some unusual place, proof that the party sought to be held as maker or drawer signed in that capacity seems necessary. Knox v. Rivers Bros. (1920) 17 Ala. App. 630, 88 So. 33; Lincoln v. Hinzey (1869) 51 Ill. 435; Kripner v. Lincoln (Ill.) supra; Miers v. Coates (1894) 57 Ill. App. 216.

Where a note in form the note of one person only is signed by one person in the proper place and sealed, the signature of another to the left of the signature of the first name in about the place usually occupied by the signature of attaching witnesses does not create a prima facie liability against the last-subscribed signer, his liability is equivocal. Steininger v. Hoch (1861) 39 Pa. 263, 80 Am. Dec. 521.

The indorsement upon a note by the payee, of a statement that he acknowledges himself as part maker of the note with one of the parties whose names are signed to the note, is not sufficient to render him a joint maker. Kistner v. Peters (1906) 223 Ill. 607, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 400, 114 Am. St. Rep. 362, 79 N. E. 311.

Because of the state of the pleadings in Lincoln v. Hinzey (1869) 51 Ill. 435, the presumption was held to exist that the party signing on the back signed as a joint maker, and the burden was on him to prove otherwise.

The court in Palmer v. Grant

(1822) 4 Conn. 389, in a case involving a signature by those who were denominated in the body of the note as sureties, upon the back thereof, the court says that it is incumbent on the plaintiff, in a suit on the note, to convince the court that the sureties are makers of the note in question, and to accomplish this he must support, at least, one of three propositions: (1) He must either show that the defendants had actually become makers by signing the note in the usual manner; or (2) that they put their names on the back of it, thereby intending to become makers and not indorsers; or (3) finally, he must satisfy us that, although the defendants have not actually signed the note as makers, and there is no proof derivable from any source that they had the intention of doing it, they notwithstanding are such by construction of law. ROBERT V. MUNDY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

JOHN S. McDONALD.

Michigan Supreme Court — December 21, 1921.

(216 Mich. 444, 185 N. W. 877.)

Libel — liability of judge — malicious charge against public officer.

1. A judge is not answerable for a malicious libel in placing upon the public records charges of delinquency in office of a mayor of a city, an examination into whose conduct in respect to the enforcement of the criminal laws he had made under statutory authority.

[See note on this question beginning on page 407.]

Attorney general — power to defend libel suit.

2. The attorney general may defend a judge sued for libel in a matter pertaining to the duties of his office, under a statute making it his duty to defend cases in which the people of the state may be interested.

[See 2 R. C. L. 916, 919.]

Pleading — motion to dismiss complaint — propriety of procedure.

3. A motion to dismiss a complaint to hold a judge liable in damages for placing a libel on the files of the court, in connection with his duties as judge in a proceeding pending before him, is proper.

Libel — by judge — allegation of malice — effect.

4. An allegation of malice in a complaint to recover damages from a judge for a libel in connection with the duties of his office does not destroy the right to raise the question of privilege.

[See 17 R. C. L. 334.]

Judge — official act — finding of charges against mayor.

5. A judge, with statutory authority to conduct examinations in criminal cases, acts in his judicial capacity in hearing charges against the mayor of a city, and placing on record findings charging him with misfeasance in office, to be transmitted to the tribunals having jurisdiction of the ouster of public officials.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kent County (Lamb, J.) to review a judgment sustaining a motion in the nature of a demurrer, to dismiss an action brought to recover damages for an alleged libel. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Collins & Thompson, for plaintiff in error:

Unless the matters set up in the motion to dismiss are matters which might have been raised by demurrer, plea in abatement, or plea to the jurisdiction, under the former practice they cannot be made the basis of a motion to dismiss.

Stone, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is in this court upon writ of error, sued out by the plaintiff, to review an order and judgment of the circuit court for the county of Kent sustaining a motion, in the nature of a demurrer, to dismiss the suit. At and before the time of the commencement of this suit, plaintiff was and had been for some time the mayor of Bay City, and he was at the time of the committing of the acts complained of, a candidate for the office of commissioner of that city. Some time prior to March 26, 1921, Lewis J. Weadock, assistant prosecuting attorney for Bay county, had filed in the circuit court for said county a complaint under Act No. 196, Public Acts of 1917, entitled: "An Act to Authorize Proceedings for the Discovery of Crime, and to Provide Penalties for a Violation of Such Procedure."

The defendant was at and before the time alleged, and still is, one of the judges of the circuit court for the county of Kent. He was, as such judge, regularly called to sit and hear and conduct said proceedings. It appears that testimony was taken before him, and no formal complaint was filed or warrants issued. At the termination of the proceedings, the defendant, as such circuit judge, on March 26, 1921, filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of Bay county the statement or report found in the record, the publication of which is complained of in the declaration herein, as follows: That the defendant "on, to wit, the 26th day of March, A. D. 1921, falsely, wickedly, and maliciously did compose and publish, and cause and procure to be published of and concerning the said plaintiff a certain false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory libel; did falsely, wickedly, and maliciously procure said false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory libel to be placed in the files of the circuit court for the county of Bay; said false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory libel being in the following form."

Here follows the statement or document complained of, which is too lengthy to be inserted in full. We make the following extracts from the document:

Charges against mayor.

The specific charges upon which Mayor Mundy should be tried are:

First, that he had knowledge of the fact that the liquor laws were being openly violated in Bay City and made no reasonable effort to prevent it.

Second, that he had knowledge of the fact that gambling in various forms was being carried on and that houses of prostitution were being conducted and took no action toward the suppression of such violations.

Third, that he violated the provisions of Act No. 338 of the Public Acts of Michigan for the year 1917, because of his failure to strictly enforce the provisions therein contained for the suppression of the use and sale of liquor.

Fourth, that he knew the police officers were neglecting their duty in the matter of the enforcement of the laws against gambling, prostitution, and the use and sale of liquor, and did not proceed against them as he was required to do under §§ 45 and 49 of chapter 4 of the Bay City charter.

Fifth, that he was not at all times vigilant and active in the enforcement of the laws as required by § 45, chapter 4 of the charter.

Sixth, that he did not summon meetings of the council of Bay City, or its police committee, to assist in the suppression of crime, and took no other action to properly enforce the law and discharge the duties imposed on him by the charter of Bay City and the laws of this state.

Seventh, that as mayor of Bay City he adopted a policy of liberality toward the commission of the crimes above mentioned, and encouraged the police officials in their neglect to enforce the law.

My determination of the facts brought out on this investigation furnish no reason for the issuance of criminal process against any of the parties involved. The said Robert Mundy, Chief of Police Davis, and Captain Ripsky being guilty only of a wilful neglect in the duties of their respective offices, I therefore do not return any indictments or presentments to this court, but submit these findings that they may be transmitted to the only tribunal having jurisdiction in the ouster of city officials.

Dated March 26, 1921.

John S. McDonald,
Circuit Judge.

On April 6, 1921, this action was begun in the Kent circuit court. On April 21, 1921, the attorney general of this state, as such, and one of his assistants in his official capacity, filed in said court a motion to dismiss this action, for the reason that the declaration of the plaintiff was not sufficient in law because the declaration shows that the defendant was acting as circuit judge of Bay county, Michigan, at the time of the alleged libel, and then and there published the matter alleged as libelous in the plaintiff's declaration in the exercise of his functions as a circuit judge.

On April 22, 1921, the attorneys for plaintiff filed a motion to strike the above motion of the attorney general from the files of the court. Thereupon the attorney general made and filed an affidavit in said cause, setting forth that as such officer he was requested by Samuel G. Houghton, circuit judge of Bay county, to appear for and on behalf of the people of the state of Michigan in a certain proceeding to be conducted in Bay county under said Act No. 196; that on account of such request by Judge Houghton, and in the exercise of the discretion vested in him as attorney general in such matter, he did, on or about March 7, 1921, undertake to conduct such proceedings in Bay county on behalf of the people of said state; that the defendant circuit judge of Kent county was sent by the presiding judge to sit as the circuit judge in such proceeding, and that deponent was represented in such proceedings by his assistant, Ernest C. Smith; that such proceedings terminated in Bay county on or about March 21, at which time the defendant, as circuit judge, returned certain findings directing removal proceedings against the plaintiff and other officers by reason of their alleged neglect to enforce the criminal laws of this state; that the said findings had to do with the lack of proper enforcement of the criminal laws, and charged a wilful neglect of duty upon certain officers, including the plaintiff; that the aforesaid findings are set forth in the declaration in this cause and are the basis of plaintiff's cause of action; that deponent had tendered his services to the defendant in this case, deeming it to be a matter of vital interest to the people of this state and a matter in which the public is vitally interested, viz., the legitimate protection and defense of all public officers in their legitimate acts in the enforcement of the criminal laws of the state, and deeming it also a matter of vital importance to the people of the state that proper proceedings should be taken against public officers who wilfully fail and neglect their duties in the enforcement of the criminal laws. As the plaintiff's declaration sets up an alleged cause of action arising out of proceedings officially conducted by the deponent, and as the subject-matter of the case is inseparably connected with the acts of a state officer engaged in proceedings to discover crime, and likewise involves matters pertaining to the neglect of public officers to enforce laws against crime, deponent had deemed this to be a proceeding in which the public was interested to such an extent as not only to warrant, but to require, the exercise of not alone a discretion, but a duty to protect the public interests involved or threatened; and that therefore he had appeared officially in this proceeding and had directed his assistant to take full charge of the same on behalf of the defendant herein.

The case came on to be heard on the two motions referred to; and on May 10, 1921, the court below filed its order denying plaintiff's motion to strike the motion of the attorney general from the files, and on the same day filed its order and judgment dismissing plaintiff's declaration. Counsel for appellant say that the assignments of error present the three following questions:

(1) "Can the attorney general of the state of Michigan, as such, defend a case of this character?"

(2) "Is the motion to dismiss, under the circumstances of this case, a proper procedure authorized by our rules and practice?"

(3) "Is the defendant amenable to a case for libel under the circumstances of this case?"

1. It is urged by appellant's counsel, after reference to the statute pertaining to the duties of the attorney general, that there is no statutory duty devolving upon that officer to justify his appearing in this case. It is urged that the authority for the intervention of the attorney general, as such in this case must be found either in the statutes of this state or in the broad domain of public policy, and that under neither of said heads can the practice be sustained. We do not agree with counsel in this contention. A reference to the statute (§ 132, Comp. Laws 1915) and Act No. 232, Pub. Acts 1919, make it a duty of the attorney general to both prosecute and defend cases pertaining to the public interest of the state; the language of the statute being: "In any cause or matter, civil or criminal, in which the people of this state may be a party or interested."

A broad discretion is vested in this officer in determining what matters may, or may not, be of interest to the people generally. We must recognize the fact that the office of attorney general is ancient in its origin and history, and it is generally held by the states of the Union that the attorney general has a wide range of powers at common law. These are in addition to his statutory powers. See Corp. Juris, vol. 6, p. 809, and cases cited 2 R. C. L. 916. It is too narrow a view of the case to say that the people of this state are not interested in the defense in a case of this nature, which involves the purely legal question of the regularity of the criminal proceeding conducted in the circuit court wherein the attorney general was acting on behalf of the people. Certainly if the people of the state can be said to be interested in a criminal proceeding, they are, we think, equally interested in this action growing out of it, depending as it does entirely upon whether the acts of the defendant complained of were judicial acts.

Attorney general—power to defend libel suit.

We do not think the court erred in denying plaintiff's motion to strike the motion of the attorney general from the files. It will be noted that the motion is entitled in the cause using the words: "Comes now said defendant and moves the court," etc. We fail to see wherein appellant was prejudiced by the ruling of the court in this regard.

2. It is the contention of plaintiff's counsel that the motion to dismiss was not the proper procedure under our practice. We cannot agree with this contention. In our opinion the declaration affirmatively alleges all the facts necessary to present the question of a demurrer. It alleges: "And whereas, the defendant at the time of the committing of the grievances hereinafter set forth, was conducting a grand jury inquiry under the provisions of Act No. 196 of the Public Acts of 1917 in the circuit court for the county of Bay, etc., . . . did falsely, wickedly, and maliciously procure said false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory libel to be placed in the files of the circuit court for the county of Bay; said false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory libel being in the following form."

The entire matter thus complained of as libelous is therein fully set forth, and is signed by "John S. McDonald, Circuit Judge." It is idle to claim that there is nothing in the record to show that the circuit judge of Bay county was not present and presiding over his court. Manifestly, there can be no need of extrinsic evidence to establish the situation, viz., that the defendant was a circuit judge sitting in the circuit court for the county of Bay, and conducting the inquiry alleged, and that in what he did he did acting as a circuit judge. The motion is to all intents and purposes a demurrer, and is authorized by our practice.

Pleading—motion to dismiss complaint—propriety of procedure.

It is further contended that "where the complaint contains an averment that the plaintiff acted maliciously, the demurrer admits this allegation, and thus prohibits the raising of the questions of privilege, as privilege is inconsistent with express malice;" and Eviston v. Cramer, 47 Wis. 659, 3 N. W. 392, is cited.

A reference to that case will show that the court was speaking of a qualified privilege, and the case is readily distinguished. In case of an absolute privilege the weight of authority is to the effect that the qualifying words do not change the rule or take away the right to demur. The following cases are decisive of the question:

In Spalding v. Vilas, 161 U. S. 483, 40 L. ed. 780, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 631, the question discussed arose on demurrer. Mr. Justice Harlan, in the course of his opinion, said: "If, as we hold to be the case, the circular issued by the Postmaster General to claimants under the acts of Congress in question was not unauthorized by law, nor beyond the scope of his official duties, can this action be maintained because of the allegation that what the officer did was done maliciously?"

Referring to the case of Bradley v. Fisher, 13 Wall. 335, 20 L. ed. 646,

"Which was an action against a justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff 'by reason of the wilful, malicious, oppressive, and tyrannical acts and conduct' of the defendant, whereby the plaintiff was deprived of his right to practise as an attorney in that court,—it was said that the qualifying words above quoted were not necessary to a correct statement of the law, and that judges of courts of superior or general jurisdiction were not liable to civil suits for their judicial acts, even when such acts were in excess of their jurisdiction, and are alleged to have been done maliciously or corruptly.

"The same principle was announced in England in the case of Fray v. Blackburn, 3 Best & S. 576, 122 Eng. Reprint, 217, in which Mr. Justice Crompton said: 'It is a principle of our law that no action will lie against a judge of one of the superior courts for a judicial act, though it be alleged to have been done maliciously and corruptly; therefore, the proposed allegation would not make the declaration good. The public are deeply interested in this rule, which, indeed, exists for their benefit, and was established in order to secure the independence of the judges and prevent them from being harassed by vexatious actions.'"

In Lange v. Benedict, 73 N. Y. 12, 29 Am. Rep. 80, the question arose on demurrer to the complaint. The court said: "We have seen, too, that the test is not that the act was in excess of jurisdiction, or alleged to have been done with malice and corruptly; for even if it is such an act, it does not render liable the doer of the act, if he be a judge of a court of general or superior authority. Bradley v. Fisher, supra."

In Valesh v. Prince, 94 Misc. 479, 159 N. Y. Supp. 598, there was a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought against a judge of the municipal court of New York city, to recover damages for an alleged libel, and in the course of the opinion, which sustained the demurrer, the court said: "It would seem, therefore, that these statements were absolutely privileged, irrespective even of allegations charging malice, truth, or relevancy."

We do not think that there is any merit in this claim.

3. Is the defendant amenable to a case for libel, under the circumstances of this case? This brings us to the main question in the case. The statute under which the defendant was proceeding gives a "judge of a court of record" power to act, and it provides that the "proceedings to summon such witness and compel him to testify shall, as far as possible, be the same as proceedings to summon witnesses and compel their attendance and testimony." The power given "to the several circuit judges" to conduct examinations in criminal cases is of long standing. Comp. Laws 1915, §§ 15,665 et seq.

That defendant acted in a judicial capacity cannot, we think, be questioned. What he did, he did as a circuit judge. The statute gave him power to conduct the proceedings. The principle that judges and courts of superior jurisdiction are immune from actions based upon judicial acts may be said to be as old as the beginning of the English common law.

Judge—official act—finding of charges against mayor.

Libel—liability of judge—malicious charge against public officer.

In Newell on Slander & Libel 3d ed. at § 520, the rule is stated as follows: "In England, and generally in the United States, a judge of a court has an absolute immunity, and no action can be maintained against him, even though it be alleged that he spoke maliciously knowing his words to be false, and also that his words were irrelevant to the matter in issue before him, and wholly unwarranted by the evidence."

In the recent case of Thomas v. Rosecrantz, 193 Mich. 357, 159 N. W. 514, in speaking of the power and jurisdiction of a circuit judge, we pointed out the distinction between the effect of an order to admit to bail in a capias action, made by a circuit judge, and one made by a circuit court commissioner. Referring to the case of Johnson v. Morton, 94 Mich. 1, 53 N. W. 816, Mr. Justice Steere said: "It was held, even though the writ had been vacated and proceedings quashed, the order to hold to bail made by the circuit judge protected the party applying for the writ. Of the affidavit this court said: . . . 'It is evident that this affidavit lacks in detail and in certainty, and for that reason it is insufficient; but it cannot be said that it sets forth no facts or circumstances indicating fraud or breach of trust,'—which was the tort charged. Holding that the affidavit had a legal tendency to make out a case inasmuch as the facts and circumstances indicated fraud and breach of trust, the court said in conclusion: 'The determination of the judge must be held to have all the qualities of a judicial decision, and as such protects the judge, the officer, and the party.'"

In the Thomas Case, Mr. Justice Steere later referred to the early case of Ward v. Cozzens, 3 Mich. 252. There the order was made by a judge of the United States circuit court for the district of Michigan. Of such courts it was said: They "are courts of limited but not inferior jurisdiction. Their limitation applies to the persons of the parties and the subject-matter of the action. When, therefore, these come within their jurisdiction, they stand upon the same footing of all other superior courts of general common-law jurisdiction. . . . A capias ad respondendum is a process of that court. But it is insisted that the affidavit did not disclose such a state of facts as authorized the making of the order. If that be so, the judge erred. It was a matter submitted to his judgment, he acted upon it, and made the order."

In concluding the opinion in the Ward Case the following general rule was stated: "All the authorities are very clear, that a judge of a court of record cannot be held responsible for any acts done by him in his official capacity, and they are equally clear, that in no instance can his orders, judgments, or decrees be treated as nullities. [Citing many cases.] The foregoing authorities establish this proposition, that in all cases where the parties act within the power and scope of an order of the superior court, without reference to their jurisdiction, and of an inferior court when having jurisdiction, they are protected. The same immunities that are extended to the members of the respective courts, are extended to the parties."

See also Schultz v. Huebner, 108 Mich. 274, 66 N. W. 57; Hall v. Munger, 5 Lans. 100.

In the early case of Hart v. Baxter, 47 Mich. 198, 10 N. W. 198, Mr. Justice Cooley refers to the case of McLaughlin v. Cowley, 127 Mass. 316, for a clear statement of the general rule. It is there stated: "It was stated in the opinion of this court in the recent case of Rice v. Coolidge, 121 Mass. 393, 23 Am. Rep. 279, that it seems to be settled by the English authorities that judges, counsel, parties, and witnesses are absolutely exempted from liability to an action for defamatory words published in the course of judicial proceedings; and that the same doctrine is generally held in the American courts, with the qualification, as to parties, counsel, and witnesses, that their statements made in the course of an action must be pertinent and material to the case."

The case of Bradley v. Fisher, 13 Wall. 335, 20 L. ed. 646, is a leading case upon this question. There the plaintiff, an attorney at law, threatened the defendant, a judge of the criminal court of the District of Columbia, with personal chastisement on account of his rulings in a case wherein the plaintiff was an attorney and the defendant was presiding judge. This occurred outside the court. The defendant, without notice to the plaintiff, and without any hearing in the matter, entered an order striking plaintiff's name from the roll of attorneys. For this act plaintiff sued defendant in tort, alleging the act to be unlawful, malicious, and corrupt. It was held that the action was not maintainable, although it was expressly conceded that the court had no jurisdiction to make such an order without notice to plaintiff and hearing thereon. The general subject-matter of striking an attorney's name from the rolls was within the jurisdiction of the court, and defendant's act in so striking was in excess of jurisdiction and not entirely without jurisdiction.

In that case Mr. Justice Field, in the course of the opinion, said:

"In other words, it [the plea] sets up that the order for the entry of which the suit was brought, was a judicial act, done by the defendant as the presiding justice of a court of general criminal jurisdiction. If such were the character of the act, and the jurisdiction of the court, the defendant cannot be subjected to responsibility for it in a civil action, however erroneous the act may have been, and however injurious in its consequences it may have proved to the plaintiff. For it is a general principle of the highest importance to the proper administration of justice that a judicial officer, in exercising the authority vested in him, shall be free to act upon his own convictions, without apprehension of personal consequences to himself. Liability to answer to everyone who might feel himself aggrieved by the action of the judge, would be inconsistent with the possession of this freedom, and would destroy that independence without which no judiciary can be either respectable or useful. As observed by a distinguished English judge, it would establish the weakness of judicial authority in a degrading responsibility. Taaffe v. Downes, 3 Moore, P. C. C. 41, note, 13 Eng. Reprint, 19, note.

"The principle, therefore, which exempts judges of courts of superior or general authority from liability in a civil action for acts done by them in the exercise of their judicial functions, obtains in all countries where there is any well-ordered system of jurisprudence. It has been the settled doctrine of the English courts for many centuries, and has never been denied, that we are aware of, in the courts of this country. It has, as Chancellor Kent observes, 'a deep root in the common law.' Yates v. Lansing, 5 Johns. 291.

"Nor can this exemption of the judges from civil liability be affected by the motives with which their judicial acts are performed. The purity of their motives cannot, in this way, be the subject of judicial inquiry."

Many English and American cases are discussed. We invoke a careful reading of the remainder of this able opinion. It is too lengthy to be copied here. It is there further held that judges of courts of superior or general jurisdiction are not liable to civil actions for their judicial acts, even when such acts are in excess of their jurisdictions. A distinction is pointed out between excess of jurisdiction, and the clear absence of all jurisdiction over the subject-matter.

One of the early leading cases in this country is that of Yates v. Lansing, 5 Johns. 282. Chief Justice Kent delivered the opinion. We invite perusal of the case.

A comparatively late case is that of Spalding v. Vilas, 161 U. S. 483, 40 L. ed. 780, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 631. The opinion was written by Mr. Justice Harlan, and it is worthy of examination as covering the entire subject here involved, and especially holding that judges of courts of superior or general jurisdiction are not liable to civil suit for their judicial acts, even when such acts are in excess of their jurisdiction, and are alleged to have been done maliciously or corruptly. The following additional cases bear upon the main question: Flynn v. Boglarsky, 164 Mich. 513, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 740, 129 N. W. 674; Wells v. Toogood, 165

Mich. 677, 131 N. W. 124; Lange v. Benedict, 73 N. Y. 12-28, 29 Am. Rep. 80; Aylesworth v. St. John, 25 Hun, 156; Marsh v. Ellsworth, 50 N. Y. 309; Busteed v. Parsons, 54 Ala. 393, 25 Am. Rep. 688; Dunham v. Powers, 42 Vt. 1; 17 R. C. L. pp. 333 et seq.

Under the foregoing authorities, it must be held that the composing of and filing in the clerk's office of the findings complained of as libelous were judicial acts requiring a decision on the part of the judge as to the proper course to be pursued. To hold that the acts were in excess of jurisdiction, and therefore for that reason subject the judge to private liability, is to say that courts and judges must decide questions of jurisdiction at their peril. Such a doctrine would, in a large measure, destroy the independence of the judiciary, and take away the immunity and privilege considered so essential and necessary to the proper and just administration of law.

But it is urged by plaintiff's counsel that the case is ruled and controlled by the cases of Bennett v. Kalamazoo Circuit Judge, 183 Mich. 200, 150 N. W. 141, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 223; Bennett v. Stockwell, 197 Mich. 50, L.R.A.1917F, 761, 163 N. W. 482; Ann. Cas. 1918E, 1193, and Oakman v. Recorder, 207 Mich. 15, 173 N. W. 346. We cannot agree with this contention. Upon that subject, the learned circuit judge, in his opinion in the instant case, said: "Neither of these cases is any assistance to us in the determination of the questions involved herein. In the Bennett-Stockwell Case the defendants (grand jurors) made a report to the court under which they were acting upon a matter which had not been referred to them by anyone, and upon which no proofs were taken by anyone. In the Oakman-Recorder Case, the findings of the recorder as filed in his court were stricken from the files, the filing of the same being without authority of law, and upon which no action in which the plaintiff could have had his day in court was taken thereon. There is nothing in that case that can possibly give us any light upon whether the recorder had laid himself liable to an action for libel by so doing, or whether he would be protected by the immunity which public policy throws around the acts, and the exercise of judgments of the judges."

The Bennett Cases are so readily distinguished that no argument is necessary. In the Oakman Case attention was called to the long time which elapsed between the filing of the so-called "presentment" and the issuing of warrants, and this court said: "We believe that the subsequent, though tardy, issuance of warrants, does not validate an act which at the time of its performance was unwarranted."

In the instant case the findings complained of were filed on March 26, and the instant suit was begun April 6, 1921. As stated by the attorney general: The defendant was "administering the provisions of a statutory enactment, and the findings are made not as a conclusion and end of a course of proceedings, but as the foundation and commencement of proceedings for removal from office for violation of the penal laws of the state, and the necessary steps are taken to commence the proceeding by filing of the complaint in the only proper tribunal, the common council, for the trial and adjudication of plaintiff's alleged offenses, subjecting him to removal from office."

For the reasons stated, the order and judgment of the court below should be and are affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied February 8, 1922.

ANNOTATION.

Findings or the like of judge or person acting in judicial capacity as privileged within law of libel.

This annotation, dealing as it does with the right of action for libel where the statements charged to be defamatory are part of a report or finding by a judicial officer, discusses but one phase of the general proposition that no action will lie against a judge for any acts done or words spoken in his judicial capacity in a court of justice.

As was said in Scott v. Stansfield (1868) L. R. 3 Exch. 220, 15 Eng. Rul. Cas. 42, a case not exactly within the scope of this annotation: "This provision of the law is not for the protection or benefit of a malicious or corrupt judge, but for the benefit of the public, whose interest it is that the judges should be at liberty to exercise their functions with independence and without fear of consequences."

The general rule deducible from the cases hereinafter cited is that one who acts in a judicial capacity may not be held responsible, in an action for libel, for statements made in a report or findings composed by him. The occasion is considered to be protected by a privilege sometimes spoken of as absolute and sometimes as qualified.

The reason for the rule was well stated in the case of Valesh v. Prince (1916) 94 Misc. 479, 159 N. Y. Supp. 598, affirmed without opinion in (1917) 177 App. Div. 891, 163 N. Y. Supp. 1133, which is affirmed without opinion in (1918) 224 N. Y. 613, 121 N. E. 985, wherein it was said: "It is my view that the doctrine of absolute privilege in affording protection to justices of our courts is based upon reason and a sound public policy. It is of supreme importance in the proper administration of justice that a judicial officer, in exercising the authority vested in him, shall be free to act upon his own convictions, without intimidation or the fear of being liable to prosecution in a civil action." An excellent statement of the principle was made in Bottomley v. Brougham (1908) 99 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 111, as follows: "The doctrine of privilege, as I understand it, means, in the ordinary way, a private right. There is really no private right of a judge, or a witness, or an advocate to be malicious; it would be wrong of him to be so, and if it could be proved I am by no means sure that it is not actionable. The real doctrine is that in the public interest it is not desirable to inquire whether the acts or the words of certain persons are malicious or not. That is really the true doctrine of what is called absolute privilege. It is not that there is any privilege to be malicious; but that, so far as it is a privilege of the individual,—I call it rather a right of the public,—the privilege is not to be malicious, but not to have his conduct inquired into to see whether it is malicious or not. The reason is that it is desirable that persons who occupy certain positions as judges, as advocates, as litigants, should be perfectly free and independent; and, in order to secure their independence, that their acts should not be brought before tribunals for inquiry into them merely by making the allegation that they are malicious."

In the reported case, MUNDY v. McDONALD, ante, 398), it appeared that the defendant, against whom an action for libel had been brought by the plaintiff, had, as a circuit judge, conducted certain proceedings for the removal of a municipal officer, at the termination of which he filed a report containing the statement complained of. Basing its decision on the principle that a judge of superior jurisdiction is immune from liability for his judicial acts, it is declared that the composing and filing of the findings complained of as libelous, being judicial acts, constituted no foundation for an action. It is held, further, that it was immaterial whether the acts were in excess of jurisdiction; for to impose liability in such a case would force judges to decide questions of jurisdiction at their peril, and this would destroy the independence of the judiciary.

In Childs v. Voris (1897) 6 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 75, 4 Ohio N. P. 67, the plaintiff brought an action for libel against the defendant, who was a judge. It was not set forth how the publication was made, but the court said: "For aught that appears it may have been the written opinion of the court deciding a matter submitted to it for decision and announced in open court." The court treated the case as if the alleged defamatory statements were made by a judge in the course of his judicial duty, and declared that judges of courts of general jurisdiction are not liable in civil actions for their judicial acts, and that the acts and speech of a judge in the discharge of his duty in a matter over which he has jurisdiction are absolutely privileged, and that the motives for his acts and words may not be inquired into in a judicial proceeding.

It may be noted that in the reported case, MUNDY v. McDONALD, ante, 398, the immunity in question is spoken of as belonging to courts of superior jurisdiction, and in Allen v. Earnest (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 145 S. W. 1101, there is a statement to the effect that the opinions of judges of superior courts are absolutely privileged. The same rule has, however, been applied in several cases to judges of inferior courts.

Thus, in Valesh v. Prince (N. Y.) supra, it appeared that the plaintiff sought to recover damages for an alleged libel on the part of the defendant, a judge of the municipal court of New York. The defamation alleged was contained in an opinion handed down by the defendant in the exercise of his judicial functions. The court said: "It would seem, therefore, that these statements were absolutely privileged, irrespective even of allegations charging malice, truth, or relevancy." The fact that the subject-matter of the alleged libel was pertinent and material to the action on which the opinion was written was adverted to, without stating whether such pertinency was deemed to be essential to immunity.

So, Aylesworth v. St. John (1881) 25 Hun (N. Y.) 156, was an action wherein the plaintiff sought to recover damages for a libel written by the defendant, a justice of the peace. It appeared that the plaintiff was an attorney at law, and had acted in that capacity for one against whom a judgment was recovered, before the defendant as justice of the peace, and who had appealed from the judgment to a county court. The county court required an amended return, and the defendant complied with the order, adding thereto the alleged libel, viz., a statement that the plaintiff had slipped a bogus answer among the papers, the whole being signed by the defendant, with his official title. It was declared that if the alleged libel was a part of the defendant's return it was privileged, if it was material and pertinent, irrespective of motive, and that privilege would also be extended if the defendant, in fact, believed it in good faith to be pertinent and material, in which latter case evidence of actual malice would tend to show that the defendant did not believe the alleged libel to be pertinent and material.

A case not perhaps within the strict scope of this note, but closely related thereto, is Law v. Llewellyn [1906] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 487, 7 B. R. C. 234, 4 Ann. Cas. 431. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff had instituted proceedings for the prosecution of two other persons before the defendant, a justice of the peace, who, at the time of the speaking of words alleged to be defamatory, was sitting as chairman of the justices at a court of summary jurisdiction. On advice of counsel, the plaintiff agreed with the accused to withdraw the charge against them. The defendant, on granting leave to withdraw, spoke the words on the basis of which the plaintiff brought the present action. It was held that the defendant was bound to state why nothing could be done except to allow the charge to be withdrawn, and when, on giving such leave, he made the statements alleged to be libelous, the observations were to be considered as made in the course of judicial duty, and so were not actionable. It was said: "A magistrate is a 'judge' within the meaning of the rule that defamatory observations made by a judge in the course of his judicial duties, that is, when sitting as a judge, are not actionable, even though it is alleged or suggested that the observations were made without reasonable or probable cause, and maliciously."

The same rule has been applied to military tribunals. Thus in Jekyll v. Moore (1806) 6 Esp. 63, 2 Bos. & P. N. R. 341, 127 Eng. Reprint, 658, it appeared that the plaintiff had preferred certain charges against a brother officer of the same regiment, the charges being tried by a general court-martial. The defendant, the president of the court-martial, in formulating an opinion, for delivery to the judge advocate, acquitting the officer charged, included a statement to the effect that the plaintiff, in producing malicious and groundless accusations, had been guilty of conduct most highly injurious to the good of the service, whereupon the action for a libel was brought. It was held that the words complained of formed part of the judgment of acquittal, and so no action could be maintained on it; for if the charges were absolutely without foundation it was no offense for the president of the court to state that the charge was groundless and malicious.

So, in Home v. Bentinck (1820) 2 Brod. & B. 130, 129 Eng. Reprint, 907, 4 J. B. Moore, 563, 22 Revised Rep. 748, 8 Price, 225, 146 Eng. Reprint, 1185, the plaintiff, an officer in the Army, brought an action of libel against the defendant, the presiding officer of a court of inquiry which had been created at the direction of the Commander in Chief of the Army, for the purpose of obtaining information as to the conduct of the plaintiff. The libel complained of was alleged to be contained in the report filed with the Commander in Chief by the defendant in conjunction with the officers. The minutes of the court of inquiry were refused admission as evidence, to which the plaintiff objected. It was pointed out that the report made by the defendant was an act of duty, the result of an order from his superior commander, which he was bound to obey. It was declared that independently of the character of the court, these minutes constituting the report of the court of inquiry, on the broad rule of public policy and convenience, stood protected. Judgment for the defendant was affirmed.

Adam v. Ward [1917; H. L.] A. C. (Eng.) 309, 86 L. J. K. B. N. S. 849, 117 L. T. 34, 33 Times L. R. 277, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 249, although not within the scope of the note, is analogous to the two cases last set out. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff was an Army officer who, after having been removed from his regiment, was elected to Parliament, where he made an attack on a certain general. The general appealed to the Army Council for an inquiry, the result of which was widely published. The plaintiff alleged that this publication was libelous, and brought an action against the defendant, the secretary of the Army Council. It was held that the publication of the exoneration of the general was a duty incumbent on the Army Council, and that consequently the occasion was one that was protected by a qualified privilege, and that there was no proof of express malice which might rebut the privilege.

The doctrine has been applied to an official report of the receiver of a company. In Bottomley v. Brougham [1908] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 584, 77 L. J. K. B. N. S. 311, 99 L. T. N. S. 111, 24 Times L. R. 262, 52 Sol. Jo. 225, it appeared that the defendant was the official receiver of a company which was being wound up, and that in his report he made statements concerning the plaintiff, a managing director of the company, which the plaintiff alleged were libelous, and for the publication of which he brought suit. It was held that the report, which was to be considered as the judgment of a judicial officer on a matter intrusted to him for inquiry, was absolutely privileged. The fact that the report was made ex parte was said to make no difference.

Burr v. Smith [1909] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 306, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 889, 101 L. T. N. S. 194, 25 Times L. R. 542, 53 Sol. Jo. 502, 16 Manson, 210, involved a question somewhat similar to that in Bottomley v. Brougham (Eng.) supra.

In that case, wherein the defendants, who were official receivers, were sued for a libel alleged to have been contained in a report published by them, it was said that they were performing their duty as officers of the court in connection with what might be called a judicial inquiry, and that in the performance of such a duty they were protected by an absolute privilege. The libel complained of consisted of the distribution to those interested of a statement of a liquidating company's affairs. R. S.

J. B. COOPER et al., Appts.,

v.

STATE OF TEXAS.

Texas Court of Criminal Appeals — March 15, 1922.

(— Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 238 S. W. 658.)

Bail — forfeiture — variance — effect.

A judgment forfeiting the bail bond of J. B. Cooper, which is conditioned that Jim Cooper shall perform certain acts, is void for variance where there is nothing to show that J. B. and Jim Cooper are the same persons, although the bond is signed "J. B. Cooper."

[See note on this question beginning on page 411.]

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the County Court for Fannin County (Bolding, J.) in favor of the state in a proceeding to forfeit a bail bond. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Paul McMahon and Cunningham, McMahon, & Lipscomb, for appellants:

There being no averment that J. B. Cooper, the person named in scire facias as having been charged by information, is the same person as Jim Cooper, a bail bond requiring the personal appearance of Jim Cooper is not admissible on account of a variance.

Cassaday v. State, 4 Tex. App. 96.

The information was filed after the bond was taken, and therefore the bond is a nullity.

Baker v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 52, 111 S. W. 735; Leal v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 425, 102 S. W. 414; Watkins v. State, 16 Tex. App. 646.

Mr. R. G. Storey, Assistant Attorney General, for the State:

There was no variance between the scire facias and bond.

Barrett v. State, 68 Tex. Crim. Rep. 205, 151 S. W. 558.

Hawkins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal is by the sureties from judgment final on forfeited bail bond. The judgment nisi introduced in evidence is dated June 7, 1921, and has the heading "The State of Texas v. J. B. Cooper, No. 11,119," and recites that J. B. Cooper failed to appear; that it appeared to the court that J. B. Cooper and the sureties (naming them) had, on May 20, 1921, entered into bond in the sum of $250, conditioned that the principal should appear before the county court of Fannin county on June 6, 1921, to answer upon a charge by "information," accusing him of the offense of a misdemeanor, to wit, swindling. Then follows a judgment forfeiting the bond, and authorizing a recovery against J. B. Cooper and the named sureties.

The bond introduced in evidence is dated May 20, 1921, and provides that Jim Cooper as principal and the other parties as sureties are bound, etc. The condition in the bond is that Jim Cooper, as principal, stands charged by "complaint" in the county court of Fannin county with a misdemeanor, and provides, if said Jim Cooper shall appear on June 6, 1921, the obligation should be void. It is signed by J. B. Cooper, principal, and the other parties as sureties.

The writ of scire facias recites substantially that on May 20, 1921, prosecution No. 11,119, against J. B. Cooper, defendant, was pending, and bond was entered into conditioned that said defendant should appear and answer to charge by information for a misdemeanor, to wit, swindling; that J. B. Cooper failed to appear, whereupon forfeiture was taken on the bond, and judgment rendered against J. B. Cooper and the named sureties.

Neither the complaint nor information was introduced in evidence. It was perhaps not necessary to introduce them, under authority of Martin v. State, 16 Tex. App. 265. But their absence from the record obscures the facts, and involves the questions raised.

The point is made that the bond offered in evidence recites that Cooper was charged by complaint. That if no information had been filed when the bond was taken, the bond was a nullity. In the absence of the complaint and information this court is deprived of the true facts. The recitals in the bond and judgment are not in harmony, one reciting that Cooper was charged by "complaint," the other that he was charged by "information." Leal v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 425, 102 S. W. 414, and Baker v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 52, 111 S. W. 735, support the proposition that information must be filed in the county court before jurisdiction attaches, and, if bond be taken prior to filing information, it is without authority of law, and nonenforceable.

There is no finding in the judgment, or recital in the scire facias writ, that J. B. Cooper and Jim Cooper are the same person. When the judgment and bond were offered in evidence objection was made because of the variance. We have no means of knowing under what name the prosecution proceeded in the complaint and information, whether Jim Cooper or J. B.

Cooper. The variance—~~Bail—forfeiture—variance—effect.~~ in the name in the judgment nisi and the bail bond is fatal. See Cassaday v. State, 4 Tex. App. 96; Brown v. State, 28 Tex. App. 65, 11 S. W. 1022; Weaver v. State, 13 Tex. App. 191; Loving v. State, 9 Tex. App. 471; Uppenkamp v. State, 89 Tex. Crim. Rep. 131, 229 S. W. 544. As was said in the Uppenkamp Case, supra, the state was not without remedy in so far as the variance in name is concerned. If the dates of filing the complaint and information were before us, the other question suggested, as to whether the bond as taken before information filed, might not appear as a serious matter. However, as the record appears, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded.

ANNOTATION.

Variance between name in bail bond and in judgment of forfeiture.

While the question does not seem to have arisen in any other state, the holding of the reported case (COOPER

v. STATE, ante, 410) that a variance as to the name of the accused between a bail bond and the judgment of forfeiture entered thereon is fatal, in the absence of a finding of identity of person in the judgment, or an allegation thereof in the scire facias, finds support in several earlier Texas cases. Lowe v. State (1855) 15 Tex. 141 (bond signed "B. F. Low;" forfeiture against "Francis Lowe"); Cassaday v. State (1878) 4 Tex. App. 96 (bond signed "H. C. Fulton;" forfeiture against "Clay Fulton"); Weaver v. State (1882) 13 Tex. App. 191 (bond signed "W. F. Torlet;" forfeiture against "W. F. Torbett"); Brown v. State (1889) 28 Tex. App. 65, 11 S. W.

1022 (bond signed "J. B. Wilkins;" forfeiture against "J. B. Wilkin"); Uppenkamp v. State (1921) 89 Tex. Crim. Rep. 131, 229 S. W. 544 (bond signed "Joseph Uppenkamp;" judgment of forfeiture reciting failure of "Joe Uppenkamp" to appear). See also Fitzgerald v. State (1920) 88 Tex. Crim. Rep. 268, 225 S. W. 1096 (bond signed by principal and two sureties; forfeiture against principal and three sureties).

SECURITY SAVINGS BANK

v.

WALTER H. RHODES, Appt.

Nebraska Supreme Court—November 26, 1921.

(— Neb. —, 185 N. W. 421.)

Evidence — agreement that third person should pay note.

1. Where defendant signed and delivered a note to a bank, making it payable to the bank, and received the face value of the note in money, held, in an action to recover on the note by the bank, that the defendant could not show a contemporaneous oral agreement between himself, the bank, and a third party, that the defendant was not to be held responsible upon the note, and that the third party was to pay it.

[See note on this question beginning on page 421.]

Banks — authority of president — agreement not to enforce paper.

2. The president of a bank has no authority, springing from his official position, to make an agreement that the liability of a party on commercial paper payable to the bank shall never be enforced.

[See 3 R. C. L. 442; see also note in 1 A.L.R. 703.]

Evidence — contemporaneous parole agreement.

3. When a written contract has been unconditionally delivered in the sense that it is intended to take effect as a legal obligation, a contemporaneous oral agreement, providing that the contract is not to be performed if a certain condition or contingency occurs, cannot be shown, as such testimony would have the effect of adding to, varying, or contradicting the express terms contained in the writing.

Flansburg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by the plaintiff, Security Savings Bank, against the defendant, Walter H. Rhodes, upon a promissory note, signed by the defendant and payable to the plaintiff. The defendant answered, admitting the execution of the note, but alleged that it was orally agreed that another person, not named in the note, should be held responsible, and that defendant should not be required to pay it. The court held that the answer of the defendant was insufficient, and entered judgment on the pleadings. From this judgment the defendant appeals. The sole question is whether or not the answer, setting up such an agreement, pleads a legal defense.

The answer alleges that the defendant rendered certain services for the plaintiff bank and for one Davis, president of the plaintiff bank. What proportion of the services was rendered for the bank is not stated, but much the greater part appears to have been for Davis individually. In any event, it is alleged, Davis took it upon himself to pay the defendant what was owing him, some $2,700, and arranged that the defendant should make out and sign a note in that amount, payable to the bank, deliver to the bank and receive upon its face value. That was done. It is further alleged that Davis made an oral agreement with the defendant that the defendant would not be required to pay the note, but that Davis would pay it, and, in order to insure payment by Davis, Davis gave his note to the defendant in a like amount. It is further alleged that the bank knew of this oral agreement. The allegations of the answer in that respect are, however, somewhat indefinite. What other officers of the bank knew of the transaction is not alleged. It may have been that the pleader meant no more than a legal conclusion that the bank was charged with knowledge because of the knowledge of the facts by its president. It appears from the pleadings that the note became due and was not paid.

If the bank had no knowledge of the transaction, it of course would not be bound by the agreement made by its president, to the effect that a note, based upon a good consideration and taken by the bank, should not be paid. Kennedy v. Otoe County Nat. Bank, 7 Neb. 59, note in, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 501.

Assuming, however, that the allegations in the answer are allegations of ultimate facts, and are sufficient to show that the plaintiff bank had knowledge of the oral agreement, the question presented is whether or not such an oral agreement could properly be proved, or whether the testimony to that end would be incompetent as evidence tending to vary or contradict the express terms of the written instrument.

Although parol evidence may be admissible to show the consideration of a written contract when that consideration is expressed as a recital of a receipt, as distinguished from a complete contractual stipulation (Mattison v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 42 Neb. 545, 60 N. W. 925; S. Spiegel & Son v. Alpirn, — Neb. —, 185 N. W. 415); or to show a want or failure of consideration (Davis v. Sterns, 85 Neb. 121, 122 N. W. 672; Norman v. Waite, 30 Neb. 302, 46 N. W. 639); or to show that an instrument, purporting to be a written contract, is in fact a sham and was never intended as a contract between the parties (Coffman v.

Malone, 98 Neb. 819, 154 N. W. 726, note in L.R.A.1917B, 263); or to show that the written instrument was delivered upon an oral agreement that it should not take effect as a contract until some condition had happened (Musser v. Musser, 92 Neb. 387, 138 N. W. 599); yet, on the other hand, when a written contract has been unconditionally delivered in the sense that it is intended to take effect as a legal obligation, a contemporaneous oral agreement, providing that the contract is not to be performed if a certain condition or contingency should occur, cannot be shown, as such proof would have the effect of adding to, varying, or contradicting the express terms contained in the writing.

The rule is succinctly stated in 22 C. J. 1149, § 1540, as follows: "The rule excluding parol evidence has no place in any inquiry unless the court has before it some ascertained paper beyond question binding and of full effect, and hence parol evidence is admissible to show conditions relating to the delivery or taking effect of the instrument, as that it shall only become effective upon certain conditions or contingencies, for this is not an oral contradiction or variation of the written instrument, but goes to the very existence of the contract and tends to show that no valid and effective contract ever existed; but evidence is not admissible which conceding the existence and delivery of the contract or obligation, and that it was at one time effective, seeks to nullify, modify, or change the character of the obligation itself, by showing that it is to cease to be effective or is to have an effect different from that stated therein, upon certain conditions or contingencies, for this does vary or contradict the terms of the writing."

For an able and exhaustive discussion of that rule and the authorities in relation thereto, see note in L.R.A.1917C, 306.

In this case the written contract

Evidence—contemporaneous parol agreement.

Banks—authority of president—agreement not to enforce paper.

(— Neb. —, 185 N. W. 421.)

was an agreement that the defendant would pay on a fixed day, absolutely, a certain sum of money. Its express terms could have had no other meaning. The note was delivered to the bank, and the defendant received the proceeds thereof. The agreement did not lack in consideration. That it was a subsisting contract must be conceded. By the very agreement sought to be proved, Davis was to be responsible and pay it, and the defendant was to be relieved from that obligation. The bank was looking to the payment of the note. Evidence of such an oral

—agreement that third person should pay note.

agreement as is set up by the answer is inadmissible, as its effect would be to vary, by parol, the express terms of the note. Van Etten v. Howell, 40 Neb. 850, 59 N. W. 389; Aultman, M. & Co. v. Hawk, 4 Neb. (Unof.) 582, 95 N. W. 695; Nebraska Exposition Asso. v. Townley, 46 Neb. 893, 65 N. W. 1062; Western Mfg. Co. v. Rogers, 54 Neb. 456, 74 N. W. 849; Waddle v. Owen, 43 Neb. 489, 61 N. W. 731; Colvin v. Goff, 82 Or. 314, 161 Pac. 568, and note in L.R.A.1917C, 307; 22 C. J. 1152, § 1542.

The defendant finds some support in certain decisions of this court which we find it necessary to discuss. In the case of First Nat. Bank v. Burney, 91 Neb. 269, 136 N. W. 37, the defendant Britton signed a promissory note with one Burney, and, in an action upon the note, he set up as a defense an oral agreement that Burney was to pay the plaintiff all the proceeds of the sale of certain live stock; that, if Burney applied such proceeds upon the note, defendant's obligation was to then expire. Burney, however, did not so apply the proceeds of the sale and discharge the note, but, it was alleged, plaintiff allowed him to squander the money so received. It was not denied that the note had been signed and delivered, and was, in fact, a note and at least binding as such upon Burney. In our opinion the testimony of an oral agreement, to the effect that the note was to be paid out of a certain fund only, was an attempt to contradict, by parol, the express terms and clear legal import of the written instrument, and such testimony should have been excluded as incompetent. The original opinion in that case (First Nat. Bank v. Burney, 90 Neb. 432, 133 N. W. 647), as we view it, should be adhered to.

The case of Exchange Bank v. Clay Center State Bank, 91 Neb. 835, 137 N. W. 845, is also relied upon by the defendant. In that case, the plaintiff bank transferred a note to the defendant bank and indorsed it "without recourse." The defendant bank was allowed to prove a parol agreement to the effect that the plaintiff bank had agreed to guarantee payment of the note. There were other phases of the record which might have led to the decision rendered. The assignment of the note appears to have been a sham assignment, and merely for the purpose of falsifying the bank records at a time when a visit from the bank examiner was expected. There was also a letter which accompanied the note at the time it was sent to the defendant bank, and this letter contained an indefinite reference to some agreement which might have been sufficient to introduce an ambiguity and allow of the introduction of parol testimony in explanation thereof. But the decision was not based upon those grounds. The opinion recognizes the contract of the assignment of the note to the bank as a subsisting contract. By its express terms, the assignment was "without recourse," and the testimony to prove a parol contract of guaranty, in direct contradiction of the terms of the written assignment, should have been held incompetent. To that extent the decision in that case is overruled.

In that case reference is made to the decision in Norman v. Waite, 30 Neb. 302, 46 N. W. 639, as being a decision in support of the opinion, but the decision in the case of Norman v. Waite was based upon a failure of consideration. It was held competent to show what the consideration for the contract was, and that the contractual obligation assumed, which constituted such consideration, had not been performed by the other party.

The case of Barnett v. Pratt, 37 Neb. 349, 55 N. W. 1050, is also cited as authority in the Exchange Bank Case, but in that case the court pointed out that the written instrument involved was, on its face, not a complete contract, but merely a receipt or memorandum, and that the parol-evidence rule had no application. The court did in that case, by way of dictum, state that when the execution of a written agreement has been induced upon the faith of an oral stipulation, made at the time but omitted from the written instrument, though not by accident or mistake, parol evidence of the oral contract is admissible, although it may add to or contradict the terms of the written instrument. It is true that such is the rule in Pennsylvania, and a Pennsylvania case is cited in the opinion in support of the rule stated, but in Pennsylvania the so-called parol-evidence rule has been almost entirely abolished. The decisions in that state upon that point are not only in the minority, but seem to hold a unique position among the decisions of the courts of the other states in this country. See discussion in notes in 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 434, and L.R.A.1917C, 321. To follow the dictum in the case of Barnett v. Pratt, supra, would be to utterly destroy the parol-evidence rule.

In the case of Towner v. Lucas, 13 Gratt. 705, it was represented to the defendant that, if he would sign the bonds, he would never be required to pay any part of the debt. It was argued in that case that the oral representation was an inducement to the signing of the written contract. In answer to that argument, the court said (page 724): "If it be averred that, although a note is on its face payable on demand and unconditionally, there was a contemporaneous oral agreement that the time for payment should be postponed, or required only upon the happening of a certain contingency, parol evidence of such an agreement is inadmissible. . . . Yet it may be argued with the same force that this oral agreement may have induced the party to sign the note, and that it is a gross fraud to attempt to enforce it according to its terms. And so it would be if the existence of the agreement could be judicially established. But there being no legal proof of it, there is nothing of which fraud can be affirmed. The rule is founded in wisdom, and a different principle would weaken confidence in all securities for debts. Matters in writing, instead of finally importing the certain truth and agreement of the parties, would be a snare and delusion. The party relying on an instrument in writing as the final result in which all previous negotiations have centered would be met and 'controlled by an averment to be proved by the uncertain testimony of slippery memory,' "

We find a similarly reasoned decision by the Supreme Court of the United States in Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Mowry, 96 U. S. 544, 24 L. ed. 674. The court, in speaking with reference to such an oral representation, said on page 547 of 96 U. S.: "The doctrine of estoppel is applied with respect to representations of a party, to prevent their operating as a fraud upon one who has been led to rely upon them. They would have that effect if a party who, by his statements as to matters of fact, or as to his intended abandonment of existing rights, had designedly induced another to change his conduct or alter his condition in reliance upon them, could be permitted to deny the truth of his statements, or enforce his rights against his declared intention of abandonment. But the doctrine has no place for application when the statement relates to rights depending upon contracts yet to be made, to which the person complaining is to be a party. He has it in his power in such cases to guard in advance against any consequences of a subsequent change of intention and conduct by the person with whom he is dealing. For compliance with arrangements respecting future transactions, parties must provide by stipulations in their agreements when reduced to writing. The doctrine carried to the extent for which the assured contends in this case would subvert the salutary rule, that the written contract must prevail over previous verbal arrangements, and open the door to all the evils which that rule was intended to prevent."

For the reasons hereinbefore stated, the answer of the defendant, setting forth the oral agreement, was, in our opinion, insufficient to present a legal defense. The judgment of the lower court was correct, and is affirmed.

NOTE.

The admissibility of parol evidence to show that a bill or note was conditional or given for a special purpose is discussed in the annotation post, 421. When the evidence is admissible as showing a conditional delivery, and when it is inadmissible as violating the parol-evidence rule, is a question of difficulty. The court in SECURITY SAV. BANK v. RHODES (reported herewith, ante, 412) holds the evidence there involved to be of the latter character. Evidence held to be of this character in other cases is discussed in III. of the annotation, to which reference is above made.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Crook County (Duffy, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Sharpstein, Smith, & Sharpstein, N. G. Wallace, and Donald M. Graham, for appellant:

20 A.L.R.—27.

It was error to admit testimony aduced on cross-examination from plaintiff's witness, A. A. Piper, and received over his objection, as to a note received by Piper other than the one sued on.

Durkee v. Carr, 38 Or. 189, 63 Pac. 117.

Testimony of defendant as to certain matters was inadmissible.

Wilson v. Wilson, 26 Or. 251, 38 Pac. 185; 3 C. J. 823; 2 R. C. L. § 71.

Mr. M. R. Elliot also for appellant.

Mr. Jay H. Upton for respondent.

Bean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendant, rendered upon the verdict of a jury. The complaint is based upon a promissory note for the sum of $5,000, dated at Prineville, Oregon, April 18, 1918, due November 5, after date, payable to the order of A. A. Piper, in the usual form, signed by G. H. Russell, indorsed to Paxton Brothers, a corporation, May 15, 1918, and on the same date indorsed to Baker & Boyer National Bank, and on March 18, 1919, indorsed to plaintiff, Henry H. Vincent. Each indorsement is alleged to be for value received in due course of business.

Defendant answered, denying the allegations of the complaint, and further pleaded an entire want of consideration for the note; that the note was not intended for a promissory note, but merely as a memorandum of the money that would be payable to Piper & Paxton upon the completion of a certain sale contract, and therefore no stamp, tax, or internal revenue stamp was placed thereon or canceled, as required by law; that the note is irregular on its face; and that the holders thereof took the note subject to all defenses existing between defendant and the original payee. The answer set forth all the details of the transaction. The reply put in issue the new matter of the answer.

The circumstances relating to the note, as shown by the record, are substantially as follows: On March 5, 1918, defendant arranged with A. A. Piper and J. A. Paxton, of Walla Walla, Washington, to sell his ranch, live stock, and certain personal property for the sum of $276,900, for a commission of $5,000. Piper & Paxton represented that they had a buyer for the property, one Claud M. Stewart, and requested defendant to name a price of $286,900 to Stewart, and pay the added sum of $10,000 to Piper & Paxton as additional compensation. Stewart was to pay $40,000 as an initial payment, and $46,900 on November 1, 1918, and the balance on terms. Defendant was to pay Piper & Paxton the additional compensation of $10,000 upon payment to the defendant of the second instalment of $46,900, due on November 1, 1918, and not otherwise. The deal was made upon those terms. The first payment of $40,000 was made April 18, 1918, and the commission of $5,000 paid. Piper & Paxton asked of defendant an evidence in writing that they would be entitled to receive the additional $10,000 upon payment of the $46,900 due upon the purchase price November 1, 1918. Defendant agreed to give them such an instrument in writing, with the promise that no moneys would be due to Piper & Paxton unless Stewart paid the next instalment. Thereupon Piper drew up two promissory notes, each for the sum of $5,000 one of which is set out in the complaint. The notes were to mature November 5, 1918. Piper represented to the defendant that the notes would not be transferred, negotiated, or assigned, and would not become due or payable unless Claud M. Stewart made his next payment of $46,900 on November 1, 1918. Stewart failed to make the payment of $46,900, and abandoned the contract. J. A. Paxton is one of the stockholders and managing officers of the Paxton Brothers Company, and knew the circumstances in regard to the deal, and was interested therein. The indorsement to Baker & Boyer National Bank was made for collection, and the indorsement to Harry H. Vincent, plaintiff, was not made for value or in due course of business.

Upon the trial, defendant, Russell, testified in his own behalf in regard to the note sued on, in part as follows:

Q. Just tell the jury now Mr. Russell, what that note represents and the circumstances under which it was given.

A. This note was given for a half of $10,000 that was to be paid by me to Piper & Paxton on the 5th day of November, 1918, after Stewart Brothers paid me $46,900 and six months' interest.

Counsel for plaintiff moved to strike out this testimony, and saved an exception to the overruling of the motion. Russell further testified, over the objection of plaintiff, thus:

Q. Referring again, Mr. Russell, to this particular note and the circumstances under which it was executed, may I ask you this: Whether or not the money represented by this note was commissions to be paid to Piper & Paxton on this real estate deal, or did it represent some other item of consideration?

A. It represented some other consideration.

Q. Well, what was it?

A. That the money, this $10,000 came from Stewart Brothers; I merely handling this to get them their $10,000, so that it did not fall on Piper & Paxton at Walla Walla.

Q. That $10,000 as I understand, was money they were charging their clients for making this deal, and not taking it out of you?

A. Yes, sir; that is it.

Q. And you were to pay it in to them when the money was paid in through your hands on the deal?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that $10,000 ever paid you by Stewart Brothers?

A. No, sir.

Q. Was any part of the $46,900 ever paid you by Stewart Brothers?

A. No, sir.

Q. Or by Claud M. Stewart?

A. No, sir.

Russell also testified that, when Piper & Paxton brought the party over to buy the ranch, the first thing they told Russell was: "Now, we have this party, but don't you say anything about the price. You make that $286,000, and you can hold us out our $10,000. We don't want them to know it, and we don't want them to know your price."

Russell also stated: "Then, when Stewart threw up the ranch in November, Mr. Piper came down here, and I asked him, 'What are you going to do about this note?' right in front of Michel's store. He said, 'We will just let that go; you will not need to pay that note.'"

At the close of the case counsel for plaintiff requested the court to direct a verdict in favor of plaintiff, which was refused, and an exception reserved. The objections and motion to strike out the main portion of defendant's testimony, and the request for a verdict in favor of plaintiff, raise the question as to the right of defendant to make the defense offered to the note. The motion to strike was based upon the grounds that the note "is a direct promise to pay on its face without any contingency annexed whatever; it is not made payable upon the happening or nonhappening of any event, to happen in the future; it is payable on a specific date;" and any evidence that the note was only to be paid upon the contingency of Stewart paying Russell a certain sum of money was incompetent.

We think the testimony challenged was admissible. It tended to show that the note was manually delivered to Piper, the payee, but was not to become a binding obligation unless Stewart paid to Russell the $10,000, which was added to the price of the ranch, for the benefit of Paxton & Piper, and which Russell was only to handle for them. The testimony objected to also indicated that there was an entire want of consideration for the note. It is not

contended upon this appeal, as we understand the record, that the evidence fails to show that the plaintiff was not a holder in due course.

The rule sanctioned by a practically uniform line of authorities is that parol evidence is admissible to show that a negotiable note, absolute in form, although manually delivered to the payee, was not to become a binding obligation except upon the happening of a certain further event, since such evidence does not vary or alter the instrument, but tends merely to show that it never became a valid undertaking. Especially is this the rule if such event or contingency affects the consideration of the note. Section 713, subd. 2, and § 798, subd. 3, Or. L.; La Grande Nat. Bank v. Blum, 26 Or. 49, 37 Pac. 48; Colvin v. Goff, 82 Or. 314, 325, 161 Pac. 568, L.R.A. 1917C, 300, note, pp. 306, 309, et seq.; note in 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 288; McNight v. Parsons, 136 Iowa, 390, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 718, 125 Am. St. Rep. 265, 113 N. W. 858, 15 Ann. Cas. 665; Lavalleur v. Hahn, 152 Iowa, 649, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 24, 132 N. W. 877. The following cases support this rule:

It was held in Smith v. Dotterweich, 200 N. Y. 299, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 892, 93 N. E. 985, that parol evidence is admissible to show that a note given in payment of the premium on a life insurance policy was not to take effect as a valid and enforceable obligation unless the maker should be furnished with a loan of money.

In Holt v. Gordon, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 176 S. W. 902, it was ruled that parol evidence is admissible to show that, at the time the note was executed, it was agreed in parol that it should not become operative and binding unless the maker should succeed in procuring a loan upon certain land owned by him.

We find the rule again in the case of Equitable Trust Co. v. Halpert (Sup.) 132 N. Y. Supp. 776, that parol evidence is admissible in an action on a written instrument to show that the instrument would only be enforceable if the payee would issue a life insurance policy to the maker, entirely satisfactory to him; and this whether the instrument in question is a negotiable instrument or non-negotiable.

In Newgass v. Shulhof (Sup.) 128 N. Y. Supp. 664, parol evidence was held to be admissible to show that a note was delivered to the payee upon condition that it should not become effective unless the maker received a certain sum from a transaction then pending.

It was held in Stoughton v. Chu Fong (Sup.) 130 N. Y. Supp. 228, that an answer that the note sued upon would have no validity whatever until a certain institution was established, and that no such institution was ever established, pleads a condition precedent to the validity of the note, and a complete provable defense.

To the same effect is the case of Hughes v. Crooker, 148 N. C. 318, 128 Am. St. Rep. 606, 62 S. E. 429, holding parol evidence admissible to show that a note was signed upon the inducement that the payee would perform certain obligations, and that until the maker or his son should sign a paper signifying that the payee had performed his obligation the entire transaction was unfinished. The action in this case was by the maker against the payee, who had negotiated the note, which the maker had been compelled to pay, and was for the purpose of recovering the amount so paid by him.

It was held in Garrison v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. 159 N. C. 285, 74 S. E. 821, that parol evidence is admissible to show that a note secured by a mortgage was not to take effect until it was determined that an engine for which the note was given would pass a certain test. The action was brought to recover damages for the sale of the land under the mortgage.

See also Dan. Neg. Inst. 6th ed. § 81a; Gamble v. Riley, 39 Okla. 363, 135 Pac. 390; Street v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 188 S. W. 725; Ware v. Allen, 128 U. S. 590, 32 L. ed. 563, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 174.

We think the testimony complained of was properly admitted, and that the refusal to direct a verdict for plaintiff was correct.

It is contended by plaintiff that the testimony to which the motion was directed was of a different purport than the later testimony of Russell, which more fully explained the transaction. If this claim is correct, then it was a question for the jury to determine as to what Russell meant, or which portion of his testimony was true. His version of the affair should be taken all together.

Wilson v. Wilson, 26 Or. 251, 38 Pac. 185, is cited and relied upon by plaintiff in support of the motion to strike out a part of the testimony. That was a case in which the defense offered to the note involved unsettled partnership mining affairs, which it was held should have been settled in a suit in equity. The note there involved was given by one partner for money which had been advanced for the partnership business by the other partner, who retired from the partnership at the time the note was executed. The court, after discussing the partnership question, said: "So it would appear that an action at law is maintainable by one partner against another upon a promissory note executed by the one to the other, involving particular items or transactions of the partnership business, upon the ground that the giving of the note is an isolation or separation of the particular matter from the general partnership account, and that an accounting and final settlement of the partnership affairs is not necessarily involved in such action; that the execution of the note is such an acknowledgment of isolation or elimination of the particular transaction from the general partnership account as that the maker will be estopped at law from questioning the holder's right of action thereon."

That case differs from the one in hand. We find no error in the record.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

I. Introduction.

In the present annotation, it is the purpose to examine into the extent to which a bill or note that is admittedly delivered—at least manually—to the payee may be shown by evidence of a prior or contemporaneous oral agreement to be dependent upon a contingency. It is not the purpose to consider all oral agreements affecting bills and notes, but only such as make the note conditional. Oral agreements merely extending the time for payment to some future definite time, or to some event that is certain to happen, have not been generally considered. But where the agreement, although in form one of extension of time, is one which, in reality, may defeat the note altogether, the case is included. The line between these two classes is not altogether distinct, and some cases of the former class have been included. The same is true as to oral agreements that provide for a credit upon a note; cases dealing with such agreements have not been generally included herein. But see infra, III. b. Oral agreements that the instrument shall not be negotiated have not been included. Agreements to pay out of a certain fund have, in general, been excluded. The annotation is not concerned with the admissibility of evidence of an oral agreement among several makers of a note that one of them shall be relieved of liability, in an action between the makers themselves, for the purpose of adjusting their liability; nor is the admissibility of evidence of an oral agreement that the note was to be paid in instalments discussed. Parol evidence to show an agreement as to the capacity in which one who signs as "agent" or "trustee," etc., is to be bound, have, in general, been excluded.

In some jurisdictions, at least, a different rule prevails with reference to the admissibility of parol evidence of the character now under consideration, where a deed of real estate is involved, from that which prevails where a bill or note is involved. Holt

v. Gordon (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 176 S. W. 902. Accordingly, where a bill or note is given in a transaction in which a deed is also given, it sometimes becomes a question as to which of these rules is to be given effect. With this question the present note is not concerned. Nor is the case included if the rule applicable to deeds is decided to govern, since this note is confined to cases involving instruments for the payment of money. But if the rule applicable to bills and notes is held to govern, the case is included.

The situation covered in this note must be distinguished from that in which there has been a manual delivery to one other than the obligee, to hold until certain conditions have been met. This class of cases is illustrated by Cedar Rapids Nat. Bank v. Carlson (1912) 156 Iowa, 343, 136 N. W. 659, where a note was delivered to an agent upon condition that it was not to be delivered to the payee as a binding obligation until signed by a certain number of persons. It was claimed to have been secured by the payee without authority, and the parol evidence went to this effect. In Bartholomew v. Fell (1914) 92 Kan. 64, 139 Pac. 1016, involving a delivery to a third person, there is at least dicta to the effect that parol evidence is admissible to show a conditional delivery. One who signs a note as surety on the condition that the debtor execute a chattel mortgage to the payee, and that the note be not delivered to the payee until such mortgage has been executed, may show these facts by parol evidence in an action by the payee, if the payee had notice of the conditions at the time the note was delivered to him. Goutermont v. Bland (1917) 99 Kan. 431, 162 Pac. 270. In Niblock v. Sprague (1911) 200 N. Y. 390, 93 N. E. 1105, upon a settlement between partners, the retiring partner was to execute and deliver to a third person the notes which were the subject of the action, and which were to be held by the third person until the payment of the partnership debts by the other partner, when, at the maker's direction, the third person was to indorse and deliver them to the other partner. The parol proof, it will be seen, does not attempt to show a conditional delivery to the real obligee, although the notes were delivered to the payee therein named. It was claimed the partner to whom the amount was payable obtained the notes without the maker's knowledge or consent. In this connection delivery to an agent of the payee must be considered. In some cases the agent is regarded as acting independently of his principal, so that delivery may be made to him without constituting a delivery to the principal. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Barnes (1909) 133 Ky. 321, 117 S. W. 418, 19 Ann. Cas. 246. It is expressly stated in this case: "We do not hold that a delivery to one of the parties to hold pending the performance or fulfilment of the condition upon which it [the note] was to become effective would be valid as an escrow. . . . In holding the writings he was not acting as the agent of the company, but as the agent of the purchaser; and it was admissible to prove the agreement under which the papers were placed in the hands of the agent." Cases which take this view are excluded; but other cases of delivery to an agent of the payee treat it as delivery to the principal, and are included in the note.

The note is confined to cases between the original parties, or those with notice of the conditions.

The admissibility of parol evidence to vary or explain the contract implied from the regular indorsement of a bill or note is discussed in the annotation in 4 A.L.R. 764.

From the foregoing outline it appears that the annotation has to deal, within the limits mentioned, with the so-called "parol-evidence rule." This rule is generally regarded not as a rule of evidence, but as a rule of substantive law. By virtue of the rule all prior and contemporaneous oral agreements are merged in the written contract. Not all cases have considered it such, however. For example, in Hunt v. Adams (1811) 7 Mass. 518, the court, in denying the right of the maker of a note to show what was apparently a contemporaneous oral agreement, says: "The preference which the law gives to written evidence, when compared with parol testimony of parol agreements, is the unavoidable result of experience. It is impossible to expect or attain that certainty and exactness in the one form of evidence which is found in the other. When a contract has been stated in a writing assented to and signed by the parties concerned, and that continues in being, and under the control of the party relying upon it, evidence of the other parol agreements, to explain or vary the written contract, would be a rejection of that evidence which is necessarily the best." This theory of the Massachusetts court just quoted underlies a good many decisions applying the rule, notwithstanding the rule is recognized as one of substantive law.

The parol-evidence rule presupposes the existence of a written contract. One element of the existence of a written contract is delivery. The delivery of a written contract in practically every case rests in parol; there is no written evidence thereof. Hence, parol evidence is competent to prove delivery or the absence thereof. The evidence considered in this note does not go to the extent of showing that there was an entire absence of delivery; that is, not only that the paper writing did not pass out of the possession of the maker with his consent, but that he had no intention of giving the writing a legal and binding effect. One element of a delivery has taken place; it is admitted that the writing was intrusted to the custody of the payee therein named; the evidence over which the dispute arises is to the effect that it was not so intrusted with the intention of creating a legal obligation. In other words, it is sought to show by the evidence an absence of only one element of a delivery. A state of facts which is on the border line between these two situations appears in Sutton v. Griebel (1902) 118 Iowa, 78, 91 N. W. 825. In that case, an action upon a written instrument by which the defendant and others proposed to undertake to pay $100 each for shares in a certain stallion, the defendant was permitted to plead and prove that there was a collateral oral agreement between him and the plaintiff, at the time of signing the instrument, by which he was to be allowed to withdraw from the arrangement at any time before the final completion of the transaction involved, and that, at the time the signers met to complete the final arrangements, defendant did withdraw therefrom, notifying plaintiff and the other signers of the facts, and plaintiff secured another subscriber for defendant's share, as he had agreed to do. The court, in holding the evidence admissible, says: "Indeed, in the absence of any such collateral agreement, if, before the completion of the transaction contemplated, he notified plaintiff of his withdrawal, and such withdrawal was accepted by the substitution of another subscriber in his place, his liability would be discharged."

Some cases have taken the broad view that the instrument cannot be manually delivered to the payee therein named, to become effective only on condition. See infra, II. b. A good many of these are early cases. The great weight of authority at the present time undoubtedly supports the view that an instrument may be delivered to the payee to become effective only upon a condition. Undoubtedly in the application of this rule the evidence has been admitted in cases in which the oral agreement did not go to the delivery of the instrument, but merely to its obligation. Such cases, it is believed, rest upon an erroneous view of the law. As is true with any hard-and-fast rule of law, there is a disposition to avoid the application in the so-called "hard case," and it is believed that some of the cases of the class above mentioned have been instances of this kind. Parol evidence as it has been admitted to show conditional delivery is discussed in subd. II. hereof. Not all cases which admit evidence of prior and contemporaneous oral agreements base the admission upon a conditional delivery. Such evidence has been admitted on the theory of partial integration. See infra, IV. And see Lyons v. Stills (1896) 97 Tenn. 514, 37 S. W. 280, infra, II. a, 1. Others admit the evidence on the theory that the bill or note is thereby discharged. See subd. V. Others admit it on the theory that a failure of consideration is shown. And evidence of the character under consideration has been admitted in Pennsylvania under a theory discussed in subd. VI. infra. The decisions in this state are not harmonious, however, as may be seen by reference to this subdivision. Some cases have admitted evidence showing a delivery for a special purpose on the theory that this shows a conditional delivery, but this is clearly incorrect. See infra, VII.

II. Evidence to show conditional delivery.

a. Theory that evidence is admissible.

1. Introduction.

In determining the admissibility of parol evidence of the character under consideration in this subdivision, it is necessary to determine which of two well-settled rules of law shall govern. The rules referred to are the parol-evidence rule that parol evidence is inadmissible to vary or contradict the terms of a written instrument, and the rule that parol evidence is admissible to show absence of delivery of an instrument. In addition to the above-mentioned rules it is necessary to bear in mind that fact that the parol-evidence rule does not prevent evidence to show that the agreement sued upon is without consideration, or that the consideration has failed, provided the evidence does not in other respects vary the legal effect of the contract. 3 Jones, Ev. § 468.

It appears from the subsequent discussion that the admissibility of evidence of a prior or contemporaneous oral agreement going to the delivery of the instrument and making it conditional is well established. This rule has been applied to some cases in which the evidence does not clearly show an agreement affecting the delivery. In fact, the evidence is held admissible in some cases in which the agreement is stated to have been that the instrument was "to become void" or "was not to be paid" upon the happening of the contingency. While a statement that an instrument is "to become void" or that it "is not to be paid" upon a contingency implies that it is an existing obligation, it is not clear that the courts—except as hereinafter noted—so speaking of it, which hold the evidence admissible, regard the instrument as unconditionally delivered. In other words, when these courts speak of the agreement that the instrument shall "become void" or that it shall "not be paid" upon the happening of the contingency, they really have in mind a condition going to the delivery of the instrument,—a condition precedent rather than a condition subsequent, which defeats an instrument that has become a valid, existing obligation. An allegation "that it was distinctly understood and agreed by and between" the makers and payee of a note "that the said note was to be used by said Rice (payee) for the purpose of raising the necessary money to finance" a stock-purchasing transaction negatives the idea of a conditional delivery; such facts show an oral agreement affecting the manner in which the note was to be paid. Such agreement cannot be shown in evidence to modify the written promise contained in the note. Gwinn v. Ford (1915) 85 Wash. 571, 148 Pac. 891.

The use of the term "delivered" in a loose sense has caused some confusion on this question. The term has two meanings. First, it may mean a manual delivery,—that is, the mere physical act of handing the paper to the obligee. Second, it may mean this physical act accompanied with the intention of the obligor that it shall take effect as a valid legal obligation. Unless "delivery" in the latter sense is present, the instrument cannot (as between the parties or those with notice) have any binding effect. This assumes, of course, that both parties to the contract understand the intent. It is frequently stated in the cases that an instrument is executed and "delivered" under an agreement that it shall not become a valid and enforceable obligation except upon the happening of a contingency. The only sense in which the term "delivered" can possibly be used in such a statement without creating a plain contradiction is to mean the mere physical act of intrusting the instrument to the payee. If an instrument has been delivered in the sense that it is intended to take effect as a legal obligation, a valid legal relation is created thereby which cannot be varied or contradicted by parol evidence. It is, strictly speaking, inaccurate to characterize the condition with which this note deals as a "conditional delivery." There is in fact no delivery at all except the manual delivery. It is stated in the dissenting opinion of Ingraham, P. J., in Carpenter v. Maloney (1910) 138 App. Div. 190, 123 N. Y. Supp. 61, affirmed without opinion (1911) 203 N. Y. 571, 96 N. E. 1111, that a conditional delivery is "one by which the note was not to be regarded as delivered until the happening of a future event. But where the note was actually delivered, and to be a valid instrument until a future event should occur, when, upon a contingency, it should become void, there was not a conditional delivery." If, however, the term is properly understood, it is sufficiently accurate, and is used throughout this note.

There is no infallible test to determine when the evidence is admissible as showing a conditional delivery and when it falls within the prohibition of the parol-evidence rule. Various tests have been given and these are aids in determining the question. The evidence over which the dispute arises may be to the effect that the instrument was not intrusted to the payee with the intention of creating a legal obligation; that whether or not a legal obligation should be created depends upon a contingency; or it may be to the effect simply that the enforcement of the obligation is dependent upon the contingency. In the former case what is attempted to be shown by the evidence is that the written instrument never became a contract; in the latter case it is assumed that the instrument became a contract; the evidence is directed merely to the enforcement of the obligation of the contract. If the evidence is of the former class, that is, if it is to the effect that the instrument was intrusted to the payee with the intention that it should not create any legal relation, but that whether or not it should take effect as a valid and binding instrument is dependent upon a contingency, the evidence is admissible, and this whether or not it affects the consideration. If, on the other hand, the evidence is to the effect that the enforcement of the instrument as an obligation is dependent upon a contingency, the evidence is not admissible. But, as stated above, the instrument may still be defeated by showing a lack of consideration, or that the consideration has failed within the rule above stated. The distinction is well stated in Smith v. Dotterweich (1911) 200 N. Y. 299, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 892, 93 N. E. 985, as follows: "When the oral testimony goes directly to the question whether there is a written contract or not, it is always competent; but when the effect of the oral testimony is to establish the existence of a written contract which it is designed to contradict or change by parol, then the spoken word must yield to the written compact." The condition must be one that goes to the existence of the contract. If the evidence tends to prove that while the form of a written contract existed, no engagement was in fact ever concluded entitling the person claiming the benefit of the instrument to enforce its stipulation, the evidence is admissible; but if, on the other hand, there is no dispute but that a binding contract was made, which took effect when the instrument was delivered, and the dispute relates to what the agreement was, the evidence is not admissible. Naftzger v. Buser (1920) 106 Kan. 115, 186 Pac. 997. The supreme court of Michigan clearly recognizes the distinction between these two situations. That court admits as true the proposition that a promissory note, unconditional in terms, may be shown to have been conditionally delivered; that is to say, that it was placed in the hands of the payee, but with the distinct understanding that it was not to be operative or become a binding obligation until the happening of some event; but in that case, in which the offer of proof which was set out in a notice under the general issue stated that the notes were delivered to the payee upon the clear and distinct understanding and conditions agreed to by the plaintiff, that, upon a certain contingency, the notes should become and be null and of no effect, and were not to be paid, the court says: "We think it clear that the present case falls within that line of cases which precludes parol evidence offered to vary the terms of a written instrument. If we adopt the testimony of the defendant as correctly stating the transaction, and more certainly if we adopt the terms of the notice of defense by which the defendant was bound, these notes were delivered to take effect presently, but upon the alleged parol agreement that they were to become void in the event that a certain contingency should happen. This is no more than averring that plaintiff entered into a contemporaneous parol agreement that, while the defendant's obligation bound him to pay absolutely the sums of money at specified times, yet, in a certain contingency, this sum should not be payable at all, and the notes be redelivered." Central Sav. Bank v. O'Connor (1903) 132 Mich. 578, 102 Am. St. Rep. 433, 94 N. W. 11. The supreme court of Minnesota in Smith v. Mussetter (1894) 58 Minn. 159, 59 N. W. 995, has quite clearly distinguished between the two situations as follows: "The principal question on this appeal is whether the answer set up an agreement (shown by affidavit to have been oral) that the note sued on should become operative as a contract only on the happening of a future contingent event; or a parol condition not expressed in the instrument attached to the obligation of the contract. In other words, whether it means that the happening of the future contingent event was to be a condition precedent to the note becoming operative at all as a contract, or whether it means that the obligation on the contract was not absolute according to its terms, but only conditional."

The test whether it is a condition precedent or a condition subsequent is one that is applied in a number of jurisdictions. The admissibility of the parol evidence is stated to depend upon whether or not it shows a condition precedent. Ibid. Smith v. Dotterweich (1911) 200 N. Y. 299, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 892, 93 N. E. 985; Keller v. Prince (1912) 76 Misc. 522, 135 N. Y. Supp. 573; Ebling Brewing Co. v. Feldman (1909) 114 N. Y. Supp. 910; Newgass v. Shulhof (1911) 128 N. Y. Supp. 664; Stoughton v. Chu Fong (1911) 130 N. Y. Supp. 228; Equitable Trust Co. v. Halpert (1912) 132 N. Y. Supp. 776; Post v. Tamm (1916) 91 Wash. 504, 158 Pac. 91. The condition precedent must be a condition precedent to the instrument becoming a valid obligation, and not merely a condition precedent to the payment, to render the evidence admissible. If it is a condition subsequent to the going into effect of the instrument as a valid and legal obligation, parol evidence thereof is not admissible. Goddard v. Cutts (1834) 11 Me. 440; German Exch. Bank v. Schnitzer (1911) 72 Misc. 362, 130 N. Y. Supp. 223; Carnegie Trust Co. v. Kleybolte (1911) 74 Misc. 246, 134 N. Y. Supp. 69; Beecher v. Dunlap (1894) 52 Ohio St. 64, 38 N. E. 795; Post v. Tamm (1916) 91 Wash. 504, 158 Pac. 91. If the instrument has once become a valid and enforceable contract, parol evidence is not admissible. Smith v. Hedges (1915) 170 App. Div. 349, 155 N. Y. Supp. 934, affirmed in (1918) 222 N. Y. 701, 119 N. E. 1077. After stating that the notes were rendered effective and complete by an unconditional delivery, the court states that the plea was "that the payee was to release the maker and to cancel the note provided the contract was not completed when the note fell due,—a future contingency."

A slightly variant test appears in Moore v. Prussing (1897) 165 Ill. 319, 46 N. E. 184, where the court says: "While it may be shown by parol that the note was delivered conditionally, yet, where the facts averred show execution of the note, and its delivery for the consideration paid and received, an attempt to change the terms of the instrument by averring conditions in conflict with its terms is not a sufficient plea."

That it may be shown to have "ceased to be a contract" is, however, expressly stated in Burns & S. Lumber Co. v. Doyle (1899) 71 Conn. 742, 71 Am. St. Rep. 235, 43 Atl. 483. And the supreme court of Tennessee in Lyons v. Stills (1896) 97 Tenn. 514, 37 S. W. 280, in admitting evidence of an oral agreement that the maker of the note had the right, at any time he was dissatisfied within six months, to return the goods for the purchase price of which the note was given, clearly recognizes the existence of the instrument. According to the court, such an oral agreement does not contradict the note, but sets up an independent agreement, made at the same time, that, upon a contingency or condition, the note was to become void. In John Lucas & Co. v. Bradley (1917) 158 C. C. A. 649, 246 Fed. 693, the court says: "Undoubtedly the giving of a promissory note raises the presumption that the amount named in it is then owing by the maker to the payee. But this presumption is rebuttable, and there are many cases in which the maker may prove a collateral agreement or other facts which relieve him from liability. Such proof does not vary or contradict the written note, but shows independently that it is not a binding obligation." The parol evidence was admitted in part in Drovers' Cattle Loan & Invest. Co. v. McGraw (1921) — Minn. —, 184 N. W. 365, on the theory that it showed an independent agreement. See infra, IV.

Although the courts have not expressly made time a determinative element in reaching a conclusion as to the class to which the evidence belongs, it seems that in order that the evidence show a conditional delivery the matter must be determined within a relatively short time. For example, a note given by the applicant for life insurance upon the condition that it is not to be binding unless he is satisfied with the policy will, in a large majority of instances, at least be determined in a short time; at any rate, the matter is held in abeyance until the condition is determined, if there is a true conditional delivery. The defense pleaded in Beecher v. Dunlap (1894) 52 Ohio St. 64, 38 N. E. 795, brings the case clearly within facts showing a conditional delivery. The defense pleaded was as follows: "A parol agreement made at the execution and delivery of the note, that it was not to become operative unless a certain sum should be made from the manufacture and sale of a patent right for which the note was given." But from the testimony it appeared that the notes "were to be null and void" unless within a year the maker should be able to make a stated sum net from the manufacturer's sale of the patent rights. It is apparent from this evidence that the condition went merely to the obligation, although it was pleaded that the note was not to become operative. The extent to which the courts have gone in disregarding the time element, and the fact that the matter is held in abeyance until the contingency has been determined in the true conditional delivery, are illustrated by the facts in Ewell v. Turney (1905) 39 Wash. 615, 81 Pac. 1047, where, in the case of notes given to evidence the purchase price of mining property, the maker, in an action thereon, pleaded an agreement that the note should not become a note collectible against the defendant, or have any value at all, until the mining property became a shipper of ore, and that such property had not, as yet, become such a shipper. While the payee of the note was held entitled to a judgment thereon, this was upon the ground that the maker had failed to prove the conditional delivery, it being clearly recognized that the maker of a note may show a conditional delivery. There is, however, no discussion of the time element.

The principle that a conditional delivery may be shown is clear. But it is exceedingly difficult to determine from the evidence whether a situation is presented in which the intent of the parties went to the delivery of the instrument, making it conditional, or merely to its obligation. This is a difficulty that confronts the courts when it becomes necessary to decide upon the character of the evidence. In a case in which there was held to be a conditional delivery, the testimony of some witnesses was to the effect that it was stated "the note should be no good;" others, that "there would be no sale;" and still others, that "the note would be no good, or void." Hodge v. Smith (1906) 130 Wis. 326, 110 N. W. 192. An agreement to "refund" the note upon certain conditions was held not to create a conditional delivery, in Farmers' Bank v. Nichols (1910) 25 Okla. 547, 138 Am. St. Rep. 931, 106 Pac. 834, 21 Ann. Cas. 1160. There was no question, however, of parol evidence in this case, as the agreement to refund the note was in writing. A case which clearly illustrates the difficulty here encountered is that of Dulaney v. Burke (1890) 2 Idaho, 719, 23 Pac. 915, reversed in (1894) 153 U. S. 228, 38 L. ed. 698, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 816. In that case, according to the supreme court of Idaho, the payee of the note, in the negotiation leading up to its execution, offered to purchase a mining property, giving to the maker a one-half interest therein, the maker to execute to the payee his promissory note for one half the purchase price of said property. At the same time the payee agreed to give the maker an opportunity to examine and test the mining property, and if, after such examination, he did not desire to pay the note and receive his interest in the property, he might surrender the interest to the plaintiff, and, upon surrender of the interest, the payee would cancel defendant's note given therefor. This was by the supreme court of Idaho held to be an oral agreement, proof of which was prohibited by the parol-evidence rule, but the United States Supreme Court, upon an appeal, reached a different conclusion, and held that the evidence showed a conditional delivery, proof of which might be made, and this although, in the statement of the testimony upon the trial, the United States Supreme Court stated a case which seems to be a clearer case of a violation of the parol-evidence rule. According to the United States Supreme Court the following question was propounded to the defendant at the trial: "State whether or not, prior to your making the note, the plaintiff agreed with you that you could explore, work, and develop the mining claims mentioned in the answer, and if at any time before the maturity of the said note you should desire to do so, that he would relinquish said option of purchase,—that you could relinquish your said option of purchase, and that he, plaintiff, would cancel the note and accept the deed in full discharge of the note and the cancelation thereof." The offer of proof, however, makes the case more nearly one for the admission of the evidence than does the question which was propounded as shown above. The offer to prove was that, "at the time of the giving of the note and prior thereto, Dulaney, the payee of the note, agreed with Mr. Burke, the maker of the note, that the note should be given to represent the price of the interest that Mr. Burke was to have, conditioned upon his demanding it after an inspection of the mining property mentioned." And when the Supreme Court refers to the testimony in its own language it makes the case a clearer one for the admission of the testimony. It appears that the maker of the note worked the mining property from some time in September until the following March. This fact seems to indicate as well as the testimony that the condition was one going to the performance of the note, rather than to the delivery. The decision of the United States Supreme Court seems to mark an extreme limit in the admissibility of such evidence. The decision in Drovers' Cattle, Loan, & Invest. Co. v. McGraw (1921) — Minn. —, 184 N. W. 365, is another illustration of an extreme application of the rule of conditional delivery. In that case it was held competent for a purchaser of cattle, who had given her note for a balance due on the purchase price, to show an oral agreement that she should take the cattle to her farm, pasture them for the summer, and return them to the vendor in the fall, who was thereupon to sell them and apply the proceeds on the note, and pay the maker any overplus, if any there was, but the maker was not to be held liable for any deficiency; in other words, that the vendor was to look to the cattle for the payment of the note. The effect of this testimony was to show an intention by the parties, according to the court, that the note would become operative as a contract only in case the maker failed to live up to the terms of the contract in caring for and returning the cattle for sale in the fall, and applying the proceeds thereof in extinguishment of the contract. This decision, however, is based on other grounds in addition to the conditional delivery. See infra, IV., and also VII. c.

A very slight change in the form of the evidence or offer of proof frequently changes a case which shows a state of facts violative of the parol-evidence rule into one in which the evidence is clearly admissible as showing a conditional delivery. For example, in Meyer v. Beardsley (1863) 30 N. J. L. 236, the offer of proof of the acceptor of a draft was as follows: "The defendant agreed to and did accept the draft to be paid on condition that the defendant receive from the drawer" certain evidence as to the freedom from encumbrances of property given in security for the acceptance. This evidence was held inadmissible as a violation of the parol-evidence rule. It seems clear that if the offer of proof had been that the defendant accepted the draft and delivered it to the payee, to become a binding obligation upon the acceptor's receipt of the proof above mentioned, that the evidence would, according to the great majority of cases, at least, have been admissible. Yet, looking at this case, without reference to the form in which the offer of proof was put, it seems clear that the latter situation is the attitude of mind—the real intention—which the acceptor of the draft had when he accepted it; that is, although in forming his offer of proof, it was put as a case which looked like a condition subsequent rather than a condition precedent, in fact, the condition was one precedent rather than a condition subsequent.

Such evidence does not contradict the writing.

Evidence that the instrument was delivered conditionally does not contradict the writing within the meaning of the parol-evidence rule; that rule presupposes the existence of a valid contract. The evidence in question is for the purpose of showing that there is no valid contract between the parties, because there is no finality of utterance.

According to the court in McFarland v. Sikes (Conn.) supra, "a written contract must be in force as a binding obligation to make it subject to this rule [the parol-evidence rule]. Such a contract cannot become a binding obligation until it has been delivered. Its delivery may be absolute or conditional. If the latter, then it does not become a binding obligation until the condition upon which its delivery depends has been fulfilled. If the payee of a note has it in his possession, that fact would be prima facie evidence that it had been delivered; but it would be only prima facie evidence. The fact could be shown to be otherwise and by parol evidence. Such parol evidence does not contradict the note or seek to vary its terms. It merely goes to the point of its nondelivery. The note in its terms is precisely what both the maker and the payee intended it to be. No one desires to vary its terms or to contradict them."

It has been stated that "the delivery of an instrument is an essential element to complete the contract written thereon, and of necessity this essential element cannot appear on the face of the instrument." Norman v. McCarthy (Colo.) supra. As to the effect of recital of delivery, see Starr Piano Co. v. Edgar (1909) 31 Ohio C. C. 295, infra, II. a, 4.

According to Mehlin v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. (1899) 2 Ind. Terr. 396, 51 S. W. 1063, the delivery of an instrument is a fact which generally must be within the scope of parol proof alone, as the writing, in the nature of things, does not usually contain the evidence of its delivery.

Norman v. McCarthy, in which the general statement above was made, involved a conditional delivery. It is further stated that the apparent contract written on the instrument is not complete until the delivery thereof is or becomes unconditional. Under the Negotiable Instruments Law a presumption of delivery is stated to arise, but, as between the immediate parties, this presumption may be overcome by showing that the delivery was conditional; and when that is shown, the apparent contract written on the instrument is shown not to be a completed contract, but one which will be completed if the condition is fulfilled, and which cannot be completed if the condition becomes impossible of fulfillment. Again, it has been stated that such evidence merely postpones the legal operation of the instrument, and does not contradict the writing. Hughes v. Crooker (1908) 148 N. C. 318, 128 Am. St. Rep. 606, 62 S. E. 429.

In Cochran v. Burdick Bros. (1912) 7 Ala. App. 274, 61 So. 29, it is stated that the condition goes to the consideration of the instrument.

It must be remembered that this note is not concerned with the admissibility of the evidence as against bona fide holders, Necessity of pleading.

It has been held that such condition must be set up by proper plea; unless this is done, the evidence is not receivable if objected to as variant or irrelevant. Jefferson County Sav. Bank v. Compton (1915) 192 Ala. 16, 68 So. 261. See Hunter v. First Nat. Bank (1908) 172 Ind. 62, 87 N. E. 734, infra, II. a, 3. But such evidence has been held admissible where the defendant admits that he made and "delivered" his "writing," containing all the terms of the note set forth in the complaint, but in a separate defense sets forth that the instrument was made and delivered upon a condition precedent which has never been fulfilled, where the plaintiff failed to move for judgment on the pleadings, but went to trial fully apprised that the defendant intended to show that there was no delivery of any binding contract. Keller v. Prince (1912) 76 Misc. 522, 135 N. Y. Supp. 573. The court states that there is some force in the contention that the defense that a contract was delivered upon a condition precedent may be shown upon a general denial.

Without expressly deciding upon the necessity of pleading such conditional delivery, it has been held that where conditional delivery is pleaded, it may be shown by parol. Niblock v. Sprague (1911) 200 N. Y. 390, 93 N. E. 1105. The general question of the necessity of pleading the condition is not covered in this note.

2. General rules.

Evidence that the instrument was not to become a binding obligation.

The rule sustained by a practically uniform line of authorities is that parol evidence is admissible to show that a bill or note, absolute in form, although manually delivered to the payee, was not to become a binding obligation except upon the happening of a certain event.

No question seems to have been raised in Thompson v. Carter (1909) 6 Ga. App. 604, 65 S. E. 599, as to the admissibility of the evidence to show that a note given in payment of a horse was turned over to the vendor upon the express condition that it was not to become the property of the vendor as a note until the horse should be turned over to the vendee cured of a lameness with which it was afflicted. The Georgia courts have inclined toward the exclusion of such evidence. There are, however, cases in that jurisdiction which clearly recognized the admissibility. In addition to Thompson v. Carter, see Heitmann v. Commercial Bank (1909) 6 Ga. App. 584, 65 S. E. 590, infra, II. 3; Hartman Stock Farm v. Henley (1910) 8 Ga. App. 255, 68 S. E. 957, infra, II. 3.

That a delivery may be shown to be conditional was recognized in Foy v. Blackstone (1863) 31 Ill. 538, 83 Am. Dec. 246, but the evidence was rejected there because the action was by an assignee who was not shown to have had knowledge thereof. That a delivery may be conditional is clearly recognized in Moore v. Prussing (1897) 165 Ill. 319, 46 N. E. 184.

The rule is recognized also in McNight v. Parsons (1907) 136 Iowa, 390, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 718, 125 Am. St. Rep. 265, 113 N. W. 858, 15 Ann. Cas. 665; Lavalleur v. Hahn (1911) 152 Iowa, 649, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 24, 132 N. W. 877; Bartholomew v. Fell (1914) 92 Kan. 64, 139 Pac. 1016. The rule is again recognized in Goutermont v. Bland (1917) 99 Kan. 431, 162 Pac. 270, where a surety signed notes under an agreement that the principal debtor was to give the payee of the note the chattel mortgage on the printing plant for the purchase price of which the notes had been given as part payment, before the notes were to be delivered to the payee. The principal debtor notified the payee of this understanding and agreement before the notes were delivered to the payee, but they were actually delivered before the chattel mortgage was given; in fact, the chattel mortgage was not given. It thus appears that there was no delivery at all with the consent of the surety, who was seeking to introduce the evidence. It is recognized as being competent for the maker of a note to show by parol that the note was to become a binding agreement only on the happening of a certain contingency, in Ewell v. Turney (1905) 39 Wash. 615, 81 Pac. 1047, but it is held in that case that the proof must be reasonably certain to that end, and in that case there was held to be not even a preponderance of the evidence in favor of the showing of a conditional delivery. This rule is recognized in Ebling Brewing Co. v. Feldman (1909) 114 N. Y. Supp. 910, but the evidence received by the trial court was not limited to the proof of a condition precedent, and its admission was accordingly held error.

In addition to the above cases there are other cases which lend more or less support to the rule. In Ware v. Allen (1888) 128 U. S. 590, 32 L. ed. 563, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 174, it was held competent for the obligors on an instrument promising to pay money on certain conditions to show an oral agreement that it was to be of no effect unless, upon consultation with counsel, the maker should be assured that the transaction out of which it arose was lawful. A note signed by a surety may be delivered to the payee, to become effective as a binding obligation only when the principal maker has given security to the surety. Selma Sav. Bank v. Harlan (1914) 167 Iowa, 673, 149 N. W. 882. An accommodation indorser of a note may show that it was executed and delivered under an oral agreement that it was not to be delivered as a note indorsed by the defendant unless and until a certain security was given to the defendant, and that the plaintiff received the note from the principal maker with express notice and actual knowledge of the agreement and understanding. Ricketts v. Pendleton (1859) 14 Md. 320. In Catt v. Olivier (1900) 98 Va. 580, 36 S. E. 980, where notes were given as subscriptions in aid of an educational institution upon certain conditions to be performed by the institution, evidence to prove these facts was held admissible against the receiver in insolvency of the institution, in an action by creditors who had not relied upon the notes in giving credit. It is not altogether clear whether the note involved in Lipscomb v. Lipscomb (1889) 32 S. C. 243, 10 S. E. 929, was delivered to the payee or to a third person. The payee, however, obtained possession of the note and sued thereon, and in the action the defendant was permitted to show that there was an unsettled account between the parties, and that the note was given with the express understanding that it should remain in the hands of a third person, awaiting the settlement of the account.

In the early English case of Pym v. Campbell (1856) 6 El. & Bl. 370, 119 Eng. Reprint, 903, 25 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 277, 2 Jur. N. S. 641, 4 Week. Rep. 528, the right to prove by parol evidence that a contract for the purchase of an interest in a patent was delivered upon the condition that if a certain person approved of the invention, the writing should be an agreement, but if he did not approve, it should not be one, was sustained. Such evidence does not vary the terms of the agreement, but shows that there is not an agreement at all. In Bell v. Ingestre (1848) 12 Q. B. 317, 116 Eng. Reprint, 888, the court, in holding admissible in an action by the indorsee of bills of exchange against the acceptor evidence that the bills were accepted for the express purpose of retiring overdue bills, and on the express condition that such overdue bills should be returned to the acceptor by the next post, says that it is a singular sort of escrow, for the bills were delivered to the parties who, in the event of their performing a certain act, were to be benefited by them. According to Patten, Judge, it was not intended that the indorsee should take any interest until the old bills were returned. But see Adams v. Wordley (1836) 1 Mees. & W. 374, 150 Eng. Reprint, 479, 2 Gale, 29, 1 Tyrw. & G. 620, 5 L. J. Exch. N. S. 158.

Where a compromise agreement had been entered into between the vendor and vendee of goods, by virtue of which the vendor agreed to discontinue an action pending against the purchaser, and delivered goods which it had theretofore failed to deliver, and, in consideration thereof, the purchaser gave his note for the purchase price, the purchaser may, when sued on the note, show that the vendor had failed and refused to perform his agreement to discontinue the action and deliver the goods. Great Northern Moulding Co. v. Bonewur (1908) 128 App. Div. 831, 113 N. Y. Supp. 60. The consideration and conditions of delivery are always open to inquiry, according to the court.

Evidence that a note was delivered to show that the maker was willing to take shares in a company about to be formed, if it were formed, was evidently admitted in Eastman v. Shaw (1875) 65 N. Y. 522, but there is no discussion.

A great variety of facts are presented in the cases. The question has arisen in actions on notes given by applicants for insurance. It has been held competent for the applicant to show that the note was not to become a binding obligation unless he accepted the policy. Watkins v. Bowers (1876) 119 Mass. 383. The testimony in this case as to the oral agreements vary. According to some testimony the note "would not be binding" unless the maker decided to keep the policy. According to others the agent of the insurance company agreed that he "would give up the note." And in an action upon a note given upon an application for insurance, parol evidence has been held competent to prove that the agent represented that it was necessary to attach the note to the application to show the applicant's good faith, but that the note would not be binding upon him unless the policy, when it arrived, was satisfactory and he accepted it. Graham v. Remmel (1905) 76 Ark. 140, 88 S. W. 899, 6 Ann. Cas. 167. The maker of a note may show that it was left with the agent of the insurance company under an agreement that the maker was to look into the plan of the insurance, and, if satisfactory, the agent should forward the note to the company, and the policy should be issued. Mehlin v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. (1899) 2 Ind. Terr. 396, 51 S. W. 1063. In Equitable Trust Co. v. Halpert (1912) 132 N. Y. Supp. 776, parol evidence is held admissible in an action on a written instrument to show that the instrument would only be enforceable if the payee would issue a life insurance policy to the maker, entirely satisfactory to him; and this whether the instrument in question is a negotiable instrument or non-negotiable. It was held in Smith v. Dotterweich (1911) 200 N. Y. 299, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 892, 93 N. E. 985, that parol evidence is admissible to show that a note given in payment of the premium on a life insurance policy was not to take effect as a valid and enforceable obligation unless the maker should be furnished with a loan of money. The maker of a note issued for a premium on a life insurance policy may show that it was not to become a binding obligation except in the event that he was able to enter into a business arrangement, and that this arrangement had failed. Smith v. Musetter (1894) 58 Minn. 159, 59 N. W. 995. An oral agreement, proof of which was held admissible in Mendenhall v. Ulrich (1906) 94 Minn. 100, 101 N. W. 1057, was that the note given for the premium on an insurance policy was to be delivered to a bank by the agent; instead, the agent never left the note at the bank, but put it in circulation.

The maker of a note given in payment of an interest in a mine may show that the note was not to be delivered as an absolute obligation until he had investigated the mine, and determined to accept or reject the interest. Burke v. Dulaney (1893) 153 U. S. 228, 38 L. ed. 698, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 816.

Evidence is admissible in defense of an action by a receiver of an insolvent corporation to enforce a promissory note executed in his favor, that the note was delivered on condition that the stock of the corporation should be procured and delivered to the maker within a specified time. Beach v. Nevins (1908) 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 288, 89 C. C. A. 129, 162 Fed. 129.

A bill may be accepted and delivered to the payee on condition that it shall not be a binding obligation until the drawer has performed certain services for which the bill was given. Burns & S. Lumber Co. v. Doyle (1899) 71 Conn. 742, 71 Am. St. Rep. 235, 43 Atl. 483.

It is held in Equitable Mfg. Co. v. Hill-Atkinson Co. (1916) 17 Ga. App. 494, 87 S. E. 715, that parol evidence is admissible to show that a written contract was not to become a completed contract until certain prerequisites had been complied with.

The maker of a note may show that its delivery was conditional upon the sale of certain bonds by him. Hill v. Hall (1906) 191 Mass. 253, 77 N. E. 831.

The drawer of a draft which has been lost may, upon issuing a duplicate, issue it on the condition that he would not be held responsible in the future for any "back laches,"—that the new draft must take the place of the original. Benton v. Martin (1873) 52 N. Y. 570.

It is held in Rubel v. Honig (1917) 178 App. Div. 53, 164 N. Y. Supp. 219, that notes payable to infants, and delivered to their father, may be shown to have been delivered subject to an oral agreement between the father and the maker that the notes were not to take effect as obligations against the maker until the payment of a certain indebtedness from the firm of which the father was a member.

It is held in Newgass v. Shulhof (1911) 128 N. Y. Supp. 664, that parol evidence is admissible to show that a note was delivered to the payee upon condition that it should not become effective unless the maker received a certain sum from a transaction then pending.

In Stoughton v. Chu Fong (1911) 130 N. Y. Supp. 228, it is held that an answer that the note sued upon would have no validity whatever until a certain institution was established, and that no such institution was ever established, pleads a condition precedent to the validity of the note, and a complete provable defense.

In Equitable Trust Co. v. Howe (1911) 72 Misc. 46, 129 N. Y. Supp. 112, parol evidence is held admissible to show that a writing in the form of a letter, addressed to the general agent of a life insurance company, acknowledging receipt of policy, and authorizing and requesting the general agent to pay the amount of the first premium, and promising on the part of the writer of the letter to pay the general agent the amount so advanced, was delivered under an agreement that it was not to come into existence as a legal obligation unless the general agent paid the amount so requested.

In Hughes v. Crooker (1908) 148 N. C. 318, 128 Am. St. Rep. 606, 62 S. E. 429, parol evidence is held admissible to show that a note was signed upon the inducement that the payee would perform certain obligations, and that until the maker or his son should sign a paper signifying that the payee had performed his obligation, the entire transaction was unfinished. The action in this case was by the maker against the payee, who had negotiated the note, which the maker had been compelled to pay, and was for the purpose of recovering the amount so paid by him.

In Garrison v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. (1912) 159 N. C. 285, 74 S. E. 821, parol evidence is held admissible to show that a note secured by a mortgage was not to take effect until it was determined that an engine for which the note was given would pass a certain test. The action was brought to recover damages for the sale of the land under the mortgage.

This rule is approved in Gamble v. Riley (1913) 39 Okla. 363, 135 Pac. 390, in an action by the indorsee against the indorser of a promissory note, transferred in part payment of a subscription to stock. A written receipt, however, had been given in this case, containing a clause that "should said subscription be not approved and accepted, the amount paid as per this receipt will be returned."

The makers of a note may show an oral agreement that the note was to take effect as an unconditional binding obligation upon them only in the event of the failure of one of the makers to comply with his agreement to account for the proceeds of certain notes which he had for collection. LaGrande Nat. Bank v. Blum (1894) 26 Or. 49, 37 Pac. 48.

In Holt v. Gordon (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 176 S. W. 902, parol evidence is held admissible to show that, at the time the note was executed, it was agreed in parol that it should not become operative and binding unless the maker should succeed in procuring a loan upon certain land owned by him. But see Security L. Ins. Co. v. Allen (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 170 S. W. 131, infra.

In Street v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 188 S. W. 725, s. c. on 2d appeal (1919) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 216 S. W. 426, parol evidence is held admissible in an action by the maker of certain notes against the payee, to cancel the notes and mortgages given to secure them, to show that the notes were given in payment of certain machinery, and that the bargain was not to be consummated until after a certain trial of the machinery.

Sureties who executed a note with an insolvent debtor may show that the note was not to become effective or binding until the payee had extended a certain credit to the principal maker, and furnished him with goods for sale. Baines v. Kohler & Campbell (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 201 S. W. 735.

In an action of assumpsit upon a written instrument for the payment of money for the services of the payee as overseer, it is competent to prove by parol that after the writing was signed by the maker, and while she was in the act of delivering it to the payee, she said that unless the payee brought a recommendation from a certain named person, she could not employ him as overseer, and that this was assented to by the payee, and that no recommendation could be produced from the person in question. Corbin v. Sistrunk (1851) 19 Ala. 203.

Evidence that the instrument was to become void or to be returned.

Evidence that the instrument was to become void or was to be returned in a certain contingency does not so clearly show a conditional delivery as evidence of the class last above discussed. In many cases, however, the facts as a whole show a condition going to the delivery, and the evidence is held admissible. McFarland v. Sikes (1886) 54 Conn. 250, 1 Am. St. Rep. 111, 7 Atl. 408; Trumbull v. O'Hara (1898) 71 Conn. 172, 41 Atl. 546; Musser v. Musser (1912) 92 Neb. 387, 138 N. W. 599; Sweet v. Stevens (1863) 7 R. I. 375; Watson v. Rice (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 166 S. W. 106. But compare with cases discussed in III. b, considering very similar evidence.

In holding admissible, in an action upon promissory notes, evidence of an agreement that, if the maker complied with certain conditions, the payees were "to surrender to him said notes without requiring him to pay them," the ground of the admission is not clearly stated in Howell v. Ware (1909) 99 C. C. A. 318, 175 Fed. 742. In one part of the opinion it is stated that "this was not in conflict with the well-established rule that evidence preceding the final agreement of the parties will not be admitted, for the reason that all such matters were finally merged in the written instrument, which must be taken to express the conclusion reached, but was for the purpose of ascertaining the real intention of the parties, and not to alter the contract in any particular." Farther on it is stated that "the notes may have been executed with the understanding that their payment was to be conditioned on transactions to be completed after their delivery, and if so, then testimony tending to prove that agreement was not only pertinent but essential for the proper solution of the controversy. As we see the case, the most important fact to be found by the jury was whether or not the contract between these parties was intended by them to depend upon the conditions set out in the defendant's answer. The very life of the contract depended on this finding of fact, and such finding was for the jury, and not the court. If, when the notes were delivered, an understanding existed between the parties of the character mentioned, set forth in the answer, then the fulfilment of the conditions included in such understanding discharged the defendant's liability under said note."

A purchaser of land, who had given his vendor a note in consideration of a rescission of the contract, was allowed to introduce parol proof of a verbal agreement to surrender the note to the maker if he would secure a purchaser for the land at a specified price, on the theory that the legal effect of the verbal agreement was that, when the defendant performed his part of it, it was a payment of the note. Hagood v. Swords (1831) 18 S. C. L. (2 Bail.) 305.

A variety of facts are presented in these cases. The maker of a note may prove that upon a claim being made against him for an assault for an amount which he was unwilling to pay, and being without counsel, he asked to be allowed a few days to consider the matter, and offered to give his note for the amount of the claim, to be held by the plaintiff until then, and if he did not then appear, to be held by the plaintiff as a settlement for the injury, but if he should appear, to be returned to him to be canceled; and that thereupon the note in suit was executed and delivered. McFarland v. Sikes (Conn.) supra.

The maker of a note, when sued thereon, may show that it was executed and delivered to the plaintiff upon the condition that the defendant should take the horse for the purchase price of which the note was given, in his possession, and use him until he was satisfied that he was sound and all right in every way. If, after such usage, he should find said horse was not sound and all right, as represented and warranted by the plaintiff, the defendant should return the horse to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff should thereupon give up the note to the defendant. Trumbull v. O'Hara (1898) 71 Conn. 172, 41 Atl. 546.

One who is contemplating the purchase of a note of a third person, and who has given his check to the owner of the note, may show that the arrangement was conditioned upon the maker of the note accepting it as a set-off to a claim he had against the giver of the check, and that if he would not thus accept the note, the payee of the check was to return it, and take back his note. Sweet v. Stevens (1863) 7 R. I. 375.

In Musser v. Musser (1912) 92 Neb. 387, 138 N. W. 599, parol evidence is held admissible to show that a note was executed and delivered to the payee, to be held in trust by him until the maker should determine whether certain representations made by the payee were true; and, if they were not true, the note was to be returned to the maker.

One of a number of purchasers of a machine, who signed a series of notes for the purchase price, may show that the notes were executed and delivered upon the agreement that if the maker was not satisfied with the transaction when the first note matured, the payee would repay him what cash he had paid, and return his notes. Watson v. Rice (Tex.) supra. But see Security L. Ins. Co. v. Allen (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 170 S. W. 131, infra.

The contingency may be within the control of the payee. Thus, evidence is admissible in an action on a note given for bank stock, of an agreement that if the payee should elect not to sell within a stated time, the maker of the note would be released from his obligation on the note. Hawkins v. Johnson (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 181 S. W. 563. It will be noted that the parol evidence went to the consideration of the note, and it is held admissible on this ground also.

Evidence that the instrument was to be paid only in a certain contingency.

Evidence that the instrument was to be paid only in a certain contingency shows a conditional delivery less clearly than either of the preceding forms of evidence. In some cases, however, in which the condition is stated to go to the payment merely, it is held that parol evidence is admissible to show that a bill or note, regular in form, was to be paid only upon the happening of a certain event, or that it was not "to be paid" except upon the happening of the contingency. Fidelity Title Guaranty Co. v. Ruby (1914) 16 Ariz. 75, 141 Pac. 117; Farrington v. McNeill (1917) 174 N. C. 420, 93 S. E. 957; Adams v. Thurmond (1915) 48 Okla. 189, 149 Pac. 1141; Hamilton v. Hannus (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 185 S. W. 938; Miller v. Murphy (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 206 S. W. 968; Martineau v. Hanson (1916) 47 Utah, 549, 155 Pac. 432.

In Breeden v. Grigg (1874) 8 Baxt. (Tenn.) 163, the executors of an insolvent estate who had given a note to a creditor of the estate for a part of his claim, upon which he had obtained judgment against them, were allowed to enjoin the judgment upon proof of an oral agreement that the creditor should hold the note, and not sue on it until it should be ascertained what was due him on a final settlement of the insolvent estate; then if the full amount of the note should not be due him, it was to be abated. The court says: "It is alleged that the note was signed and delivered, but to be binding only conditionally; and hence the legal effect of the allegation is that the note was held by Grigg as an escrow, and that, in violation of the contract under which he held it, he was seeking to enforce it before the condition on which the vitality depended had been complied with. In such case it is only by parol proof that the real character of the transaction can be developed." Compare with cases discussed in III. b.

A variety of facts have been presented under the form of evidence. Parol testimony is admissible in an action on a note given by a vendor for commissions for the sale of real estate, that the note was not to be paid unless the purchaser of the real estate paid a note which he had given to evidence a part of the purchase price. Martineau v. Hanson (Utah) supra. Such evidence was regarded as admissible in Hamilton v. Hannus (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 185 S. W. 938, a similar case, but the chief dispute in that case was as to other evidence.

In Fidelity Title Guaranty Co. v. Ruby (Ariz.) supra, parol evidence of an agreement that the note in suit was not to be paid until the note of a third person should be paid to the maker is held admissible. The plea stated that the note sued on "was given by this defendant to . . . with the express understanding that the said sum of $300 expressed in said instrument would not be collectible from defendant until defendant collected the $681 from said Gordon on his note." The court states that the answer under consideration and the evidence "shows that there never was any complete final delivery of the writing as the promissory note of the maker . . . payable at all events and according to its terms, for the reason it was made as a mere memorandum of the balance [the payee] was entitled to receive when the Gordon note was paid to [the maker], and was delivered as such with the understanding of the parties that it should be payable when the Gordon note was paid, and in no other event."

In Farington v. McNeill (1917) 174 N. C. 420, 93 S. E. 957, the maker of a note was held entitled to show an oral agreement that he should pay the note only in the event that a certain person, recovered certain lands against which there were adverse claims; the court stating that the evidence was competent to show that the note sued upon was executed upon the condition of a contingency as to its payment. This decision is based in part, also, upon the theory of the partial integration,—a theory upon which a majority of the North Carolina cases are based. See infra, IV.

In Adams v. Thurmond (1915) 48 Okla. 189, 149 Pac. 1141, parol evidence is held admissible to show that a note was delivered to the payee upon a condition that it was not to be paid until the title to certain land for which it was given was settled in favor of the payee, and the makers of the note put in possession thereof as purchasers.

A purchaser of corporate stock who has given a note for the purchase price may show a contemporaneous parol agreement to the effect that if the corporation should afterwards prove to be insolvent, the payees of the note would cancel it and never demand payment thereof. Miller v. Murphy (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 206 S. W. 968. After alleging the parol agreement as above stated, the defendant in this case further alleged "that the corporation did thereafter prove to be insolvent, and therefore the note sued upon never became a legal and binding obligation upon the maker. See Roberts v. Greig (1900) 15 Colo. App. 378, 62 Pac. 574, infra, "Paid in a certain manner."

The correctness of these decisions is very doubtful. As stated in the introduction, it seems evident that the courts treat the condition as one going to the existence of the contract. In some cases a condition that the instrument shall not be paid unless a certain event happens is construed as, in effect, an agreement operating as a suspension of the instrument until the contingency occurs. Standard Bank v. Wettlaufer (1915) 33 Ont. L. Rep. 441, 8 Ont. Week. N. 187, 23 D. L. R. 507, holding parol evidence admissible in an action upon a bill of exchange against the acceptors thereof, to show that the bill was accepted upon the condition that the defendant "should not be liable for and would not pay the bill at maturity unless at that date it was found that the defendants were indebted" to the drawers of the bill for the amount thereof; the court stating that the agreement "operated as a suspension of the bill until it was ascertained that there was an indebtedness at the end of the term mentioned in the bill."

Some cases clearly recognized the existence of the note as a valid obligation, but admit evidence of an oral agreement that it is to become void. The purchaser of a pony, who has given his note for the purchase price, may show an oral agreement that he took the pony only on "probation" for six months, and if, at any time before that, he was dissatisfied, he had the right to rescind the trade and deliver up the pony. Such an agreement, according to the court, does not contradict the note, but sets up an independent agreement made at the same time that, upon a contingency or condition, the note was to become void. Lyons v. Stills (1896) 97 Tenn. 514, 37 S. W. 280. Compare with cases discussed in III. b.

Paid in certain manner.

In a few cases the evidence has been held admissible where the agreement was that the instrument was to be paid in a certain manner. Roberts

v. Greig (1900) 15 Colo. App. 378, 62 Pac. 574, holding parol evidence admissible to show that the note on which the action was brought was executed and delivered on condition that it should be paid from the proceeds of a mill, and if there were no earnings, the note was to be returned and destroyed. It is held in George v. Williams (1915) 27 Colo. App. 400, 149 Pac. 837, that the maker of the note on which the action was brought, given to a trading company, might show that the note was given on condition that it should be paid out of the stock and patronage dividends thereafter to accrue, and that the maker should not be required to pay any cash thereon. It is expressly stated by the court that the instrument was strictly a negotiable promissory note, although it contained a recital that it was given for stock in the trading company, and there was a further recital that all dividends accruing to the maker on the stock should be applied to the payment of the note. The rule admitting parol evidence that an instrument was delivered upon condition has been held applicable where the condition was that it was to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of certain stock, and no other payment was to be made; in other words, that there was to be no personal liability on the note. Carpenter v. Maloney (1910) 138 App. Div. 190, 123 N. Y. Supp. 61. The notes in suit were made by the maker to his own order and indorsed by the defendant. They were delivered to the maker upon condition that they were to remain in his possession and control, to be paid solely out of the proceeds of the sale of the stock above mentioned, and that the indorser was in no event to be held personally liable for their payment. In violation of this agreement they were indorsed to a third party, not a bona fide holder. From this conclusion there is a strong dissenting opinion which seems more in accord with the correct rules. The judgment of the majority, however, is affirmed by the court of appeals (1911) 203 N. Y. 571, 96 N. E. 1111. Parol evidence has been held admissible in an action by one other than a bona fide holder on a note given in payment of stock, to show an agreement that it was to be carried and renewed by the payee for a stated time, and if, at the end of that time, the stock had not realized enough to pay the purchase price, and the maker of the note did not want the stock, the payee would take it off his hands and cancel the note. Paulson v. Boyd (1908) 137 Wis. 241, 118 N. W. 841. But the court concludes: "That it was not intended and agreed by them that the note should be a present binding agreement, but that it was delivered to" the payee upon the condition that if the maker paid interest on the sum for the stated time, the payee was to renew the note as agreed; and if, at the expiration of that time, the maker did not want the stock, the agreement to purchase was to be terminated at the maker's election and the note canceled. This, however, seems to be an erroneous view of the effect of the evidence; for, as pointed out in the dissenting opinion, the proof of delivery was not only not overcome, but there was affirmative proof of delivery of the note as a note, and that it was to be in force and effect as such. A failure to construe the evidence correctly seems to be what led to the conclusion in these cases, for none of these cases deny, in fact, they affirm, that the condition must be one that goes to the existence of the contract. As evidence that an instrument is to be paid in a certain manner, from its natural import, suggests a conditional obligation rather than a conditional delivery, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that these courts first determined to admit the evidence and then assigned it the character necessary to harmonize the decision with the undisputed rule of law. Compare with cases discussed in III. b.

Conditional delivery created by custom.

Parol evidence has been admitted where the conditional delivery was created by custom, but there seems to have been no dispute over the admissibility of the evidence. Citizens State Bank v. Garceau (1912) 22 N. D.

576, 134 N. W. 882. The note involved in this case was given by an applicant for life insurance upon signing the application. It was a business method of the company and of the agent to return the note to the applicant if he failed to pass the medical examination. Under these circumstances there was held to be a conditional delivery of the note, rendering it ineffective in case of the rejection of the applicant, although nothing was said regarding the return of the note. It appears from the report that the dispute in this case did not arise over the admissibility of the parol evidence, but as to whether the fact showed a conditional delivery.

3. Condition that others sign.

The rule that parol evidence is admissible to show a conditional delivery is frequently applied to show a condition that other signers were to be obtained to the instrument. The makers of a note may, when sued thereon, show by parol that the note was signed not as a completed contract, but subject to the condition that the note was to become binding only when signed by another or all of a number of designated persons, and that none should be bound unless all of those whom it was agreed should sign the note did in fact sign it.

In Hodge v. Smith (1907) 130 Wis. 326, 110 N. W. 192, parol evidence was held admissible in an action on a note signed by a number of persons to show that it was not to become a binding obligation until signed by all of a certain specified number of persons.

In Zimbelman v. Finnegan (1909) 141 Iowa, 358, 118 N. W. 312, where the court had instructed the jury in accord with the text above, it was claimed to be error to omit to state that if the parties "understood" the note was not to become binding upon defendant until others signed, it would not be a valid obligation. The court states there is no merit in this position; that if there was an understanding, it must have been based upon an agreement of the parties, and if there was an understanding by either, not based upon an agreement, it would not be binding upon the other.

Indorsers of a note may show that it was delivered to the payee on condition that others sign it before it should become legally effective. Caudle v. Ford (1903) 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1764, 72 S. W. 270; Seattle Nat. Bank v. Becker (1913) 74 Wash. 431, 133 Pac. 613. Heitmann v. Commercial Bank (1909) 6 Ga. App. 584, 65 S. E. 590. The circumstances in this case were peculiar. A note had been given, signed by thirteen indorsers; this note was renewed from time to time and without the knowledge of those signing it; three of the indorsers did not sign the renewals. Upon the discovery of this, the indorsers who had signed agreed to indorse another renewal note, and wrote the payee a letter, stating: "We have been unable to get all the old indorsers to indorse a new paper, and we therefore request you to accept the note indorsed by us and inclosed herewith, in payment of the old notes, and turn over the same to us so that we can bring suit to determine the liability of all the indorsers thereon." In a suit on the note thus given in renewal, parol evidence was held admissible to show that the instrument was delivered upon condition that all the ten indorsers should sign. It being shown that one of the ten had not signed, the instrument was held ineffective.

The surety on a note may show that it was delivered to the payee on the condition that other sureties should be obtained. Westman v. Krumweide (1883) 30 Minn. 313, 15 N. W. 255; Goff v. Bankston (1858) 35 Miss. 518; Majors v. McNeilly (1872) 7 Heisk. (Tenn.) 294 (note under seal); Alexander v. Wilkes (1883) 11 Lea (Tenn.) 221 (note under seal).

The sureties on a note absolute in form may, under the plea of non est factum, show that it was not to be delivered and become a binding obligation until signed by others. Hunter v. First Nat. Bank (1908) 172 Ind. 62, 87 N. E. 734. On the ground that the plea in this case was a plea non est factum, this case is distinguished from the earlier Indiana case of Clanin v. Easterly Harvesting Mach. Co. (1889) 118 Ind. 372, 3 L.R.A. 863, 21 N. E. 35.

The court in Westman v. Krumweide (Minn.) supra, states the rule generally as to all contracts, and limits it to those not under seal. The notes involved in this case were payable in chattels. In Goff v. Bankston (1858) 35 Miss. 518, the rule was applied in case of a sealed note.

See Ex parte Goldberg & Lewis (Ala.) infra, II. a, 4.

A guarantor of a bill or note may prove that it was delivered on the condition that it was not to be an obligation until signed by other guarantors. Belleville Sav. Bank v. Bornman (1888) 124 Ill. 200, 16 N. E. 210; Merchants' Exch. Bank v. Luckow (1887) 37 Minn. 542, 35 N. W. 434.

And it has been held that the signers of a bond conditioned to save the obligee harmless on a certain liability may show that it was not to be binding unless signed by certain other designated persons. Francis v. Cor- nelius (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 173 S. W. 947.

The condition must go to the existence of the contract; i. e., it must be to the effect that the instrument was never delivered as the final embodiment of the agreement between the parties. Heitmann v. Commercial Bank (1909) 6 Ga. App. 584, 65 S. E. 590; Pidcock v. Crouch (1910) 7 Ga. App. 299, 66 S. E. 971; Hartman Stock Farm v. Henley (1910) 8 Ga. App. 255, 68 S. E. 957.

Parol evidence is incompetent to show that the instrument was delivered to the payee as a completed contract, but upon a promise on his part to secure the signature of another thereto. Pidcock v. Crouch (1910) 7 Ga. App. 299, 66 S. E. 971.

In a case involving a surety, it has been stated that the condition that others shall sign as sureties involves the consideration for the note. Hunter v. First Nat. Bank (1909) 172 Ind. 62, 87 N. E. 734. The delivery to the payee upon such a condition is sometimes spoken of as a delivery in escrow. Ibid. It does not appear, however, that there was any formal escrow agreement.

Other cases deny that it is admissible to show an oral agreement that a note delivered to the payee was to become an obligation only when signed by another. Massmann v. Holscher (1871) 49 Mo. 87; Hurt v. Ford (1898) 142 Mo. 283, 41 L.R.A. 823, 44 S. W. 228. An answer to an action on a note, that it was to be signed by another as the joint obligor with the defendant, was held not to affect the defendant's liability where the answer admitted by implication the execution, including the delivery of the note by the defendant. The court says that the fact that the other party did not sign it does not destroy the effect of the execution and delivery of the note by the defendant. Parks v. Zeek (1876) 53 Ind. 221. It is stated in Clanin v. Esterly Harvester Mach. Co. (1889) 118 Ind. 372, 3 L.R.A. 863, 21 N. E. 35, that while it is competent to prove under proper issues that the note never was delivered, evidence is not admissible to prove that it was delivered to the payee, who had parted with the consideration, as an escrow, or under an arrangement that the maker was not to be bound according to the terms of the note. It was therefore held not admissible to aver and prove that the payee agreed, when he received the note, that he would procure another person to sign it, and that it was not to become binding on the maker until it was so signed. But in Wright v. Cohn (1918) 68 Ind. App. 589, 121 N. E. 3, where a note was signed at the request of the president of a bank, as surety for such president, with an agreement and understanding between the president and the surety that it should not become a binding obligation until the same was executed by the president as principal obligor, evidence as to what was said in the transaction was held proper, and not subject to the objection that it sought to explain or vary the terms of a written contract. It is held in Hubble v. Murphy (1864) 1 Duv. (Ky.) 278, that neither an agreement that the note should not be obligatory on a surety unless the signature of another surety should be secured, nor a delivery of the note to the payee, on the condition that it should not be obligatory on the surety unless the said signature should be procured, is a defense in an action on the note, since, being in parol, it is contradictory of the writing, and cannot destroy the obligation of the writing.

It is held in Levy & C. Mule Co. v. Kauffman (1902) 52 C. C. A. 126, 114 Fed. 170, that the accommodation acceptor of a draft cannot, when sued on his acceptance, defeat liability by showing an oral agreement to advance the money evidenced by the draft on condition that another person advance a similar sum for the benefit of the accommodated party.

4. Under Negotiable Instruments Act.

That a bill or note may be shown to have been delivered upon condition is settled in the Negotiable Instruments Law. This act provides that "as between immediate parties, and as regards a remote party other than a holder in due course, the delivery, in order to be effectual, must be made either by or under the authority of the party making, drawing, accepting, or indorsing, as the case may be; and in such case the delivery may be shown to have been conditional, or for a special purpose only, and not for the purpose of transferring the property in the instrument." It is accordingly held that parol evidence is admissible to show that a bill or note, regular in form, was manually delivered to the payee upon the condition that it was to become an enforceable obligation only upon the happening of a certain event.

Ohio.—Starr Piano Co. v. Edgar (1909) 31 Ohio C. C. 295 (this was held in this case notwithstanding the note was secured by a chattel mortgage which in effect declared that the note had been delivered, the court stating that the chattel mortgage is only an incident of the debt, and, regardless of its terms, can be held to be nothing more, and if the debt fails the mortgage fails also); Shive v. Merville (1913) 34 Ohio C. C. 193 (holding parol evidence admissible to show that the note was delivered to the payee upon condition that it should be paid if certain stock should prove assessable, and should be returned if the stock should prove non-assessable).

See Divine v. Western Slope Fruit Growers Asso. (1915) 27 Colo. App. 368, 149 Pac. 841, infra, VII. c.

This rule has been applied under a variety of facts and circumstances. In Sayre v. Leonard (1914) 57 Colo. 116, 140 Pac. 196, it is held that a note given by one partner to his transferee might be shown to have been upon the condition that it was to become obligatory only in the event that a silent partner of the maker repudiated a transfer of their holdings which the maker had made to the payee of the note. In Selma Sav. Bank v. Harlan (1914) 167 Iowa, 673, 149 N. W. 882, it is held that parol evidence that a note was delivered to a bank by a surety on condition that it was not to become a binding obligation unless the principal debtor acknowledged an assignment and executed a note to the surety—was admissible. In Waukeev Sav. Bank v. Jones (1917) 179 Iowa, 261, 159 N. W. 691, it was held that parol evidence that a note delivered to a vendor was delivered upon condition that the vendee was to have until a specified date to determine whether or not the transfer of the note should be absolute—was admissible. In Herron v. Brinton (1920) 188 Iowa, 60, 175 N. W. 831, it was held competent for the defendant to prove, in an action on a note, that the payee of the note had advanced the money called for therein to the maker under an agreement that the maker was to pay interest on the sum so advanced so long as the payee should live, and such payment of interest should be in full discharge of the obligation imposed upon the maker by the acceptance of the money. Such an agreement is held to be admissible in evidence under the provisions of the Negotiable Instruments Act, permitting the showing of a conditional delivery. It was held in Mason v. Cater (1921) — Iowa, —, 182 N. W. 179, that the execution and delivery of a note may be shown to have been made upon the express condition that the land conveyed to the maker was to be placed upon the market for sale, and, if sold to a purchaser acceptable to the payee, who would agree to pay the indebtedness evidenced by the note, then the maker of the note would not be liable for any other sum than the interest upon said note to the date of sale.

Where, in the organization of a corporation, it was agreed that one person was to subscribe and pay for a certain amount of the capital stock of the corporation, one half of which was to be issued in the name of another person, who was to manage and conduct the business affairs of the corporation under an agreement that the first person was to be repaid the amount he had advanced for the stock issued to the latter out of the first profits derived from the business of the corporation, and not otherwise, and a note was made and delivered to the first person as evidence of the amount of money he had advanced, the maker of the note may show these facts in defense of an action on the note. Smith v. Brown (1917) 50 Utah, 27, 165 Pac. 468. It further appeared that the payee of the note agreed to advance the necessary sums of money to carry on the business of the corporation, if any was necessary, and that, when he obtained the note, he refused to advance the necessary money.

There was held to be no conditional delivery in Title Guarantee & T. Co. v. Pam (1922) 232 N. Y. 441, 134 N. E. 525, where the owner of an irrigation project gave to a contractor certain notes under an agreement that the notes were made and delivered subject to all rights, claims, and defenses which the maker might have by reason of the inaccuracy of bills rendered, the total of which made up the amount of the note.

It has been held competent to show that the note was to be paid only upon the happening of a certain event. Norman v. McCarthy (1913) 56 Colo. 290, 138 Pac. 28, holding that the intervener in an attachment proceeding, who has given a check to the attaching officer in lieu of a bond, to secure possession of the property, may, in an action on the check, show that it was to become payable only in case, on the trial of the right to the property, judgment should be rendered against the intervener. Harder v. Reinhardt (1916) 162 Wis. 558, 156 N. W. 959, holding parol evidence admissible in an action on a note to show that it was not to be paid unless a certain sum was collected in a lien suit by the defendant. The jury here found that the agreement was "that the note would not be used against the defendant, nor the amount thereof demanded from him," except upon the conditions stated. This provision was held in Straus v. Citizens State Bank (1911) 164 Ill. App. 420, to change the rule theretofore existing in Illinois and permit a conditional delivery to be shown. This case was affirmed by the supreme court ((1912) 254 Ill. 185, 98 N. E. 945) upon another theory.

Parol evidence has been held admissible where a note was given in payment of stock to show an agreement that it was to be carried and renewed by the payee for a stated time, and if, at the end of that time, the stock had not realized enough to pay the purchase price, and the maker did not want it, the payee was to take it off his hands and cancel the note. Paulson v. Boyd (1908) 137 Wis. 241, 118 N. W. 841. See comment supra, and see Waters v. Byers Bros. & Co. (1921) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 233 S. W. 572.

Some of these cases speak of the instrument as having been delivered to the payee in escrow. Bank of Cartersville v. Gunter (1912) 4 Ala. App. 539, 58 So. 757, holding that, as against a party other than a holder in due course, parol evidence is admissible to show that a note was delivered to the payee upon condition that he would obtain an agreement from certain parties to make a refund to the defendant, and that the note was not to be effective to charge such defendant unless and until said condition was complied with.

Bank of Cartersville v. Gunter

(Ala.) supra, is referred to with approval in Stone v. Goldberg & Lewis (1912) 6 Ala. App. 249, 60 So. 744, applying the rule so as to permit a surety signing a note on condition that others shall sign it as sureties before delivery by the principal obligor, to show this, and thus defeat an action on the note under the Negotiable Instruments Law. This case was reversed by the supreme court in Ex parte Goldberg & Lewis (1914) 191 Ala. 356, L.R.A.1915F, 1157, 67 So. 839, on the theory that the Negotiable Instruments Law has reference only to a conditional or special delivery to the payee or holder, of which he is advised at the time, and not to a delivery by an obligor to an agent or intermediary, for transmission to the payee.

As shown in the preceding paragraphs, parol evidence is held admissible to show a conditional delivery under the Negotiable Instruments Law. It has been expressly held that there is nothing in the law that requires a contract of conditional delivery to be in writing. Norman v. McCarthy (1913) 56 Colo. 290, 138 Pac. 28. Nor is there anything in the Statute of Frauds so requiring. Waukeev Sav. Bank v. Jones (1916) 179 Iowa, 261, 159 N. W. 691.

An agreement that a note executed for the special purpose of furnishing cash bail for one accused of crime would be returned when the bail was exonerated seems to have been regarded as an agreement for a conditional delivery in First Nat. Bank v. Miller (1920) — N. D. —, 179 N. W. 997, although this decision is based in part, at least, on what seems to be the correct ground, that it was delivered for a special purpose.

In some cases decided after the adoption of the Negotiable Instruments Act, the evidence has been held inadmissible without referring to the act. Schultz v. Meyer (1913) 181 Ill. App. 335; Hesch v. Dennis (1915) 194 Ill. App. 663; Graff v. Fox (1917) 204 Ill. App. 598; Shinner v. Raschke (1919) 213 Ill. App. 324. And this is true of a number of other cases.

Not all agreements show a conditional delivery within the meaning of the Negotiable Instruments Act. Evidence of an oral agreement between a bank, which is the payee of the note, and the maker, that the bank would look to a third person for payment, does not show a conditional delivery where the bank, on the faith of the note, extends credit to the maker. Niblack v. Frank (1917) 209 Ill. App. 162.

The purchaser of cattle, who has given his notes for the purchase price thereof, secured by a chattel mortgage on the cattle, cannot show an oral agreement that he was to pay the notes out of the proceeds of the sale of the cattle from time to time, and that the payee, in order to enable the maker to do this, was to renew the notes every six months until they were so paid. It is not stated that any agreement was made as to the defendant's liability in the event the cattle never paid off the notes, though it may possibly be inferred that the effect of the agreement was that the notes were to be paid only out of the proceeds of the sale of the cattle, and that there was otherwise no personal liability on the part of the maker of the notes. Waters v. Byers Bros. & Co. (1921) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 233 S. W. 572. Hall, Judge, was of the opinion that the evidence of the oral agreement was admissible. It seems to the writer, however, that the majority of the court were correct in holding that the evidence in this case was not admissible. The existence of the notes as obligations was clearly recognized, and the oral agreement went merely to their performance. But see Drovers' Cattle Loan & Invest. Co. v. McGraw (1921) — Minn. —, 184 N. W. 365, infra, IV.

The maker of an accommodation note cannot show an oral agreement that the note was simply collateral security against loss by depreciation in corporate shares put up by the principal debtor as collateral for the loan, and that the note should only be used in case any deficiency arose after realizing on the security. Vineberg v. Jones (1912) Rap. Jud. Quebec 22 B. R. 128, 8 D. L. R. 513.

An oral agreement that the payee of notes would look to a third person for payment of the amount cannot be shown to defeat an action on the notes. Clinton v. Royal (1917) 203 Ill. App. 248. The maker of the notes in this case claims that a company which owed him money was owned by the payee, that the payee advanced him the amount of the notes, and agreed to look to the company for reimbursement.

An order on the back of a note made by the creditor of a company to an individual who owned the company, directing the company to pay the individual owner the amount of the note, and that it be charged to the maker's account, does not make the note conditional within the meaning of the Negotiable Instruments Law. Ibid.

In Mt. Vernon Nat. Bank v. Kelling-Karel Co. (1914) 189 Ill. App. 375, the court says that the facts stated in the affidavit of defense do not show an agreement that the delivery of the draft was conditional, but only an agreement that the acceptance was conditional; but the acceptance, as modified by such conditions, was delivered to appellee without limitation or reservation that property in the instrument should not be transferred until the happening of the conditions named. Accordingly, the evidence was held inadmissible in this case.

There are other states of facts which have been before the courts and held to show a conditional delivery which, to the mind of the writer, do not show such a delivery. The state of facts present in Mason v. Carter (1921) — Iowa, —, 182 N. W. 179, seems to show a condition subsequent rather than a condition precedent. In other words, the note was to be defeated upon the happening of the event. This seems not to be a conditional delivery, as the court held.

5. Admissibility as dependent upon relation to consideration.

There is a suggestion in a number of cases which concede the admissibility of such evidence that it is confined to evidence impeaching the consideration. Foy v. Blackstone (1863) 31 Ill. 538, 83 Am. Dec. 246. The court in Colvin v. Goff (1916) 82 Or. 314, L.R.A.1917C, 300, 161 Pac. 568, thus states the general rule: "It may be shown as between the maker and the payee that, prior to the delivery of the note, its payment was made conditional, whenever the condition or contingency affects the consideration; that is to say, if the maker of the note stipulates that it shall take effect only upon the happening of an event, and the failure of such contingency affects the consideration to the extent that he does not get the value or thing that he has bargained for, it is a good defense, because there is a failure of consideration; or, if the note is given upon a stipulation that it shall not be effective unless a particular event shall happen, and, by reason of the failure of the event to happen, the maker does not reap the benefit contemplated by reason of its occurrence, there is a failure of consideration and the stipulation is good." And in some cases in which the evidence was admitted it is stated to show a lack of consideration. In LaGrande Nat. Bank v. Blum (1894) 26 Or. 49, 37 Pac. 48, where the oral agreement sought to show that the note was given to take effect as an unconditional, binding obligation upon the maker only in the event of his failure to comply with his agreement to account for the proceeds of certain notes which he had for collection, the court states that evidence of such an agreement and of the maker's compliance therewith would show a want of consideration for the note.

It is true that in many of the cases admitting the evidence, the oral agreement related to the consideration for the note, but the admissibility of evidence of the oral agreement is not based upon this fact. Proof of this is furnished by the fact that in the cases discussed in III. infra, the oral agreements just as distinctly related to the consideration, yet here the evidence is held inadmissible. Not every agreement which relates to the consideration shows a failure of consideration within the meaning of the rule that failure of consideration defeats the bill or note as between the parties. That rule is entirely independent of the one now under discussion.

In some cases a defense very like the facts discussed above has been sustained on the theory that it showed a failure of consideration for the note. Without any discussion of the parol-evidence rule, a plea in an action upon a note given for a life insurance policy, setting up that the agent had stated (apparently, orally) to the maker that if, after the policy of insurance was received by him, he was not perfectly satisfied with its provisions, the policy would be taken back and the note returned to the defendant, was held good as against a demurrer, on the theory that the plea went to the consideration of the note sued on. Parker v. Bond (1898) 121 Ala. 529, 25 So. 898. A similar decision appears in Gillespie v. Hester (1909) 160 Ala. 444, 49 So. 580. In the latter case a demurrer to a plea in an action on a promissory note, that the note was given for an insurance policy, and that, in order to induce the defendant to sign the note, the agent stated to him that after the policy of insurance was received, if he did not want it, it might be given back and defendant would owe nothing on the note, on the ground that this was an attempt to contradict a written agreement by contemporaneous and previous parol statements, was overruled.

In Cochran v. Burdick Bros. (1912) 7 Ala. App. 274, 61 So. 29, the instrument sued on was given in consideration of certain goods which the defendant agreed to purchase, and the goods were purchased and the instrument given with the express understanding and agreement that if the purchaser should realize a certain profit on the goods, the instrument should be paid; and that was the only condition upon which the instrument should become payable. The court states that the contract or agreement set up did not vary or contradict the terms of the instrument sued on, but simply set up an agreement going to the consideration of the bill which was the subject of the suit.

In Jefferson County Sav. Bank v. Compton (1915) 192 Ala. 16, 68 So. 261, an action on a promissory note given by a subscriber to corporate stock to the corporation, the evidence showed that it was agreed that the note was not to be paid unless the corporation's business became a paying proposition; that if it did, the note was to be paid and the stock issued to the subscriber; if not, the note should be returned to him; and it appeared that the company failed and went into bankruptcy before the time for the consummation of the contract. The court says: "Where the terms of the written contract are not thereby varied or contradicted, it is always competent as between the immediate parties to show the real consideration for a promissory note, and to show by parol evidence the terms and conditions upon which it is payable, or by which the payment may be avoided." The court, however, does not clearly point out just how the application of this rule would affect the evidence in question.

Apparently upon the theory of failure of consideration, the court, in Clayton v. Western Nat. Wall Paper Co. (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 146 S. W. 695, allowed a merchant who had given his note for the purchase price of certain goods to show that the note was given under an oral agreement to take back all of certain goods which had been purchased prior thereto and which were found unsatisfactory, and give him credit on his note, when the same had been inventoried.

The theory of the decision in Farrar v. Mathews (1873) 37 Iowa, 418, is not altogether clear. In that case, in an action on a note, the answer of the defendant that the note was given for a sewing machine delivered to the defendant to be tried, and, in case it did not work to his satisfaction, to be returned to the payee; that it did not so work and was returned, whereby the consideration had failed,—was held not subject to demurrer on the ground that it sought to contradict or vary the terms of the note sued on.

The court states that the agreement that the defendant should have the right to return the machine if it did not work satisfactorily was not inconsistent with the idea of a sale of it to him, nor would it contradict or vary the note.

b. Theory that evidence is inadmissible.

According to some cases it is incompetent to prove that a bill or note was delivered to the promisee or agent of the promisee as an escrow. Garner v. Fite (1891) 93 Ala. 405, 9 So. 367; but see Alabama cases cited in II. 5, supra; Scott v. State Bank (1848) 9 Ark. 36; Chandler v. Chandler (1860) 21 Ark. 95 (obiter); Findley v. Means (1903) 71 Ark. 289, 73 S. W. 101; see Graham v. Rummel (1905) 76 Ark. 140, 88 S. W. 899, 6 Ann. Cas. 157, supra, II. a, 2; Walker v. Crawford (1870) 56 Ill. 444, 8 Am. Rep. 701; Roche v. Roanoke Classical Seminary (1877) 56 Ind. 198; Stewart v. Anderson (1877) 59 Ind. 375; Clanin v. Esterly Harvesting Mach. Co. (1888) 118 Ind. 372, 3 L.R.A. 863, 21 N. E. 35; Murray v. W. W. Kimball Co. (1894) 10 Ind. App. 141, 37 N. E. 734; Murray v. W. W. Kimball Co. (1894) 10 Ind. App. 184, 37 N. E. 736; Hubble v. Murphy (1864) 1 Duv. (Ky.) 278; Massmann v. Holscher (1871) 49 Mo. 87; Henshaw v. Dutton (1875) 59 Mo. 139; Jones v. Shaw (1878) 67 Mo. 667; Hurt v. Ford (1898) 142 Mo. 283, 41 L.R.A. 823, 44 S. W. 228; Montgomery v. Schwald (1913) 177 Mo. App. 75, 166 S. W. 831.

This seems to be the view of the Kentucky court in J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Barnes (1909) 133 Ky. 321, 117 S. W. 418, 19 Ann. Cas. 246, a case involving a delivery of the note to an agent of the payee, in which, after holding the agent an agent of the makers of the note, and not of the payee therein for the purpose of holding the note, the court states that when a writing fully executed is delivered to the party for whom it is intended, the other party, in the absence of fraud or mistake, will not be permitted to set up either an antecedent or contemporaneous parol agreement that will contradict or vary the writing. It was sought to show in this case that notes were delivered to the agent on the condition that they were not to be delivered to his principal unless the machinery for which they were given proved satisfactory.

In Hyde v. Tenwinkel (1872) 26 Mich. 93, the makers of the note gave notice with their plea of the general issue that they should show that the note was given conditionally, to be paid, if at all, out of certain insurance money if that should be paid without suit or litigation, and that it was not paid without litigation. The offer of proof was as follows: "We offer to prove that the consideration for this note was the delivery of two endowment policies of the Continental Life Insurance Company, and also the payment of a life policy of Dr. Charles A. Hyde (who was then deceased), of $5,000 with interest in full without delay and without litigation or expense to the defendants, but that defendants were put to the expense of litigation for a year, and then received the $5,000 without any interest, and without the cost of the litigation; that the endowment policies having been received by defendants, were subsequently returned to the plaintiff, and were in his hands when this suit was begun, and that he now holds them and has held them ever since; that this note was delivered to plaintiff for the purposes and intents thus set forth, and not as an absolute, unconditional promissory note." This offer of proof was rejected by the trial court and the rejection held proper by the supreme court, which said that the obvious purpose was to show a verbal contemporaneous agreement or understanding to reduce the note from an absolute and specific undertaking, according to its terms and legal import, to a defeasible engagement; and this was certainly inadmissible.

See Central Sav. Bank v. O'Connor (1903) 132 Mich. 578, 102 Am. St. Rep. 433, 94 N. W. 11. See cases in II. a, 3, supra, adhering to this view.

The Georgia Code, § 3675, is referred to in Stapleton v. Monroe (1900) 111 Ga. 848, 36 S. E. 428, as authority for the proposition that an absolute and unconditional promissory note cannot be so changed by evidence of a contemporaneous parol agreement as to ingraft upon it a condition. This statute is also referred to in Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Wynne (1905) 123 Ga. 470, 51 S. E. 389. But see Georgia cases supra, II. a, 2.

According to these cases a note cannot be delivered conditionally to the promisee; if delivered to the promisee, it is binding from delivery, whether the condition be performed or not.

A delivery to the payee passes title to the payee, though contrary to the actual intention of the parties. Murray v. W. W. Kimball Co. (1894) 10 Ind. App. 184, 37 N. E. 736.

Such evidence is stated to contradict the unconditional terms of the note. Montgomery v. Schwald (1913) 177 Mo. App. 75, 166 S. W. 831, supra.

Where a consideration is otherwise shown, this cannot be done under the guise of showing a failure of consideration. Ibid.

In at least some of the jurisdictions represented above the rule has been changed, as may be seen by the cross references. In any jurisdiction apparently adhering to this view it seems only a reasonable precaution to examine carefully for recent cases; since it is not at all unlikely that this rule once prevailing, having been abandoned in many jurisdictions, will be abandoned in still others when a case arises therein.

It was stated in Clanin v. Esterly Harvesting Mach. Co. (1888) 118 Ind. 372, 3 L.R.A. 863, 21 N. E. 35, that while it is competent to prove under proper issues that a note never was delivered, evidence is not admissible to prove that it was delivered to the payee, who had parted with the consideration, as an escrow, or under any agreement that the maker was not to be bound according to the terms of the note.

In Murray v. W. W. Kimball Co. (1894) 10 Ind. App. 141, 37 N. E. 734, the court, after stating that delivery to an agent of the payee in escrow would be a violation of his duty to his principal, and that he was therefore incompetent to act as the depository or custodian of such note as an escrow, continues: "Such a delivery would have the same effect as if it had been made to the payee of the note directly, with the understanding that the instrument was not to become effective as the note until the condition set up in the answer had been performed. No such arrangement or understanding as this, resting in parol, could be proved, as it would be a clear contradiction of the provisions of the written contract."

In Stewart v. Anderson (1877) 59 Ind. 375, where the court announced the general rule that a note cannot be delivered to the payee or his agent in escrow, the note was delivered to the agent, who delivered the same to the payee, the payee having at the time no knowledge of the existence of the escrow agreement.

According to the court in Walker v. Crawford (1870) 56 Ill. 444, 8 Am. Rep. 701, it cannot be shown that a "note was delivered conditionally, or as collateral security for the performance of a parol promise or agreement by appellant." The court further says that "a note absolute on its face cannot be shown by parol to have been conditional." An acceptance which is, on its face, absolute, cannot be shown by parol to have been conditional, according to the court in Haines v. Nance (1893) 52 Ill. App. 406. But see Moore v. Prussing (1896) 165 Ill. 819, 46 N. E. 184, supra, I.

It is held in Montgomery v. Schwald (1913) 177 Mo. App. 75, 166 S. W. 831, that parol evidence is inadmissible to show that notes were to be valid only upon the contingency that a deed of trust should be taken from a third party and held by the payee to secure the payment of the notes, and to that extent relieve the maker.

In Houck v. Frisbee (1896) 66 Mo. App. 16, it was held not competent to show by parol evidence a condition precedent to the obligation of the defendant upon an agreement by him to pay the note of a third person, where it had been delivered.

The drawer and acceptor of a draft cannot set up in defense of an action thereon an oral agreement that the draft was given and accepted on condition that the payee would surrender and deliver up a certain promissory note, which he held against a third person. Foster v. Clifford (1878) 44 Wis. 569, 28 Am. Rep. 603. Compare with Paulson v. Boyd (1908) 137 Wis. 241, 118 N. W. 841, supra, II. a, 2, "Paid in certain manner."

In Brown v. Hull (1845) 1 Denio (N. Y.) 400, it was held that the maker of a promissory note is not entitled to show that, at a settlement of accounts between the parties, upon which settlement the note was given, the plaintiff agreed to give it up, unless he could find a receipt from the defendant for the payment for some property which the defendant had let him have, the parties differing as to whether the same had been paid for.

In the early case of Payne v. La Due (1841) 1 Hill (N. Y.) 116, it was held that a note could not be contradicted or controlled in legal effect by oral evidence of an agreement that it was to have no validity except in a certain event. Erwin v. Saunders (1823) 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 249, is relied upon as authority for this proposition. In so far as these cases announce the doctrine now under consideration, they are overruled by the later New York cases.

See Ely v. Kilborn (1848) 5 Denio (N. Y.) 514, infra, III. b, and other New York cases there cited.

In Adams v. Wordley (1836) 1 Mees. & W. 374, 150 Eng. Reprint, 479, the acceptor of a bill of exchange was denied the right to show that it was given for a claim held against him by the drawer under circumstances exactly similar to those under which a claim was held by the drawer against another person, against whom the drawer was about to begin an action, and that it was agreed that until the drawer should recover in the action thus about to be begun, or, if he should not so recover, he would not require the acceptor to pay the bill of exchange in question. According to the court, the proper course would have been to put the bill into the hands of a third person, to hold until the determination of the suit; and the court says further: "It would be very dangerous to allow a party to alter in such a manner the absolute contract on the face of a bill of exchange. The effect of the cases is that you are estopped from saying that you made any other contract than the absolute one on the face of the bill." But see Pym v. Campbell (Eng.) supra, II. a, 2.

c. Instrument containing a condition.

It has been stated in cases involving conditional delivery, that the fact of delivery must necessarily rest in parol. Norman v. McCarthy (1913) 56 Colo. 290, 138 Pac. 28. In a sense this is not strictly accurate, for the condition upon which an instrument is intrusted to the obligee therein may be stated in the writing itself. This being true, the question arises, when a condition is stated in the writing, whether other conditions may be shown by parol. It has been held that this cannot be done. Hurley v. Y. M. C. A. (1914) 16 Ariz. 26, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 220, 140 Pac. 816; First State Bank v. Noel (1902) 94 Mo. App. 498, 68 S. W. 235.

It is held in Ward v. Thompson (1913) 13 Ga. App. 152, 78 S. E. 1012, that a note which stipulates that it is given for a domestic pump which is to be delivered within a stated time, and further provides that the note is to be void only upon condition that the company refuses to deliver the pump as above specified, and for no other cause whatsoever, cannot be affected by a subsequent agreement of an agent of the pump company to the effect that if the purchaser struck quicksand he would not be required to take the pump or pay the note; it is expressly stated, however, that the agent was not authorized to make the agreement.

A subscriber of a certain amount to a railroad company, who signed a note which contains a condition that the note is to become due and payable when the track of the railroad shall be laid between certain points and cars shall have run thereon, cannot show an oral agreement that the note was to become void if the railroad was not completed within two years from the date of the note. Cairo & V. R. Co. v. Parker (1877) 84 Ill. 618. A similar decision appears in Cairo & V. R. Co. v. Delap (1880) 7 Ill. App. 60.

Where a note given for goods contains an express provision that the goods were bought without any guaranty, the maker cannot show an oral warranty that, if the goods were not as represented, he did not need to pay for the same. Wooldridge v. Royer (1888) 69 Md. 113, 14 Atl. 681.

It is held in International Harvester Co. v. Parham (1916) 172 N. C. 389, 90 S. E. 503, that parol evidence is inadmissible in an action on a note which is stated in the writing to have been given for certain farm machinery, to prove a parol agreement that unless some additional machinery was furnished, the note would be defeasible.

See Heitmann v. Commercial Bank (1909) 6 Ga. App. 584, 65 S. E. 590, supra, II. a, 3.

A physician who had given his note for a premium on a life insurance policy, which note recites that it is to be paid by medical examination, cannot show another agreement varying the written contract. Dobbs v. Johnson (1921) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 230 S. W. 1035.

The subscriber to a fund which is to become binding on certain conditions stated in the subscription contract cannot show other conditions on which he subscribed. Hurley v. Y. M. C. A. (Ariz.) supra, holding, in an action upon a subscription contract, by the terms of which the subscriptions were conditioned on procuring a certain sum total, that parol evidence is inadmissible to show other conditions relating to the character and arrangement of the ground at the time of the erection of the building, the beneficiaries of its privileges, and the use of the property. It is held in Blair v. Buttolph (1887) 72 Iowa, 31, 33 N. W. 349, that parol evidence is inadmissible in an action on a subscription contract to a railway, conditioned upon the completion of the railway to a certain city within a certain time, to show an additional oral stipulation that the road was to be completed from the city in question to another within a stated time. It is stated: "But when the parties by their writing made the completion of the railroad to Iowa Falls within the specified time the condition upon which his liability to pay the money should accrue, they definitely fixed that as the condition of the contract, and the conclusive presumption is that all other conditions were excluded. When, by the express terms of the written agreement, a particular condition is made the consideration for the undertaking, it is no more competent to contradict or vary its terms by parol evidence as to the consideration by which it is supported than as to its other conditions."

A note payable when a line of telephone is completed to a certain place cannot be varied by an oral agreement that the line was to be completed to that place within a stated time. First State Bank v. Noel (1902) 94 Mo. App. 498, 68 S. W. 235.

Parol evidence was held incompetent in Thompkins v. Dinnie (1911) 21 N. D. 305, 130 N. W. 935, in an action upon a subscription for the building of a church, in which subscription it was recited that it should not be binding until a certain amount had been subscribed or provided for, to show that the defendant's subscription was made on the condition that the pastor of the church should remain in that position.

The admissibility of parol evidence in case of contracts of subscription to corporate stock is not discussed herein, as those fall more properly under contracts in general than under instruments for the payment of money, to which this note is confined.

So, where certain conditions are reduced to writing in documents separate from the notes or drafts, other conditions cannot be shown by parol. Prouty v. Adams (1903) 141 Cal. 304, 74 Pac. 845.

It is held in Banque Franco-Americaine v. Bergstrom (1916) 171 App.

Div. 870, 157 N. Y. Supp. 635, affirmed in (1919) 225 N. Y. 710, 122 N. E. 876, that the acceptor of drafts drawn by a bank in its own favor cannot show that the drafts were not to become complete obligations until certain bonds had been sold by the bank, where preliminary negotiations were conducted in part, at least, by letters in which the drafts were stated to have been given in payment of the stock of the bank, provision was made for the renewal of the drafts until a stated time, and provision made also as to some details relating to the exchange and the holding of the stock certificates.

Where certain notes are turned over to the creditors as collateral to secure an indebtedness, and there is a written contract, conditioned that the notes are to be returned upon settlement of the account, it was held not error for the court to refuse to allow evidence of an alleged parol agreement that the notes at maturity were to be returned to the debtor for collection, where the evidence was offered for the purpose of avoiding the expense of collection of the notes. Buxton v. Alton-Dawson Mercantile Co. (1907) 18 Okla. 287, 90 Pac. 19.

Where, at the time of the execution of a note, and as a part of the transaction, the payee gives the maker a written agreement to indemnify him in payment of the note, thereby showing that the note was to be paid when it became due, and that, upon certain contingencies, the payee would indemnify the defendant to the extent of the payments, the maker cannot show that the note was to be paid only upon the happening of the contingencies. Prouty v. Adams (Cal.) supra.

But it has been held that a condition stated in a note given for a stallion, and intended to be subscribed by a number of persons, that "if full amount is not subscribed, this is null and void," does not exclude parol proof of other conditions not wholly repugnant thereto, such as that the payee should procure actually responsible and otherwise satisfactory subscribers, who should keep the stallion at a certain place. Rutherford v. Holbert

In Graham v. Remmel (1905) 76 Ark. 140, 88 S. W. 899, 6 Ann. Cas. 167, parol evidence that a note given upon an application for insurance was not to be binding unless the insurance was accepted was held admissible without reference to the fact that the note itself recited that it was payable on the delivery of the insurance policy, and contained the express condition that, should the policy not be issued, the application was to be null and void.

And in Divine v. George (1917) 63 Colo. 341, 166 Pac. 242, where a separate written agreement had been executed by the payee of a note given for corporate stock that the note was to be returned to the subscriber if the corporation did not establish its store at a certain place, parol testimony as to what kind of a store it intended to and would establish was admitted on the theory that the word "store" was ambiguous.

It was held permissible in Ware v. Allen (1888) 128 U. S. 591, 32 L. ed. 563, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 174, an action on an instrument promising to pay money provided the obligors were not defeated in a certain suit, to show an oral agreement between the parties that the instrument was to be of no effect unless, upon consultation with counsel, the obligors should be assured that the transaction out of which it arose was lawful.

III. Evidence to show a condition attached to the note.

a. Introduction.

As stated in the discussion in II. a, 1, the underlying principles governing the admission of evidence of the kind under consideration in this annotation are clear, but great difficulty is encountered in applying the principles to the evidence involved in the cases. Where the evidence takes the form that the note, although manually delivered to the payee, was not delivered as a binding obligation, the courts, apart from those discussed in II. b, and those mentioned in the succeeding paragraph, agree that the evidence is admissible. But where the evidence takes the equivocal forms that are found in many cases, there is no agreement in conclusion. The mere form of the evidence, however, is not a safe criterion as to its admissibility.

In C. Aultman & Co. v. McKinney (1894) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 26 S. W. 267, the court regarded as a violation of the parol-evidence rule an attempt to show that the note was to become binding only in a certain event. In this case it was held that the purchaser of an engine which failed to do satisfactory work, to whom the manufacturer gave a written agreement to overhaul the engine in the following spring, and replace any parts that might be needed or that were in any way defective, and see that it was in every way in good order and doing good work, and who thereupon gave his notes for the purchase price, antedating them as of the date of purchase, could not show an oral agreement that, if the engine was put in proper condition and made to do good work, then and in that event, the maker of the notes would accept the engine, and the notes were to become valid and binding obligations; but, unless the engine was repaired and made to do good work, then the notes would not be valid. The court does not discuss conditional delivery, but regards the case, the facts of which are stated above, as showing an attempt to vary a written contract by a contemporaneous parol agreement or understanding inconsistent therewith. While, as above stated, the court in this case does not discuss conditional delivery, the assumption throughout the opinion is that the note was delivered as a binding obligation, although this is contrary to the statement in the pleading, as above shown. Even if the note is executed on condition, if it is a condition subsequent, the oral agreement is inadmissible. Goddard v. Cutts (1834) 11 Me. 440. In this case the maker of a note declared that he would not sign it except upon the condition that an original note, of which the note in question was a renewal, should be procured and sent to him within a certain time. This, according to the court, is manifestly a condition subsequent, not to be found in the note, but attempted to be attached thereto by parol evidence.

It is the purpose in the present subdivision to discuss the cases which have applied the parol-evidence rule to evidence that the bill or note was conditional. Some of these cases involve evidence that is very similar in form to that involved in II. a, supra.

It has been stated generally that parol evidence is not admissible to vary the terms of a bill or note which is absolute and unconditional, by showing that it was in fact conditional. Stapleton v. Monroe (1900) 111 Ga. 848, 36 S. E. 428; Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Wynne (1905) 123 Ga. 470, 51 S. E. 389; Dixon & Co. v. Bank of Quitman (1919) 23 Ga. App. 279, 98 S. E. 112; Sikes v. Payton (1919) 23 Ga. App. 721, 99 S. E. 310; Bradley v. Progressive Metal & Ref. Co. (1917) 205 Ill. App. 552; Feulner v. Gillam (1918) 211 Ill. App. 348; Citizens Bank v. Martin (1913) 171 Mo. App. 194, 156 S. W. 488. Naftzger v. Buser (1920) 106 Kan. 115, 186 Pac. 997; Shaw v. Hutton (1919) 75 Okla. 255, 183 Pac. 477.

The Georgia cases apparently depend upon a statute. At least, the first two cases above cited refer to a statute in support of the decision.

The court in Leonard v. Miner (1898) 120 Cal. 408, 52 Pac. 655, referred to the well-settled principle of evidence that a contract cannot be contradicted or varied by evidence of an oral agreement entered into by the parties before or at the time of making such contract, and continues: "Evidence of a contemporary oral agreement between the parties to a bill or note, whereby the order or promise contained in the instrument is rendered null or conditional, or whereby the fact of payment is made to depend upon some contingent future event, comes within the same principle."

It is held in Southern Fertilizer & Chemical Co. v. Harrell (1916) 17 Ga. App. 642, 87 S. E. 911, that an attempt by parol to attach to a written contract a condition not therein stated or referred to is a defense bad in law.

The terms of an acceptance in writing cannot be varied by a contemporaneous parol agreement. Mt. Vernon Nat. Bank v. Kelling-Karel Co. (1914) 189 Ill. App. 375.

b. Application to various forms of evidence.

Evidence that the instrument was not to be paid except in a contingency.

Cases in which evidence of this character has been admitted on the theory of conditional delivery are discussed in II. a, 2, supra.

Parol evidence has been held inadmissible where it was sought to show that the instrument was not to be paid unless a certain thing was done, or unless a certain contingency occurred.

Canada. — McNeil v. Cullen (1904) 37 N. S. 13.

It is the general theory of these cases that to allow parol evidence of an agreement that the note was not to be paid except upon a certain contingency would destroy the legal effect of the instrument as a promissory note.

In addition to the foregoing there are other cases which support in a measure the inadmissibility of the evidence in such cases. One who, in the absence of fraud, knowingly gives his promissory note for a sum of money for the purchase price of land, for which he accepts from the payee of the notes a bond for title, conditioned upon the payment of that sum, cannot defeat the collection of the note by showing an antecedent executory agreement on the payee's part to give him the land or part of the purchase price, or to sell it to him at a price different from that stated in the written contract. Carroll v. Hutchinson (1907) 2 Ga. App. 60, 58 S. E. 309. The maker of a duebill which is in legal effect a promissory note cannot show an oral agreement that he was to be liable thereon only in a certain event, and then for only half the sum called for by the note. Smith v. Thomas (1860) 29 Mo. 307. The maker of notes secured by corporate stock collateral, who has also executed a written agreement that the stock is to be delivered to the maker upon the payment of the notes, and if the notes are not paid, that the collateral is to be delivered to the payee, to be disposed of as collateral security, cannot show an oral agreement that the collateral was to be exhausted before the defendant should incur any liability on the notes. Fisher v. Briscoe (1890) 10 Mont. 124, 25 Pac. 30. The maker of a note cannot show an oral agreement that the note should never be sued upon if the maker should not be able to pay it. German Exch. Bank v. Schnitzer (1911) 72 Misc. 362, 130 N. Y. Supp. 223. In Bedwell v. Thompson (1860) 25 Tex. Supp. 245, a purchaser of land who had given a note for the purchase price was held not entitled to set up in defense to a suit on the note a parol agreement resting upon the result of the suit between other parties about the title to the land. The maker of a note to an insurance company for a loan secured from the company cannot show that the note was executed on the understanding that the money was not to be collected as long as he paid the monthly dues mentioned in two policies issued by the society on his life, and the interest accruing annually on the loan. Allen v. Thompson (1900) 108 Ky. 476, 56 S. W. 823. One who has given his note to a brewery for money advanced by it to pay for a liquor tax certificate taken out in the name of the maker of the note cannot show an oral agreement that the maker should only be required to pay a certain sum per week, so long as he remained in business, and to purchase beer of the plaintiff. Ferdinand Munch Brewery v. DeMatteis (1908) 128 App. Div. 830, 112 N. Y. Supp. 1042. The right to show a conditional acceptance of an order by parol was denied in Baylor v. Butterfass (1900) 82 Minn. 21, 84 N. W. 640.

See Wooldridge v. Royer (1888) 69 Md. 113, 14 Atl. 681, supra, II. c.

The evidence has been held inadmissible in a great variety of facts and circumstances. In a number of cases evidence that the maker was not to be required to pay the note unless the payee should need the money or call for it in his lifetime has been held inadmissible. Thus, the maker of a note payable semiannually to the payee for life cannot show a promise by the payee that, if she did not need the sum for her support, the maker would not be required to pay it. Osborne v. Taylor (1890) 58 Conn. 439, 20 Atl. 605. The action in this case was by the administrator of the payee, and it appeared that six semiannual payments had been made on the note, and that seven were unpaid. The maker of notes payable to the maker's father cannot show an agreement that the father should require him to pay only so much of the notes as the father should need for the maintenance of himself and his family in his lifetime, and, at his death, that the notes were to be discharged and satisfied. May v. May (1890) 36 Ill. App. 77. The makers of a note cannot show that it was given to one who had been making her home with them, as a provisional memorandum against possible necessity, and under an agreement that the payee was not to claim payment of it from the defendants unless she should become poor afterwards and need it. Atkinson v. Blair (1874) 38 Iowa, 156. An oral contemporaneous agreement that a note was not to be paid unless called for during the lifetime of the payee was held inadmissible in Boody v. McKenney (1844) 23 Me. 517.

The purchasers of patent rights who have given notes for the purchase price have frequently sought to defeat the notes by showing an agreement that they were not to be paid unless certain profits were realized from the sale of the patent rights. The maker of a note given to evidence the purchase price of the right to sell a patent within a specified territory cannot show an agreement that he was not to be required to pay the note unless his profits from the business were sufficient for the purpose. Rice v. Gilbreath (1898) 119 Ala. 424, 24 So. 421. The maker of a note given for an interest in a patent washing machine cannot show a verbal agreement that he should be required to pay no money on the note except as it should be realized in the sales of the machines, and that the machine was wholly worthless and nothing was realized upon its sale. DeLong v. Lee (1887) 73 Iowa, 53, 34 N. W. 613. The purchaser of a patent right who has given a note for the purchase price cannot show an oral agreement that the note was not to become operative unless a certain sum should be made from the manufacture and sale of the patent right. Beecher v. Dunlap (1894) 52 Ohio St. 64, 38 N. E. 795. On the trial the defendant offered evidence to the effect that the note was to be "null and void" unless within a year he should be able to make a certain sum upon the manufacture and sale of the patent right.

The makers of notes for the purchase price of other articles have sought to defeat actions on the notes by showing an agreement that the notes were not to be paid unless a certain profit should be realized. Parol evidence of an agreement that the maker of the note purchased stock upon condition that it would thereafter pay a certain dividend, and, in the event it failed to pay such dividend, the note was not to be paid, is inadmissible. Dinkler v. Baer (1893) 92 Ga. 432, 17 S. E. 953. A note which recites that it is given to cover a balance of payment on shares of stock, and is to be paid as the stock is resold by the maker, cannot be shown to have been executed under an oral agreement or understanding that the makers were not to be liable to the plaintiff for the money mentioned in the instrument, except upon a sale of the stock at a certain price per share or better. Naftzger v. Buser (1920) 106 Kan. 115, 186 Pac. 997. A purchaser of corporate stock who has given his note for the purchase price, and has entered into an agreement with the corporation to sell its stock on commission, cannot show an oral agreement that, in the event his commissions were not sufficient to pay the note, it was not to be paid, and the stock was to be returned to the corporation, and the note canceled and returned to the maker. Denman v. Kaplan (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 205 S. W. 739. A note payable from the avails of logs when there is a sale made cannot be modified by an oral agreement that it was the understanding of the parties that, if the logs could not be sold, and, if on being manufactured, there was a total loss to the owners, the note was not to be paid. Sears v. Wright (1844) 24 Me. 278.

In other cases the maker of a note has sought to defeat liability thereon by showing an agreement that it was not to be paid unless he realized from a certain source. The maker of a note cannot show that he sold goods for the payee, taking the note of the purchaser under an oral agreement that his note to the payee should not be paid unless he should collect the note which he had taken from the purchaser of the goods. Underwood v. Simonds (1847) 12 Met. (Mass.) 275. The maker of a note cannot show that it was given as a means of collecting a debt the payee held against a third person, who executed his note to the maker; and that it was given under an oral agreement that he was not to be called upon to pay the note unless the third person paid the note to him. Gillet v. Ballou (1857) 29 Vt. 296. Parol evidence is incompetent in an action upon an instrument in writing in the nature of a promissory note, to show that the maker was not to pay the note unless he could collect a certain sum from other persons. Cline v. Farmers' Oil Mill (1909) 83 S. C. 204, 65 S. E. 272.

Notes given for attorneys' services cannot be defeated by showing an oral agreement that they were not to be paid in a certain event. In assumpsit upon a promissory note given for legal services to be rendered in a suit, the makers cannot prove that the note was not to be paid unless the attorneys were successful in the suit in question. West v. Kelly (1851) 19 Ala. 353, 54 Am. Dec. 192.

Parol evidence is not admissible in an action on a promissory note given in consideration of money advanced to pay the expenses of an appeal in a criminal case, to show that the note was to be paid only in case of reversal. Colvin v. Goff (1916) 82 Or. 314, L.R.A.1917C, 300, 161 Pac. 568. A note given for attorneys' fees cannot be varied by showing an oral agreement that it was not to be paid in the event of compromise. Dale v. Pope (1823) 4 Litt. (Ky.) 166.

A note given for the purchase price of machinery cannot be defeated by an oral agreement that it was not to be paid unless the machinery complied with certain warranties. Evidence of an express verbal agreement before notes sued on, which were given in payment of machinery, were executed, that unless the machines should meet certain requirements the notes were to be null and void, and the makers would be under no obligation to pay the same, is inadmissible. Lunsford v. Malsby (1897) 101 Ga. 39, 28 S. E. 496. The maker of notes given for certain appliances cannot show an oral agreement that he need not pay the notes when due if the appliances did not do all they were guaranteed to do. Louis Eckels & Sons Ice Mfg. Co. v. Cornell Economizer Co. (1912) 119 Md. 107, 86 Atl. 38.

A surety cannot show an oral agreement that he was not to be held liable except upon the insolvency or inability of the principal debtor to pay. Brush v. Raney (1870) 34 Ind. 416; Myers v. Sunderland (1854) 4 G. Greene (Iowa) 567; Hunt v. Adams (1811) 7 Mass. 518.

A surety cannot show that he was to be liable only upon the insufficiency of collateral or other security to the note. Martin v. First Nat. Bank (1907) 30 Ohio C. C. 398, 20 Ohio C. D. 398; Anderson v. Matheny (1903) 17 S. D. 225, 95 N. W. 911; Abrey v. Crux (1869) L. R. 5 C. P. 37, 39 L. J. C. P. N. S. 9, 21 L. T. N. S. 327, 18 Week. Rep. 63, 4 Eng. Rul. Cas. 195, holding that the drawer of a bill of exchange for the accommodation of the acceptor cannot show an oral agreement that the acceptor should deposit with the payee certain security, and, in case the bill should not be duly paid, that the payee should sell and dispose of the security and apply the proceeds thereof in payment or liquidation of the bill, and that until the payee should have so sold and disposed of the securities, the drawer should not be liable for or be sued upon the bill. Persons who have executed a note as sureties for an insolvent debtor, payable to one of his creditors, cannot show an oral agreement of the creditor to furnish goods to the debtor, and not to enforce payment of the note faster than he should be able to pay. Holzworth v. Koch (1875) 26 Ohio St. 33. One who has undertaken to guarantee the payment of a note cannot show an oral agreement that he promised to pay it if it could not be made out of the original maker, and not otherwise. Jones v. Jeffries (1853) 17 Mo. 577. The defendant in this case did not sign the note, which was dated 1842, until 1847; when, for a consideration, he undertook to guarantee it as above stated. In Martin v. First Nat. Bank (1907) 30 Ohio C. C. 398, parol evidence is held inadmissible to show an agreement on the part of the payee of a note to obtain certain bonds, to be held by the payee as collateral for the payment of the note, and to be exhausted before any liabilities of the signer would attach. Poffenbarger and Miller, JJ., in Long v. Potts (1912) 70 W. Va. 719, 75 S. E. 62, were of the opinion that it was competent for the sureties on a note to show an oral agreement that they would execute the note as sureties for the principal debtor for twenty days, within which time the payee should procure for the principal debtor security in exoneration and indemnification of the sureties. According to these judges, this was a collateral arrangement for discharge of the note, the sureties being liable in the event of failure of the principal to give the deed of trust within the specified time. The parol-evidence rule is stated to have never been intended for use as a means of accomplishing inequitable and unjust purposes. Two other judges, however, were of the opinion that the evidence was not competent. Evidence of an agreement that the note was not to be paid by the surety except upon the insolvency of the principal debtor or the insufficiency of collateral must be distinguished from evidence of agreements that the note was not to be paid at all, or that the surety was not to be liable thereon. The admissibility of such agreements is discussed in VII. infra.

In the following cases involving miscellaneous oral agreements that the note should not be paid except upon a contingency, such agreements were held inadmissible: The maker of promissory notes the consideration of which was the transfer by delivery to the maker of the promissory note for a much larger amount of a third person from whom the maker of the notes had purchased a tract of land cannot show a verbal agreement that, if the maker failed to pay for and hold the land, the notes executed by him should not be paid, and that he had failed to pay for and had lost all of the land except 80 acres. Gliddens v. Harrison (1877) 59 Ala. 481.

In an action upon a note given in payment of a stallion purchased by the makers, evidence that the agent of the payee stated that, before he would collect the note, the horse would have to come up to the guaranty,—that he did not intend to collect the note until the horse was proven up to the guaranty,—is inadmissible, since this is varying the absolute, unconditional terms of the note by a contemporaneous parol agreement. Probasco v. Shaw (1915) 144 Ga. 416, 87 S. E. 466.

The maker of a note cannot show an agreement that the note was not to be paid unless certain third persons claimed interest on other notes. Penny v. Graves (1850) 12 Ill. 287.

The maker of a note cannot show an oral agreement that the note was not to be paid according to its terms, but that its payment was dependent upon a sale of certain property by the maker. Murchie v. Peck Bros. & Co. (1896) 160 Ill. 175, 43 N. E. 356.

In Croan v. Myers (1912) 52 Ind. App. 143, 100 N. E. 380, a plea that the maker of the note, with others, had started a corporation to which the husband of the payee advanced money, taking the note of the maker under an agreement that if the corporation should be a success, the money was to be repaid in accordance with the terms of the note, but, if the same was not a success, the money was to be a gift and never to be repaid; that the corporation was not a success, and that the husband of the payee retained the note in his possession until his death, and during the time never made demand for payment, and before his death he requested his wife to carry out his promise and to surrender the note to the maker, and within a few weeks after the death of the husband the payee did carry out the wish and surrender the note,—was held not to show a defense to the action.

One who signed notes secured by a mortgage after they were executed by the principal maker, in consideration of the waiver by the mortgagee of the obligation of the mortgagor to have the property on the mortgaged premises insured, cannot show an oral agreement that he was only to be liable in case the property should be destroyed by fire. Farmer v. Perry (1886) 70 Iowa, 358, 30 N. W. 752.

The maker of a note given upon a purchase of corporate stock cannot show an oral agreement that the payee would not exact payment of the note when it became due, if the maker did not want the stock at that time. Simpson v. Blaine (1921) 191 Ky. 465, 230 S. W. 934.

A note which contains an absolute promise to pay cannot be attacked by showing a parol agreement to the effect that the makers' promise was conditional, and that they were not to pay the note unless they got certain branded timber. Begley v. Combs (1905) 27 Ky. L. Rep. 1115, 87 S. W. 1081.

The drawer of a draft upon himself, which was considered as equivalent to the acceptance thereof, was held not entitled to show an oral agreement that the payee assumed a sea risk of a cargo shipped on a ship of which the drawer was the master, and that, if any portion of it was lost by reason of that risk, the amount of the draft was to be ratably reduced. Cunningham v. Wardwell (1835) 12 Me. 466.

An assignee of a debtor, who gave a creditor his note for the amount of her claim, cannot show an oral agreement that the note should not be payable unless the maker should be found to have funds of the debtor sufficient to pay it. Adams v. Wilson (1846) 12 Met. (Mass.) 138, 45 Am. Dec. 240.

An oral agreement upon the execution of a note given for the amount of a chattel mortgage which the payee held upon the property of a third person, purchased by the maker of the note, that, in case the vendor of the property should thereafter be forced into bankruptcy by any of its creditors upon proceedings instituted by them for that purpose, and adjudicated a bankrupt, the note would thereupon become and be null and of no effect, and would not be paid, is inadmissible. Central Sav. Bank v. O'Connor (1903) 132 Mich. 578, 102 Am. St. Rep. 433, 94 N. W. 11, s. c. on second appeal in (1905) 139 Mich. 82, 102 N. W. 280.

The maker of a note payable to a bank cannot show an oral agreement that she should not be liable to pay the note unless she failed to perform an agreement on her part to acquire the ownership of a deposit in the bank, belonging to her deceased husband. Northern Trust Co. v. Hiltgen (1895) 62 Minn. 361, 64 N. W. 909.

One who has executed notes as guardian of a minor cannot show an oral agreement that he was to pay the notes only upon the condition that assets of the minor should come into his hands sufficient for that purpose, and in case such assets did not come into his hands, he was not to pay the notes, and they were to be delivered up to him. Wren v. Hoffman (1868) 41 Miss. 616.

The acceptor of a draft cannot show that he accepted the draft to be paid on condition that he should receive from the drawer certain evidence that the security given to the acceptor was free and clear of encumbrances. Meyer v. Beardsley (1863) 30 N. J. L. 236.

One who has given a note for tuition in the payee's school cannot show an oral agreement that the note was not to be paid if the maker did not take the course of instruction for which the note was given. James-town Business College Asso. v. Allen (1902) 172 N. Y. 291, 92 Am. St. Rep. 740, 64 N. E. 952.

An applicant for life insurance who has given a duebill to the agent, who has advanced the amount of the premium, cannot show an oral agreement that he was only to repay the sum so advanced if able to do so, and, if not able, the insurance policy was to be returned. Prosser v. Miller (1902) 87 Misc. 841, 76 N. Y. Supp. 974.

A note given by a bankrupt, subsequent to his bankruptcy, to a creditor whose debt has been discharged, cannot be shown to have been given upon the express condition that it should never be sued upon if the maker should not be able to pay it, although the maker agreed to pay interest thereon. German Exch. Bank v. Schnitzer (1911) 72 Misc. 862, 130 N. Y. Supp. 223.

The maker of a note to whom the payee has assigned a claim against third persons cannot show an oral agreement that the note should not become operative unless the money on the assignment was realized. Isaacs v. Jacobs (1889) 26 N. Y. S. R. 96, 7 N. Y. Supp. 66.

The maker of a note cannot show an oral agreement that it was not to be paid if the payee won an action then pending, to which he was a party. Calvosa v. Donovan (1918) 171 N. Y. Supp. 388.

The purchaser of a horse, who has given a note for the purchase price, cannot show an oral agreement that, if the horse died before the end of the season, no part of the price was to be paid. Gatlin v. Kilpatrick (1844) 4 N. C. (1 Car. Law Repos.) 534, 6 Am. Dec. 557.

The maker of a note cannot show that it was to be paid only upon the collection by him of notes placed in his hands by the payee for collection. McClanaghan v. Hines (1847) 33 S. C. L. (2 Strobb.) 122.

An executor who has given a note to a creditor for the amount of the creditor's claim against the decedent's estate cannot show an oral agreement that the payment of the note was conditional upon the allowance by the ordinary of the claim made against the estate by the payee. McGrath v. Barnes (1879) 13 S. C. 328, 36 Am. Rep. 687.

The maker of a note cannot show that it was executed under an agreement that he was not to be required to pay it unless he might see proper to do so. Geo. D. Bernard & Co. v. Robertson (1895) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 29 S. W. 697.

In Key v. Hickman (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 149 S. W. 275, parol evidence is held inadmissible to show that, at or before the time of the execution of the note, there was an agreement that the note was not to be paid unless the payee furnished the maker an itemized statement showing certain facts.

The drawer of a check cannot show an oral agreement that he was not to be liable on the check unless he was financially able to meet it, and should deposit the money in the bank with which it could be paid. Merriman v. Swift & Co. (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 204 S. W. 775.

The purchaser of a diseased horse, who has given his note for the purchase price, cannot show an oral agreement that, if the horse should become useless or die as a result of the disease, the note should not be collectable or collected, but should be discharged. Hatch v. Hyde (1842) 14 Vt. 25, 39 Am. Dec. 203.

The drawer and acceptor of a draft cannot show in defense of an action thereon an oral agreement that the draft was given and accepted on condition that the payee would surrender and deliver up a certain promissory note which he held against a third person. Foster v. Clifford (1878) 44 Wis. 569, 28 Am. Rep. 603.

One who has given his note to the amount of a demand against a third person cannot show an agreement that the note should not be enforced in case the payee should obtain a verdict in an action against other persons who were also liable for the demand. Foster v. Jolly (1835) 1

Crompt. M. & R. 703, 149 Eng. Reprint, 1263, 5 Tyrw. 239, 4 L. J. Exch. N. S. 65, 1 Gale, 10.

The maker of a note expressed to be payable on demand cannot show an oral agreement that it was subject to a condition that she should not be called upon for payment unless the children should die before a certain legacy should become payable. McNeil v. Cullen (1904) 37 N. S. 813.

See Standard Bank v. Wettlaufer (1915) 33 Ont. L. Rep. 441, 8 Ont. Week. N. 187, 28 D. L. R. 507, supra, II. a. 2.

Evidence that the note was to be void or to be surrendered.

For cases dealing with this kind of evidence and holding it admissible, see II. a. 2.

Parol evidence of a prior or contemporaneous oral agreement that notes were to be void or to be surrendered in a certain contingency is inadmissible.

A contemporaneous oral agreement at the time the note was given as a part of the purchase price of land which was sold to the maker that he, the maker, should have the option of retaining the land contract and paying the note, or surrendering the contract and requiring the vendor to pay the note, was held inadmissible in McEwan v. Ortman (1876) 34 Mich. 325. This decision is based upon two grounds: one, the inadmissibility of the oral agreement to change the written contract; and the other, that an oral agreement relating to lands is void under the Statute of Frauds.

As in the case with other forms of evidence treated in this annotation, the admissibility of evidence that the note was to be void or to be surrendered in a certain contingency has been denied under a variety of circumstances.

The purchaser of corporate stock who has given his note for the purchase price cannot show an oral agreement that, if the stock should thereafter be declared void for any reason, his note should not be enforced, but should be surrendered to him. Sioux Falls Nat. Bank v. Klaveness (1920) 264 Fed. 40. The note involved in this case was given to a bank,—not directly to the vendors of the stock; but no point is made of this fact. The case is decided as if the note was given directly to the vendors; or, at least, as if the bank knew of the contract.

The maker of a note cannot show that it was given for the purpose of indemnifying the payee or his estate against a certain other note, and was to be void upon condition that the payee and his estate were indemnified. Converse v. Moulton (1795) 2 Root (Conn.) 195. In this case the note contained a memorandum reciting the consideration therefor, but contained no such condition as was sought to be proved.

An oral agreement that the maker of a note given for an insurance premium should have the right, at the maturity of the note, to surrender the policy and have the note canceled, is inadmissible. Johnson v. Cobb (1896) 100 Ga. 139, 28 S. E. 72.

An oral agreement at the time of entering into a contract for the sale of land by one having a tax title thereto, that if minor heirs should redeem the land, the contract, including notes given for the purchase price, should be rescinded, is inadmissible. Lane v. Sharpe (1842) 4 Ill. 566.

Where an owner of slaves sold the same to a person, and, in the absence of such person, delivered them to a third person, who executed a note therefor for the price, an oral agreement that, on the purchaser's return, his note was to be given and the note of the third person was to be surrendered, cannot be shown. Harris v. Galbraith (1867) 43 Ill. 309.

The maker of a note cannot show that the note was executed for the sole purpose of securing the payee for having signed as surety certain notes given by the maker and subsequently paid, and that there was an understanding between them at the time of the execution of the note sued on, that, in case the defendant made payment of said note which had been thus signed as surety, the note in question would be void and would be returned to the defendant. Schultz v. Meyer (1913) 181 Ill. App. 335.

The makers of a note given to secure part of the purchase price of a horse sold by the payee to the makers cannot show an oral contemporaneous agreement that, when the horse became four years old, the makers should have the right to rescind the contract if they so desired, return the animal, and the payee would cancel and surrender the note. Thisler v. Mackey (1902) 65 Kan. 464, 70 Pac. 334.

The maker of a note to be given upon a purchase of corporate stock cannot show an oral agreement that, if he should become dissatisfied, he should have the privilege of returning the stock for which the note was executed, and have the note returned to him. Moore v. Parker (1893) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 125.

It is held in Wislizenus v. O'Fallon (1886) 91 Mo. 184, 3 S. W. 837, that parol evidence is inadmissible to show that a note was to be used for a certain purpose, and, if not so used, was to become void.

Where the guardian of an incompetent, together with other persons, have executed a note to a bank to obtain a loan for the benefit of the incompetent, the makers of the note cannot show an oral agreement that, upon the obtaining of an order to mortgage the incompetent's lands, and the giving of the mortgage to the bank, the security of the mortgage would be accepted and the note surrendered. Farmers' State Bank v. Sloop (1918) — Mo. App. —, 200 S. W. 304.

The purchaser of a harvesting machine who has executed a note therefor cannot show an oral agreement that the payee of the note would make the harvester run and do good work, and if he did not do so, the note was to become null and void, and be returned to the maker. Aultman, M. & Co. v. Hawk (1903) 4 Neb. (Unof.) 582, 95 N. W. 695.

A note payable in specific articles and absolute on the face cannot be defeated by oral evidence showing that it was to be void upon it appearing that the debt for which it was given had been inventoried by one of the makers on his applying for his discharge under the Insolvent Act. Erwin v. Saunders (1823) 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 249, 13 Am. Dec. 520.

Where a promissory note was given for the payee's interest in his father's estate, with a parol agreement between the maker and payee that, if the interest of other heirs of the estate could not be obtained in a specified manner, both the note and release should be void, it was held that evidence could not be given of the parol agreement in defense of an action upon the note. Ely v. Kilborn (1848) 5 Denio (N. Y.) 514.

The purchaser of machinery which is to be constructed and set up by the vendor, who has given a note for the purchase price, cannot show an oral agreement that the payee was to relieve the maker and cancel the note, provided the contract was not completed when the note fell due. Smith v. Hedges (1915) 170 App. Div. 349, 155 N. Y. Supp. 934, affirmed in (1918) 222 N. Y. 701, 119 N. E. 1077.

The makers of notes cannot show a verbal agreement that, should the makers thereafter dissolve partnership, the notes were to be returned and the defendants were to return to the payee the certificates for certain goods which had been delivered to the defendants by plaintiff at the time of the making and delivery of the notes. Oppenheimer v. Kruck (1903) 84 N. Y. Supp. 129.

The purchaser of a manure spreader, to whom the vendor agreed to furnish a knife grinder without further charge, who executed his note for the purchase price, cannot show an oral agreement that, if the knife grinder was not furnished, the note was to be invalid. International Harvester Co. v. Parham (1916) 172 N. C. 389, 90 S. E. 503.

The purchaser of corporate stock, who had given a note for the purchase price, cannot show an oral agreement to take back the stock and cancel the note. Riley v. Treanor (1894) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 25 S. W. 1054.

In Security L. Ins. Co. v. Allen (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 170 S. W. 131, it is held in an action on a note given in payment of the premium on a life insurance policy, that an agreement at the time of the execution of the note that it would be canceled and returned to the maker if he would thereafter aid in procuring life insurance from other people, and that the note was to become a valid and binding obligation in the event only that the maker should fail to perform that agreement, was inadmissible in evidence, as its effect would be to vary by parol the terms of the note.

The purchaser of a stove, who has given his note for the purchase price thereof, cannot show an oral agreement that, at the expiration of a year from the date of the note, the purchaser might elect to pay the amount specified in the note, or to return the stove to the plaintiff, in satisfaction or payment of the note, and pay him $6 for the use of the stove. Bradley v. Bentley (1836) 8 Vt. 243.

In Farnham v. Ingham (1833) 5 Vt. 514, where the maker of a note attempted to show that the payee agreed at the time the note was executed that, if he failed to discontinue a certain suit, the note should be void, the evidence was held inadmissible.

Although the court in Isaacs v. Elkins (1839) 11 Vt. 679, says of the case of Farnham v. Ingham (Vt.) supra, that parol evidence to show that the note was payable only on condition was admitted as an independent contract by which the note was to be paid in a manner different from that expressed in the written contract, from the report of the case in Farnham v. Ingham it seems that the evidence which actually was received was that if the payee failed to discontinue a suit, he would allow on the note all actual costs, trouble, and expense which the maker should be subject to in defending the suit. In so far as the evidence was held admissible, the case is overruled by the decision in Isaacs v. Elkins.

One who is engaged in buying horses for a government, who purchased horses, giving his note therefor, cannot show an oral agreement that he should take the horses to a certain place where they would be inspected by the government agents and either accepted or refused, and if they did not pass inspection, that he should have the right to return the horses to the place of purchase, deliver them to the vendor, and receive the note back. Isaacs v. Elkins (Vt.) supra. The note sued upon was given to one who had no knowledge of the agreement, the transaction taking place through an agent; but no point is made of this fact.

One who has given his note for a scholarship in a university was held not entitled to show an oral agreement that the note should not be paid until the university should issue to him such scholarship; neither was he entitled to show an agreement that, if the university should fail to issue the scholarship, the note should become null and void. Wayland University v. Boorman (1883) 56 Wis. 657, 14 N. W. 819. The action in this case was by an indorsee, who claimed to be a bona fide holder, but the above holding, denying the admissibility of the parol evidence, seems not to be based upon this fact.

The purchaser of corporate stock in an oil company, who has given his note for the purchase price, cannot show an oral agreement that, if oil tanks were not put in at a certain place by a certain date, the note was to be returned. Wilton v. Manitoba Independent Oil Co. (1915) 25 Manitoba L. R. 628, 25 D. L. R. 243.

In an action on a promissory note in which the defense was that there was an oral agreement, contemporaneous with the execution and delivery of the note, to the effect that the maker intended subsequently to make a will, in which the payee was to be a beneficiary to the extent of the amount of the note, and that the note was to be held until the will was executed, when it was to be returned to the maker, the court states: "In this case the execution and delivery of the note are admitted and the obligation thereof recognized; and, for the purpose of defeating it, reliance is placed upon a contemporaneous oral agreement by which a condition not precedent but subsequent was offered to defeat liability. If a contemporaneous oral agreement providing for the surrender of the note upon the happening of a condition subsequent could be used to defeat recovery upon a note, the rule which provides that a note or other written contract cannot be varied or modified by such an agreement would be abrogated." Post v. Tamm (1916) 91 Wash. 504, 158 Pac. 91.

Evidence that the note was to be paid in a certain way, or not to be paid unless it could be paid in a certain way.

Oral agreements shade gradually from those the purpose of which is to defeat the note altogether in the contingency named, into those which merely modify some term thereof. The former class of agreements is within the scope of this annotation; the latter is not. Between these two well-defined classes there are a number of classes of agreements which are equivocal. There are agreements that the instrument was to be paid in a certain way, or not to be paid unless it could be paid in a certain way; that there was to be a deduction in a certain event; that the note was not to be paid until a certain event; and many others. It is the purpose in the present annotation to discuss the representative cases belonging to these various classes, stopping short of those agreements which merely modify some term of the instrument. It is recognized, however, that there is no well-defined line between these classes of agreements; hence, the stopping place is necessarily more or less arbitrary.

Coming to the first of the classes of agreements just mentioned, it is held that evidence of an oral agreement that a note was to be paid in a certain way, or not to be paid unless it could be paid in a certain way, is inadmissible.

Compare with cases discussed in II.

In addition to the foregoing cases there are certain agreements falling within the general class indicated which relate to matters that are subsequently treated, such as agreements that the note is to be paid out of dividends or out of the proceeds of certain property.

The makers of a note executed for a stock of goods cannot show an oral agreement that the makers should not be required to pay any part of the note further than such sum as should be realized on account of said goods. Bowers v. Linn (1898) 14 Ky. L. Rep. 889.

In Citizens Bank v. Martin (1918) 171 Mo. App. 194, 156 S. W. 488, the condition is not stated. The defense the makers offered was that the money was borrowed for the purpose of purchasing stock to feed and put on the spring market, but it is not stated whether the condition was that the note was not to be payable unless the venture resulted successfully, or was merely that it was not to be paid until the stock was put on the market. That the court did not regard the condition as going to the existence of the contract seems clear from its citation of the earlier case in this jurisdiction of Wislizenus v. O'Fallon (1886) 91 Mo. 184, 3 S. W. 837, where a requested instruction was held erroneous in which the court was asked to declare that although the maker had executed and "delivered" his note in writing, containing an absolute and unconditional promise to pay, such note might be avoided by a condition not contained in the note, but dwelling in parol, that such note was to be paid only in a certain event.

An allegation that it was distinctly understood and agreed between the makers of a note and the payee that the note was to be used for the purpose of raising the necessary money to finance a certain transaction, and to purchase certain corporate stock, was held to show an agreement affecting the manner in which the note was to be paid, in Gwinn v. Ford (1915) 85 Wash. 571, 148 Pac. 891. According to the court, the written promise to pay cannot be so modified.

Where one partner has given a retiring partner a note to evidence money loaned by the retiring partner to the other, for the purpose of raising money to pay off the partnership debts, and has obtained the defendant's indorsement on the note, the defendant, when sued on the note, cannot show that the payee, at the time of discount, agreed that the note should be repaid out of the effects of the copartnership, and that, if the assets of the copartnership did not pay the note, then that the payee would pay three fourths of the balance and the maker one fourth. Gridley v. Dole (1851) 4 N. Y. 486.

The maker of a note cannot show a contemporaneous parol agreement that it was to be paid in whole or in part in merchandise. Harmon v. Harmon (1917) 131 Ark. 501, 199 S. W. 553.

A variety of facts appear in these cases. Evidence that a note was to be paid out of the proceeds of certain broom corn sold, and that the broom corn had not been sold or the proceeds thereof collected, is inadmissible. Hensley v. Mitchell (1909) 147 Ill. App. 161. It is held in Crooker v. National Phonograph Co. (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 135 S. W. 647, that parol evidence is inadmissible to show an agreement that a note might be paid by goods which the maker had on hand, purchased from the payee. The maker of a note cannot show that it was to be paid in work and labor. Stein v. Fogarty (1896) 4 Idaho, 702, 43 Pac. 681.

The purchaser of goods, who has given his note for the purchase price, cannot show an oral agreement that, if he did not have the money when the note matured, the payee would accept land in payment. Barhydt v. Bonney (1881) 55 Iowa, 717, 8 N. W. 672.

The general agent of a life insurance company, who has given his note to the company for money borrowed by him for the purpose of making a loan in such a manner as to procure policyholders for the company, cannot show an oral agreement that the note should be repaid out of renewals collected by him as agent out of the business. Gorrell v. Home L. Ins. Co. (1894) 11 C. C. A. 240, 24 U. S. App. 118, 63 Fed. 371.

The owner of a mine who has entered into an agreement to convey the same to other parties, subject to a payment of $50,000 to himself out of the net proceeds resulting from the operation of the mine or its sale, and through whom one of the persons to whom the mine was to be conveyed advanced $7,500, for which the mine owner gave his note, cannot show an oral agreement that the note should be payable out of the first proceeds of the operation or sale of the mining claim, and not otherwise. Keith v. Parker (1902) 115 Fed. 397.

A creditor who has executed his note to the several creditors of his debtor cannot show an agreement that the note was to be paid only from money collected on accounts assigned to him, and that he should be liable to pay the notes only so fast as the collections would enable him to do so. Walters v. Smith (1860) 23 Ill. 342.

Evidence of an oral agreement that a surety signed the note on the distinct understanding that the principal maker of the note was to be retained in the employ of the payee until he could, from his earnings, pay the debt, is not admissible. Tucker v. Talbott (1860) 15 Ind. 114.

One who has given a note for the purchase price of a horse purchased from a person who owed him a sum of money in connection with another matter cannot show an oral agreement that, at the time of the contract, it was agreed between the parties that, if the payee of the note did not pay his indebtedness by doing certain work, then the horse should be accepted as payment of the note. Parks v. Zeek (1876) 53 Ind. 221.

The maker of a note which recites that it was given to secure the payment of a church debt cannot show that the payee agreed to collect the subscription which had been made, and apply the same to the payment of the note. Clanin v. Esterly Harvesting Mach. Co. (1888) 118 Ind. 372, 3 L.R.A. 863, 21 N. E. 35.

The maker of a note, who was appointed the agent of the payee to sell fencing material within his township, cannot show an oral agreement that he was to pay the note in commissions made on sales, and not otherwise.

Van Vechten v. Smith (1882) 59 Iowa, 173, 13 N. W. 94.

An oral agreement that the notes were not to be paid in money, but were to be available to the payee only in making final payment on a contract for telephone appliances, is inadmissible. Houts v. Sioux City Brass Works (1907) 134 Iowa, 484, 110 N. W. 166.

An oral agreement that the note was to be paid out of the profits of the business, which was to be launched by the use of money for which it was given, is inadmissible to vary the terms of the note. VanFossan v. Gibbs (1914) 91 Kan. 866, 139 Pac. 174; Hangen v. Pinkston (1922) — Kan. —, 204 Pac. 675. A decision similar to that in VanFossan v. Gibbs appears in Underwood v. Viles (1920) 106 Kan. 287, 187 Pac. 881, where there was a company organized and capital stock issued. It was held that an oral agreement that a note given in payment of capital stock was to be paid out of profits of the business was inadmissible.

The maker of a note which recites that it is secured by certain stock as collateral cannot show an oral agreement that, at the maturity, he was to have the right to have the stock back by paying the amount of the note, and, if he did not do so, that the payee was to have the stock absolutely, and the maker was not to pay the amount of the note. Perry v. Bigelow (1879) 128 Mass. 129.

It is held in Commonwealth Trust Co. v. Coveney (1909) 200 Mass. 379, 86 N. E. 895, that an oral agreement between an indorser and indorsee that payment should be required only of such sums as the indorser should realize as profits from the sale of his real estate could not be proved as a defense to an action on the note, nor in support of an independent action against the indorsee for breach of the agreement by enforcing the note.

Parol evidence is inadmissible to show a verbal agreement that the indebtedness described in certain notes should be paid out of the proceeds of certain horses then owned by the maker, and not otherwise. National

Live Stock Commission Co. v. Thero (1911) 154 Mo. App. 508, 135 N. W. 961.

A note given to a bank to obtain a loan with which to purchase stock in a real estate corporation organized by the bank's stockholders to take title to and dispose of real estate which the bank had acquired cannot show an oral agreement to the effect that the note was not to be paid unless the money was made out of a sale of the land. First Nat. Bank v. Henry (1918) — Mo. App. —, 202 S. W. 281.

The maker of a note secured by collateral cannot show an oral agreement that the note should be paid out of the proceeds of the collateral, or out of money which he claimed was due him as compensation for certain services. Gilleran v. Owens (1918) 182 App. Div. 580, 169 N. Y. Supp. 958.

A purchaser of corporate stock who has given his note for the purchase price cannot show an oral agreement that he would not be liable upon the note, but that the note was to be paid by the profits of the business. Middleton v. Wooster (1918) 184 App. Div. 165, 171 N. Y. Supp. 598.

It is held in Carnegie Trust Co. v. Kleybolte (1911) 74 Misc. 246, 134 N. Y. Supp. 69, that parol evidence is inadmissible in an action on a note which was delivered unconditionally, to show that it was orally agreed that payment of the note was to be dependent upon the ability of the maker to realize upon the sale of certain bonds.

The maker of a duebill for work and labor cannot show an oral agreement that part of the sum should be paid with two alternate land certificates. Roundtree v. Gilroy (1882) 57 Tex. 176.

One to whom land had been conveyed by the owner as a means of obtaining a loan, and who thereupon executed his note to the owner, which was discounted and the loan thus obtained, cannot show an oral agreement that the note was to be paid off by the owner of the land when it became due, and that, in case he failed to pay off the note, then the maker should convey the land to the person who discounted the note, in full payment thereof. Dwiggins v. Merchants' Nat. Bank (1894) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 27 S. W. 171.

In Nixon v. First State Bank (1910) 60 Tex. Civ. App. 7, 127 S. W. 883, rehearing denied in (1910) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 129 S. W. 145, it is held that parol evidence is inadmissible in an action on a promissory note to show an agreement that the maker should have the option to satisfy the note by surrendering to the payee certain of its stock.

Where, in the course of the settlement of partnership transactions in real estate, one of the partners gave his note for a balance found due to the other, the maker of the note cannot prove by his own testimony that, at the time the note was given, the payee agreed that it should remain in his hands as a part of the partnership account, to be paid by any balance which might afterwards be due to the defendant for moneys received by the plaintiff for the firm. Currier v. Hale (1864) 8 Allen (Mass.) 47.

The maker of a note given upon a purchase of corporate stock cannot show that it was executed as a conditional obligation, payable only from dividends from the stock. Abbott v. Kennedy (1918) 133 Ark. 105, 201 S. W. 830; Planters' Bank v. Brown (1918) 22 Ga. App. 495, 96 S. E. 328; Mumford v. Tolman (1895) 157 Ill. 258, 41 N. E. 617; Shinner v. Raschke (1919) 213 Ill. App. 324; Third Nat. Bank v. Reichert (1903) 101 Mo. App. 242, 73 S. W. 893. In Driscoll v. Colby (1914) 161 App. Div. 922, 145 N. Y. Supp. 681; Gilleran v. Colby (1914) 161 App. Div. 923, 145 N. Y. Supp. 682, parol evidence is held inadmissible to show that certain notes for which shares in a company were pledged were to be paid from dividends on the shares.

Thus it is held that an unconditional note given upon a purchase of corporate stock cannot be converted into a promise dependent upon the happening of contingencies by an oral agreement that the promoter would himself pay into the corporation for the maker the amount called for by the instrument, and that the dividends and profits accruing from the business would, within a stated period, pay off and discharge the obligation created by the written promise. Planters' Bank v. Brown (1918) 22 Ga. App. 495, 96 S. E. 328. The maker of a note cannot show that he and the payee formed a corporation of which he was the president and manager, and that he purchased 10 shares of stock from the plaintiff, for which the note in question was given, but that there was a parol agreement that the note should be paid out of the profits of the business, that stock bought by the defendant was to be held by plaintiff as collateral to the note, but that, if the business should not prove a success, the plaintiff should keep the stock and cancel the note. Shinner v. Raschke (1919) 213 Ill. App. 324.

Where the purchaser of corporate stock from the individual owners gave his note for the unpaid part of the purchase price, securing it by the stock purchased, the note containing provision for the sale of the collateral in case of default, such maker cannot enjoin the enforcement of the obligation by proving an agreement that, if the purchaser's share of the dividends is not sufficient to discharge the indebtedness at the maturity of his note, it would be from time to time extended until the profits should be sufficient to pay it, since this would make the performance of his contract depend upon conditions that were entirely outside of and disconnected from the contract itself. Warner v. Bonds (1914) 111 Ark. 238, 162 S. W. 788.

Evidence of an oral agreement that notes were to be paid only to the extent of money received for certain goods is inadmissible. Byrd v. Marietta Fertilizer Co. (1906) 127 Ga. 30, 56 S. E. 86; Bowers v. Linn (1893) 14 Ky. L. Rep. 889; Western Mfg. Co. v. Rogers (1898) 54 Neb. 456, 74 N. W. 849.

W. 37, in SECURITY SAV. BANK v. RHODES (reported herewith) ante, 412.

One to whom a debtor has assigned property, and who has given his note to another creditor of the same debtor, cannot show an agreement that the note was payable only out of the surplus of such assigned property after the payment of the maker's claim, and that there was no surplus, as this varies the terms of the note. Guy v. Bibend (1871) 41 Cal. 322. Such an agreement does not go to the consideration of the note. Ibid.

The maker of a note cannot show an oral agreement that he should expose for sale certain goods for the purchase price of which the note was given, and if they proved unsalable, they were to be returned to the payee of the note, who would receive the same at the same price at which they were originally sold. Clement, B. & Co. v. Houck (1901) 113 Iowa, 504, 85 N. W. 765. According to the court, to entertain this defense and permit the evidence in support thereof would clearly vary the terms of the note by making it payable in goods instead of in money.

In Byrd v. Marietta Fertilizer Co. (1906) 127 Ga. 80, 56 S. E. 86, supra, an action on ordinary promissory notes, each containing an absolute and unconditional promise to pay at a stated time a stated sum of money, a plea that, at the time these notes were given, it was agreed that the amount to be paid would not, at all events, be the amount stated in them, but that the makers were to pay whatever amounts were realized from the sale of fertilizer which had been shipped direct, and if the sales produced an amount which was less than the aggregate amount of the notes, they were only bound to pay that amount, was held bad as an attempt to vary the terms of the written contract by evidence of an oral contemporaneous agreement. The local representative of an agricultural machinery manufacturer who has given a note payable absolutely, and containing an indorsement of the payee on the back thereof that it is given for certain agricultural machinery, and the maker is to have the option of paying it in notes of purchasers, cannot show that the note was given upon the representation of the manufacturer that he was dispensing with certain portions of the bookkeeping, and that the note would assist him in doing this, and that it was executed under an agreement that it need not be paid unless the goods were sold. Western Mfg. Co. v. Rogers (1898) 54 Neb. 456, 74 N. W. 849.

The right to return goods or part of the goods which constitute the consideration for the note has been held provable, on the theory that it constituted a set-off, in Barnes v. Shelton (1823) 16 S. C. L. (Harp.) 33, 18 Am. Dec. 642; and it was there held not to alter the terms of the note.

Parol evidence is not admissible to show an agreement that the maker of notes secured by mortgage was not to be held personally liable on the notes, but that the mortgagee is to look solely to the mortgage for the collection of the debt. Smith v. McLaughlin (1915) 120 Ark. 366, 179 S. W. 496.

The oral agreement which was held inadmissible in Linville v. Holden (1876) 2 MacArth. (D. C.) 329, was that the note was to be payable out of the property to which the payee of the note had the legal title, and which was being sold under some agreement between the payee and one of the makers.

See Continental Gin Co. v. Stocker (1916) 235 Fed. 1005, reversed on other grounds (1917) 157 C. C. A. 535, 245 Fed. 343, infra, V.

Agreements for a deduction in a contingency.

Another agreement which seeks to defeat the note only in part in a contingency is one that a deduction shall be made in the amount in a certain event. It has been stated generally that a promissory note cannot be trammelled with verbal conditions that make it obligatory for a less sum than that stated therein. Swank v. Nichols (1865) 24 Ind. 199. See Cunningham v. Wardwell (1835) 12 Me. 466, supra, "Not to be paid except in a contingency." See Title Guarantee & T. Co. v. Pam (1922) 232 N. Y. 441, 134 N. E. 525, supra, II. a, 4.

And the cases generally sustain the conclusion that an agreement that there should be a deduction of a certain amount when determined or in a certain event is inadmissible in evidence.

In an action on a note given in a transaction of a sale of lumber, the defendant cannot show that the note was given subject to the terms of an oral understanding or agreement that a deduction should be made on account of some quantity of lumber not delivered. Consolidated Lumber Co. v. Frew (1916) 32 Cal. App. 118, 162 Pac. 480.

The maker of a note cannot show an oral agreement that the note was executed as a memorandum of the amount of his original indebtedness and interest due up to date thereof, with the collateral understanding and condition that when the amount of a certain indebtedness due the maker should be ascertained, it should be credited upon the memorandum, and the paper should then be considered as a promissory note. Knight v. W. T. Walker Brick Co. (1904) 23 App. D. C. 519.

An oral agreement to the effect that if the payee of a note should collect anything from the makers of original notes on which the maker of the note in suit was an indorser, the amount so collected should be credited upon the note in suit, which was given in satisfaction of his liability growing out of the indorsement, cannot be shown. Prosise v. Phillips (1913) 41 App. D. C. 226.

In an action upon an absolute and unconditional note for a stated sum, the defendant cannot show that he had effected a compromise with his creditors, of whom the payee of the note was one, for 50 cents on the dollar, but that, after the compromise had been agreed upon, the payee told the defendant that he would make out a note for the full amount of his claim, and desired the defendant to sign it, but that, immediately upon his signing the same, he, the payee, would turn over the note to a third person for the defendant, and would abide by his former agreement to take 50 cents on the dollar in settlement of his former claim, but said that he wanted the note to show what amount had been compromised, and that he would then and there deliver the note to the third person for the defendant, but that when the note was signed and turned over to the payee, he refused to deliver it to the third person, in violation of his contract, or to accept one half the face value thereof in settlement of his claim. Bowen v. Waxelbaum (1907) 2 Ga. App. 521, 58 S. E. 784.

One who has assigned a promissory note for a stated sum without informing himself of the correctness of the amount named cannot show a parol promise of the other party to correct errors. Stacer v. Ehrlich (1918) 22 Ga. App. 285, 95 S. E. 1016.

A note given from one person to another, between whom there existed an open account, cannot be varied by a contemporaneous verbal agreement that whatever sum the payee had not accounted for to the maker on the settlement should, when ascertained, go in discharge of the note. Mill v. Comparet (1860) 15 Ind. 243.

One who signs a note as surety cannot show an oral agreement between himself and the payee at the time the note was signed, that before he could be held thereon or required to pay any portion thereof, the payee would exhaust chattel mortgage securities given by the principal, and that the defendant should be held for the balance only. Conqueror Trust Co. v. Danforth (1918) 103 Kan. 860, 177 Pac. 357.

A note given upon the purchase of a milk route by one who agrees to buy his milk from the payee at a certain rate cannot be modified by an oral agreement that, upon the settlement of the note, the maker is to be allowed a certain discount on the milk thus bought. Kelley v. Thompson. (1900) 175 Mass. 427, 56 N. E. 713.

The purchaser of cattle, who has given his note for the purchase price, cannot show an oral agreement that, if other cattle which had been purchased by the maker from the payee for breeding purposes should prove to be barren, a credit for the amount of the damages should be allowed on the note. Phelps v. Abbott (1897) 114 Mich. 88, 72 N. W. 3.

The obligor on a bond secured by a mortgage for a sum certain cannot show an oral agreement that the bond should cover whatever may be found to be due upon a settlement. Moffitt v. Maness (1889) 102 N. C. 457, 9 S. E. 399.

The owner of land who has obtained a loan on the security of a deed of trust thereon, and given his note for the loan, cannot show an agreement at the time of delivery of the note that, if the land was sold or the note paid prior to its maturity, the payee would account to him for a proportional part of an amount which had been included in the note for interest. Guarantee L. Ins. Co. v. Davidson (1921) — Tex. —, 234 S. W. 888.

The purchaser of a store who has given his note for the purchase price, cannot show an oral agreement that, if any mistakes or errors are found or discovered in the amount due the vendor upon notes, books of accounts, and assets, the same should be allowed and indorsed upon the note. Gregory v. Hart (1858) 7 Wis. 532.

The purchaser of timberland who has given his note for the purchase price cannot show an oral agreement to allow him at a certain rate for any shortage. Hubbard v. Marshall (1880) 50 Wis. 322, 6 N. W. 497.

One who has executed a promissory note in the ordinary form for attorney's fees cannot show an oral agreement that, in the event he was not indicted, he should pay a less sum than that mentioned in the note. Abelowich v. Greenville Nat. Bank (1899) 22 Tex. Civ. App. 272, 54 S. W. 794.

So, parol evidence is incompetent to show that the signer of a subscription in the way of a donation was not to pay more than another.

First Free-Will Baptist Parish v. Perham (1892) 84 Me. 563, 24 Atl. 958, holding, in an action to recover on a contract of subscription toward the building of a meeting house, that it is incompetent to show by parol that it was agreed that the defendant should subscribe for an equal amount with another individual, and that the defendant should not be required, in any event, to pay more than this individual paid.

But an agreement upon the execution of notes that, upon receipt of the proceeds of certain lands, the amount thereof would be indorsed on the notes, has been admitted on the theory that it does not in any manner tend to vary the terms of the notes. The oral agreement is said to be entirely independent of the notes, and to relate solely to the disposition of funds subsequently to be received. Roberts v. Ozias (1917) 179 Iowa, 1141, 162 N. W. 584.

Agreement that the note was not to be paid until the happening of a certain event.

It has been held that parol evidence is inadmissible to show that a bill or note, absolute as to time of payment, was not to be paid until the happening of a certain event.

Compare with cases discussed in II. a, 2, supra.

An oral agreement of the payee to renew the note from time to time until the improvement in the business situation should enable the maker to pay it cannot be shown in contradiction of the note. Hall v. First Nat. Bank (1899) 173 Mass. 16, 44 L.R.A. 319, 73 Am. St. Rep. 255, 53 N. E. 154.

It was held in Hancock v. Edwards (1846) 7 Humph. (Tenn.) 349, that a bill in chancery would not lie to enjoin the collection of a judgment on a note, on the theory that, at the time of the giving of the note, there was an oral agreement that it should not be enforced until a date subsequent to that fixed therein. The court says that there is no pretense that the promise formed a part of the contract which was intended to be reduced to writing, and was omitted by accident or mistake, or the fault or misconduct of the opposite party. It was only an inducement held out to secure the contract and make the most of it, and there is no principle upon which it can be incorporated into the written contract by parol proof.

See Citizens Bank v. Martin (1913) 171 Mo. App. 194, 156 S. W. 488, supra, "Paid in a certain way."

See Adams v. Thurmond (1915) 48 Okla. 189, 149 Pac. 1141, supra, II. a, 2, "To be paid only in a certain contingency."

A great variety of facts have been presented in the foregoing cases. Parol evidence is inadmissible to show that a note payable at a time certain, given for services to be rendered in the future, was not to be paid until the services were rendered. Walker v. Clay (1852) 21 Ala. 797.

The acceptor of a bill of exchange payable at a time certain cannot show a parol agreement that he should not be called upon to pay the bill until the payees had prosecuted the drawers to judgment or insolvency. Cowles v. Townsend (1857) 31 Ala. 133 (the consideration for the bill was goods sold by the payees to the drawers).

It is held in Fowler v. Zimmerman (1914) 42 App. D. C. 70, in an action upon a promissory note, that parol evidence that the payee agreed that he would extend the time of payment from time to time until the maker could dispose of certain real estate is inadmissible.

In Rivers v. Brown (1911) 62 Fla. 258, 56 So. 553, an action upon a promissory note, evidence of an agreement that the note should not be paid until certain property should be sold and the purchase price thereof collected was held inadmissible.

It is held in Fechheimer v. Goldnamer (1916) 169 Ky. 243, 183 S. W. 541, that a note cannot be varied or contradicted by a parol contemporaneous agreement that the payees would not demand payment of the note at maturity, or until such time as the principal debtor should be able to pay the same, or until he closed up or disposed of the business he then contemplated starting.

The maker of notes given to evidence the purchase price of an interest in machinery for making clothespins cannot show a prior or contemporaneous oral agreement that the time for the payment of the notes should be extended until he had realized sufficient from the clothespin business to pay them. Ockington v. Law (1877) 66 Me. 551.

A note payable one day after date cannot be modified by showing an agreement that it should not be sued on until it should be ascertained whether certain debts could be realized on or not. McSherry v. Brooks (1876) 46 Md. 103.

The maker of a note secured by collateral cannot show an oral agreement that he was not to be held liable on the note until the collateral was exhausted. Security Nat. Bank v. Pulver (1915) 131 Minn. 454, 155 N. W. 641.

The maker of a note given for goods cannot show an oral agreement that he was not to be called upon to pay the note until he had succeeded in disposing of sufficient goods to liquidate the same. Federal Discount Co. v. Fletcher (1918) 104 Miss. 251, 61 So. 308. The note involved in this case was a renewal note which had been given to an assignee of the original. The defendants claimed that the original note was given under an agreement that they were to be held liable only in event that they had sold a sufficient amount of the goods.

The maker of a note payable on a specified date cannot show an oral agreement that the note was not to be paid until a certain suit should be determined. Van Etten v. Howell (1894) 40 Neb. 850, 59 N. W. 389.

The maker of a note cannot show an oral agreement that it was not to be paid until he had recovered judgment in a certain action then pending. Mallory v. Fitzgerald (1913) 69 Neb. 312, 95 N. W. 601.

The maker of a note cannot show an oral agreement that the note was not to be payable nor the defendant liable thereon unless and until he had received out of the net rents, issues, and profits of certain property, sufficient to pay the note. Lewis v. Jones (1860) 6 Bosw. (N. Y.) 366.

It is held in Myers v. Stein (1913) 154 App. Div. 681, 139 N. Y. Supp. 762, that a defense to notes payable upon a date certain, that they were not to be paid until certain stock in the possession of the payee should be disposed of, whereupon the proceeds thereof were to be applied to the extinguishment of the notes, which were not to be enforced in any other manner unless, after such sale, a deficiency should arise, was an attempt to vary the terms of the notes.

It is held in Weinhandler v. Loewenthal (1916) 159 N. Y. Supp. 695, affirmed in (1917) 176 App. Div. 909, 162 N. Y. Supp. 1149, that parol evidence is inadmissible in an action on a demand note, to show that the note was not to be collected until the death of a certain person. In this case the holder of the note sought to introduce the evidence to avoid the Statute of Limitations.

The sureties on an official bond against whom the obligee of the bond obtained a judgment, who had executed a note for the amount thereof, which was payable at a time certain, were not permitted to show an oral agreement that the note was not to be paid until the sureties had sold certain real estate, in Cherokee County v. Meroney (1917) 173 N. C. 653, 96 S. E. 616.

The maker of a note cannot show an oral agreement that the payee would accept interest on the same annually until the defendant could pay the whole of the note. Acme Mfg. Co. v. McCormick (1918) 175 N. C. 277, L.R.A.1918F, 572, 95 S. E. 555.

The maker of a note cannot show an oral agreement that the note was intended merely as a memorandum, and was not to be paid until the amount thereof could be realized out of a mine. Wilson v. Wilson (1894) 26 Or. 251, 38 Pac. 185.

It was held in Long v. Riley (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 139 S. W. 79, that a parol agreement cannot be set up to show that a note was to be paid out of money collected on an insurance policy, and that the payee would carry the note until such policy was paid.

Parol evidence is inadmissible to show that a note bearing a due date was to become due prior to the date mentioned therein upon the happening of a certain event. Floyd v. Brawner (1881) 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 53.

In addition to the foregoing cases there are a number of others that bear more or less directly upon the inadmissibility of evidence that the note was not to be paid until the happening of a certain event.

The drawer of a draft, who was sued upon the nonacceptance thereof by the drawee, cannot show an oral agreement that the draft should not be presented for acceptance until after a certain other draft was provided for by placing funds in the hands of the drawee, who had agreed to accept the last draft after funds had been received to meet his acceptance of the first. Brown v. Wiley (1857) 20 How. (U. S.) 442, 15 L. ed. 965.

The drawer of a bill of exchange payable at a certain date, which had been dishonored upon presentation for acceptance, may be sued immediately by the holder, and cannot set up an oral agreement not to sue in any event before the time stipulated in the bill for payment. Rockmore v. Davenport (1855) 14 Tex. 602, 65 Am. Dec. 132.

The maker of a note given in payment of goods purchased cannot defeat his written contract by showing a contemporaneous oral agreement providing that he was to pay for the goods, and have it credited upon the note as the goods were delivered to him. Beattyville Bank v. Roberts (1904) 117 Ky. 689, 78 S. W. 901.

In Slusher v. Conant (1896) 18 Ky. L. Rep. 660, 37 S. W. 579, an agreement that a note given for land was not to be paid until the grantor had the land surveyed and boundaries located, or until it was shown that it was included in a certain parcel, was denied admission, the court saying that as the agreement was of such importance as to defeat recovery on the note, it should have been evidenced by writing, and not left to the memory of those who are now making conflicting statements in regard to it.

An oral contemporaneous agreement that a mortgagor should have as long a time as he desired to pay and liquidate whatever sums of money should be secured by the mortgage is not admissible to contradict and control the express terms of the note secured by and described in the mortgage. Downing v. Brennan (1919) 232 Mass. 535, 122 N. E. 729.

Evidence of an oral agreement that the payee of a note would let the note run for the maker as long as he wanted it is inadmissible. Simpson v. Blaine (1921) 191 Ky. 465, 230 S. W. 934. Such agreements have, in general, been excluded from the present annotation.

It cannot be shown that a note was to be paid at a time other than that fixed therein. International Harvester Co. v. Parham (1916) 172 N. C. 389, 90 S. E. 503.

Stockholders who have signed a corporate note as sureties cannot show an oral agreement with the payee that he would extend the date of payment in the event that certain debts of the corporation should not be paid on or before maturity of the note. Martin v. Daniel (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 164 S. W. 17.

The maker of a due bill executed in November, in which he acknowledges that there is due from him a stated number of sheep, cannot show that it was understood and agreed that the sheep were not to be delivered until the following spring. Self v. King (1856) 28 Tex. 552.

In fact it has been held that a note given for goods sold, which is payable at a time certain, cannot be modified by a written memorandum that the goods should be paid for at another time; that is, not until sold. Miller v. White (1845) 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 491. According to the court, if the note itself had contained a reference to the written contract, both might have been viewed as one contract and then construed together; but to suffer a connection between them to be established by parol evidence would be a violation of the rule that such evidence is not admissible to change or explain a written contract.

Parol evidence has been held inadmissible in cases in which there was a mere statement by the payee that he would not collect a note given for the purchase price of certain property until it had been proved that the property met a guaranty given. Probasco v. Shaw (1915) 144 Ga. 416, 87 S. E. 466.

A note which, by its terms, was payable on demand, cannot be shown to have been made under an agreement that it was not to be paid until after the death of the payee, nor then unless the amount received by the maker as his share of the payee's estate should be greater than the amount received by the other children of the payee, or unless the payee should become insolvent. Graves v. Clark (1842) 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 183.

Where a note is given to one of two partners for a debt due the partners, and the partner to whom the note is payable subsequently executes another note to the other partner for his interest, he cannot show an oral agreement that the second note was not to be paid until the first had been paid. Harvey v. Laffin (1851) 2 Ind. 477.

An oral agreement at the time of the delivery of a note and mortgage that the note and mortgage were not to become due and payable until enough sand had been sold and removed from the real estate described in the mortgage to pay the same is inadmissible to vary the terms of the note. Brantham v. Hoglen (1918) — Ind. App. —, 125 N. E. 461.

The purchaser of a right to vend a "patent" medicine, who has given his note for $50, payable in twelve months, "or as soon as I can sell" fifty dollars' worth of the medicine, cannot show, when sued on the note, that it was not due and payable until fifty dollars' worth of the medicine was sold, and that he had not sold any of the medicine, and could not have done so by the use of due diligence. Harlow v. Boswell (1853) 15 Ill. 56.

It was held competent in Rosenstock v. Montague (1899) 28 Misc. 483, 59 N. Y. Supp. 500, to show an oral agreement that a note payable upon demand was not to be presented or the payment thereof demanded until a certain event had taken place, and that such an event had not yet occurred. While the court does not expressly state the grounds of this decision from the citation of authorities, it is apparently based upon the theory that this could be shown as a conditional delivery. This is, of course, a misapplication of the rule.

Evidence of an agreement to pay when a certain contingency occurred.

Parol evidence of an agreement that a note absolute in terms was to be paid when a certain thing was done is inadmissible. Scaife v. Beall (1871) 43 Ga. 333; Block v. Stevens (1902) 72 App. Div. 246, 76 N. Y. Supp. 213.

A note payable at a time certain cannot be modified by a verbal agreement that it was to be paid when the maker recovered a judgment upon a cause of action held by him. Pringle v. Aston (1918) 37 Cal. App. 409, 174 Pac. 78.

The acceptor of a bill of exchange, who has agreed in his acceptance "to pay when due," cannot show an oral agreement that he would pay when he had funds belonging to the drawer. Sylvester v. Staples (1858) 44 Me. 496.

A purchaser of goods who has given his note for the purchase price, payable at a time stated therein, cannot show an oral agreement that the note was to be paid when the goods were delivered. Block v. Stevens (1902) 72 App. Div. 246, 76 N. Y. Supp. 213.

The payee of a note cannot show an oral agreement that it was payable on a contingency which had occurred, for the purpose of accelerating the due date of the note. Lauth v. Badeaux (1914) 189 Ill. App. 88.

Parol evidence is not competent to show an agreement by the payee of a note that the same might be paid off in instalments. Nalitzky v. Williams (1916) 151 C. C. A. 44, 237 Fed. 802.

An oral agreement is inadmissible to show that a note was not to be paid at the maturity thereof, but was to be extended for an indefinite period. Commercial Nat. Bank v. Hutchinson Box, Board & Paper Co. (1916) 98 Kan. 350, 158 Pac. 44.

Compare with cases discussed in II. a, 2.

c. Relation to consideration.

A number of the foregoing cases which have denied the admissibility of the evidence have done so on the theory that it did not tend to impeach the consideration or show a failure thereof. Penny v. Graves (1850) 12 Ill. 287; Walters v. Smith (1860) 23 Ill. 342; Foy v. Blackstone (1863) 31 Ill. 538, 83 Am. Dec. 246; Harris v. Galbraith (1867) 43 Ill. 309; Miller v. Wella (1867) 46 Ill. 46. And see Georgia cases infra. What is and what is not a failure of consideration is a question of difficulty. The court in Boynton v. Twitty (1874) 53 Ga. 214, says: "It is sometimes difficult to say when the parol evidence offered is a mere explanation of the consideration and when it is an attempt to attach a condition to the contract; and it is hard to reconcile all the cases for this reason. The line of distinction is often so dim that one mind sees the case on one side of it and another mind sees it on the other." Perhaps as good a general test of the admissibility of evidence as can be framed appears in Byrd v. Marietta Fertilizer Co. (1906) 127 Ga. 30, 56 S. E. 86, as follows: "The consideration of a contract may be always inquired into to show that the promise is no longer binding according to its tenor; but, in inquiring into the consideration, the promisor cannot deny that he made the promise evidenced by the writing." The court in Planters' Bank v. Brown (1918) 22 Ga. App. 495, 96 S. E. 328, says the general rule which ordinarily permits the consideration of a written contract to be inquired into where the controversy is between the original parties does not authorize the promisor to alter or deny the terms of the obligation, whereby an unconditional promise is converted into one which is dependent upon the happening of contingencies.

It is beyond the province of this annotation to enter into any exhaustive discussion of what constitutes a failure of consideration. It is the purpose to notice that question only so far as it relates to the question of parol evidence of oral, contemporaneous agreements. In accord with this limitation the following cases, holding that the evidence did not show a failure of consideration so as to render it admissible, are given merely as examples of what constitutes a failure of consideration.

An attempt to show that notes were to be paid only to the extent of the proceeds realized from the sale of fertilizer which had been shipped to the maker does not show merely a failure of consideration, but is an attempt to show that the promise in the writing was not the promise really made. Byrd v. Marietta Fertilizer Co. (Ga.) supra.

Evidence of an agreement that a note was not to be paid if other persons did not claim interest on other notes has nothing to do with the consideration of the note in question. Penny v. Graves (1850) 12 Ill. 287.

An oral agreement between the creditors of a debtor, under which one of them gave his note for the amount of the indebtedness, that he should not pay the note except in so far as he should collect the money from accounts of the debtor assigned to him, and that he should be liable to pay the note only as fast as the collections would enable him to do so, states a fact which does not prove a want or failure of consideration for the note, but is an attempt to vary the terms thereof. Walters v. Smith (1860) 23 Ill. 342.

An oral agreement by one who accepted the delivery of slaves sold to another and the vendor, that a note given by the person thus accepting the delivery should be surrendered upon the return of the purchaser of the slaves and the giving of his note, does not impeach the consideration of the note, for the slaves were delivered to the maker. The vendor parted with his property in them on the face of the note, and it is immaterial to whom the benefit accrued, whether to the actual purchaser or to the maker of the note. This is a matter that must be adjusted between them. Harris v. Galbraith (1867) 43 Ill. 309.

There is no failure of consideration where an administratrix who had a claim against certain persons, being desirous of realizing a part thereof, applied to them for that purpose, and they agreed that if she would execute a note, with security, they would secure for her that sum,—by the time the note matured, they would pay her upon the demand she held against them in a sum sufficient to pay the note,—where she admits having received the sum of money mentioned in the note from the payees thereof. Miller v. Wells (1867) 46 Ill. 46.

An oral agreement that the maker of a note given upon the purchase of a patent washing machine was not to pay any money on the note except such as should be realized from sales of the machine, does not pertain to the consideration of the note, but goes to its validity. De Long v. Lee (1887) 73 Iowa, 53, 34 N. W. 618.

Where a note is given to an attorney in payment of his services in a certain case, and there is no failure or unwillingness on his part to render the services, but he is precluded from doing so by the compromise of the suit, an oral agreement that the note was not to be paid in the event of a compromise cannot be shown, on the theory that it shows a failure of consideration. Dale v. Pope (1823) 4 Litt. (Ky.) 166.

There is no absolute and total failure of consideration for a note which was given by the purchaser of personal property on which there was a chattel mortgage, to the holder of the chattel mortgage, where the chattel mortgage and promissory notes, which had indorsers against whom it would be enforceable, were assigned to such purchaser. Central Sav. Bank v. O'Connor (1903) 132 Mich. 578, 102 Am. St. Rep. 433, 94 N. W. 11, s. c. on 2d appeal (1905) 139 Mich. 82, 102 N. W. 280.

No failure of consideration is shown in an action on a note given by a purchaser of corporate stock, who had an agreement with the corporation to sell its stock on commission, when the defendant was unable to sell sufficient stock to enable him to pay the note from the commissions, the note was not to be paid, but the stock returned and the note canceled, and that he had not been able to sell sufficient stock. Denman v. Kaplan (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 205 S. W. 739.

IV. Evidence held admissible on the theory of partial integration.

The principle of evidence is well settled that the parol-evidence rule, excluding parol evidence to contradict or vary the terms of a written instrument, does not apply where the entire agreement of the parties has not been reduced to writing, to exclude parol evidence of the part not in writing. This exception has been stated in various ways. Greenleaf, after referring to certain other exceptions to the parol-evidence rule, says in vol. 1, § 284a: "Nor does the rule apply in cases where the original contract was verbal and entire and a part only of it was reduced to writing." Wigmore, after referring to the cases in which a certain part of the transaction has been embodied in a single writing, but another part has been left in some other form, says: "Here, obviously, the rule against disputing the terms of the document will be applicable to so much of the transaction as is so embodied, but not to the remainder." 4 Wigmore, Ev. p. 3425, § 2430. Chamberlayne, in his discussion in the Modern Law of Evidence, says, vol. 5, § 3553, that "evidence of a prior or contemporaneous parol agreement or understanding is frequently received where it is consistent with the writing in question, and it is apparent that the instrument was not intended as a complete embodiment of the undertaking."

Whether the writing which appears as a memorial of the transaction exclusively represents the terms of the transaction as an embodiment of the entire transaction is a question of intention; and, being such, the application of the rule to specific facts is one of difficulty. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 805f; 4 Wigmore, Ev. p. 3425, § 2430. Obviously, however, parol evidence cannot be introduced on the theory of partial integration to affect a part of the contract which is actually put in writing. This is a condition of the rule as stated by all of the above authorities. Applying this to a bill or note, it would seem that any agreement that would defeat the obligation of the note and make it conditional would contradict the part of the agreement which is put in writing in the unconditional obligation evidenced by the note.

It must be admitted, however, as will appear from the subsequent cases, that this conclusion is not sustained, for in many of the cases the unconditional obligation of a note has been contradicted and varied by parol evidence of an agreement that makes the obligation conditional, on the theory of partial integration.

On the theory that there had been only a partial integration, parol evidence of a prior or contemporaneous oral agreement was admitted in Pryor v. Ludden & B. S. Music House (1910) 184 Ga. 288, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 267, 67 S. E. 654, holding that where a note recites that it is given in consideration of the purchase price of a particular described piano, in a suit thereon by the promisee, the maker may plead in defense of the action that the plaintiff represented that the piano was new and capable of being used as a musical instrument, and that the defendant, acting on this representation and warranty, and without actual or constructive knowledge of its true condition, bought it, when in point of fact it is worthless and second hand, and not capable of being used as a musical instrument. This case is approved in International Harvester Co. v. Morgan (1917) 19 Ga. App. 716, 92 S. E. 35.

Although, under the rule stated in Pryor v. Ludden & B. S. Music House (Ga.) supra, a plea setting up a breach of an oral warranty can be maintained in a suit on a purchase-money note which, though reciting the consideration, fails to integrate within itself the terms of the sale agreement, where the note sued on recites that, "in consideration of such renewal and extension of time of payment, I hereby expressly waive all claims arising out of the purchase of said property and all defenses, statutory or otherwise, to the payment thereof," this provision of the agreement is a waiver of any express or implied warranties relative to the subject-matter of the sale, with the effect that all previous and contemporaneous representations and warranties are merged into and controlled by the instrument. Anderson v. International Harvester Co. (1921) — Ga. App. —, 109 S. E. 417.

The maker of a note given for the purchase price of a horse may show an oral agreement that the note should be returned if the horse died. Barlow v. Flemming (1844) 6 Ala. 146. According to the court: "The note given as the price of the horse does not necessarily refer to the contract of sale, or contain, any of its terms. In itself it is a mere promise to pay, and its consideration was a proper subject of inquiry, whether shown by parol or in writing."

In an action by a bank upon a note signed by one of its stockholders, the defendant was permitted to plead and prove an agreement between the bank, which had suffered a loss causing a deficit in its capital, and the stockholders, that each stockholder should execute to the bank a promissory note for the face value of each share of stock held by him, and if any part of the money so lost to the bank should be recovered, the amount thereof should be credited pro rata on the several notes executed by the stockholders, and that the bank had collected stated amounts of the deficit, and that the proportion thereof due the defendant under the agreement was sufficient to reduce his liability to a stated amount, and tendered the balance. The court says that the note did not purport to express the entire antecedent contract out of which it sprang, and that contract was therefore not merged into it. Two of the judges dissent on the theory that an absolute, unconditional promissory note cannot be changed into a conditional obligation by parol evidence in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake. Thompson v. Citizens' Bank (1915) 144 Ga. 10, 85 S. E. 1002.

In an action to recover a balance of the purchase price of a binder, in which notes given by the purchaser were introduced in evidence to prove plaintiffs' case, the maker may show a breach of warranty, and that the machine delivered was not equal to the sample by means of which the sale was made. Gammon v. Ganfield (1890) 42 Minn. 368, 44 N. W. 125.

The maker of a note given for the purchase price of corporate stock may show an oral agreement that, at any time he ceased to be a director of the corporation, or should desire to return or resell the stock, the corporation would take it back and surrender to him his note. Germania Bank v. Osborne (1900) 81 Minn. 272, 83 N. W. 1084.

A purchaser of cattle from a dealer, who has given his note for a balance due on the purchase price, may show an agreement that he should pasture the cattle, and at a later date sell them through the dealer, who was to apply the proceeds on the note, and pay the maker any overplus, but the maker was not to pay any deficiency. Drovers Cattle Loan & Invest. Co. v. McGraw (1921) — Minn. —, 184 N. W. 365.

It has been held competent for the purchaser of a stock of goods for the purchase price of which he gave his two notes, to show an oral agreement that, later on, the vendor and payee of the notes would enter into the business as an equal partner, in consideration of one of the notes, which he would deliver up to the maker. Henry v. McCardell (1897) 15 Tex. Civ. App. 497, 40 S. W. 172. Such an agreement, according to the court, is consistent with the notes.

In Hopper v. Eiland (1852) 21 Ala. 714, where a written contract for the payment of money was drawn up, but did not actually represent the contract between the parties, and the payee, who was in a hurry, proposed to the maker that if he would sign the instrument, they would meet at some future time, when convenient, and execute another instrument which should contain the terms of the contract as then agreed upon, the court held that, for want of an absolute, unconditional delivery, the paper never had the character and qualities of a note so as to make it evidence as such for any purpose. No objection was made in the court below to the parol evidence going to vary a written instrument, and the supreme court held that the objection could not be noticed in that court, but it is said that if the objection had been made, the court would have been disposed to consider it untenable under the proof in the case.

In Rahe v. Yett (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 164 S. W. 80, a defense to an action on a check, that it was to be paid by goods to be furnished the payee by the drawer, was held a proper one, but on the theory that the check was given as part of a more comprehensive transaction, the terms of which were not permitted to be expressed in writing, so that proof of the parts not reduced to writing was admissible; and further, because the check was not given in final settlement of the account between the parties, but with the distinct understanding that a further settlement would be had at a future time.

See Oakland Cemetery Asso. v. Lakins (1904) 126 Iowa, 121, 101 N. W. 778, 3 Ann. Cas. 559, infra, VII. c.

In North Carolina the maker of a note or acceptor of a bill is held entitled to show an oral agreement that he was to pay the same only in a certain event, on the theory of partial integration. Penniman v. Alexander (1892) 111 N. C. 427, 16 S. E. 408; Quin v. Sexton (1899) 125 N. C. 447, 34 S. E. 542; Evans v. Freeman (1906) 142 N. C. 61, 54 S. E. 847; Martin v. Mask (1912) 158 N. C. 436, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 641, 74 S. E. 343; Kernodle v. Williams (1910) 153 N. C. 475, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 934, 69 S. E. 431; Kernodle v. Kernodle (1917) 174 N. C. 441, 93 S. E. 956; Farmington v. McNeill (1917) 174 N. C. 420, 93 S. E. 957.

And see Parker v. Bond (1898) 121 Ala. 529, 25 So. 898, and Gillespie v.

Hester (1909) 160 Ala. 444, 49 So. 580, supra, II. a, 5,—cases which more nearly involve such failure of consideration.

The facts involved in these cases illustrate the broad way in which this principle has been applied.

An owner of land for whom a contractor is erecting houses, who has accepted an order of the contractor in favor of a materialman, may show an oral agreement that he was only to pay the acceptance in case he became indebted to the contractor for the amount thereof. Penniman v. Alexander (1892) 111 N. C. 427, 16 S. E. 408.

One of two coadventurers in a real estate speculation to whom a note for the purchase money of the real estate sold by them was given, and who executed his sealed note to his coadventurer for the coadventurer's share in the transaction, may show an oral agreement that the sealed note was only to show the payee's part of the price for which the land had been sold, and that the note was to be paid out of the purchase money when received from the purchaser of the land, and that it was not to be paid until the purchase money was paid, that no part of the purchase money had ever been paid and never would be paid, as the purchaser was insolvent, and nothing was to be made out of him by legal process. Quin v. Sexton (1899) 125 N. C. 447, 34 S. E. 542.

The purchaser of the right to sell a patent device, who has executed his bond for the purchase price, was held entitled to show an agreement that payment of the bond was to be made out of the proceeds of the sale of the patent right for which it was given, and if there were no such sales, there was to be no payment. Evans v. Freeman (1906) 142 N. C. 61, 54 S. E. 847. It is stated that where only part of the contract has been reduced to writing, and the other part has been left in parol, it is competent to establish the latter part by oral evidence, provided it does not conflict with what has been written.

A daughter and her husband, who have given a bond to her father, may show an oral agreement that the makers were to pay a certain amount upon the bond, which had been paid, and that the balance thereof was to be accounted for in settlement with the father's estate as an advancement, and that no part thereof was to be paid to his executors unless needed to pay debts of the estate. Kernodle v. Williams (1910) 153 N. C. 475, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 934, 69 S. E. 431. A similar decision on similar facts appears in Kernodle v. Kernodle (1917) 174 N. C. 441, 93 S. E. 956.

The maker of a note may show that the note was executed on the distinct understanding and agreement between the maker and payee, and as a part of the agreement, that the maker should pay the note only in the event that a named person recovered certain lands in a pending action. Farrington v. McNeill (1917) 174 N. C. 420, 93 S. E. 957.

Parol evidence was held admissible in Martin v. Mask (1912) 158 N. C. 436, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 641, 74 S. E. 343, in an action on rent notes, to show an agreement that the maker would pay said notes which were given for the house in which he was to reside and did reside during his stay in the city, but that, if he was required to leave the city, he was to pay no other note, and would surrender the possession of the house to the payee.

An oral agreement that a note was to be surrendered in a certain event has been held competent. Braswell v. Pope (1880) 82 N. C. 57. In this case the maker of a note was held entitled to show an oral agreement that the payee was to accept the assignment of a judgment upon its recovery by the maker, and a mortgage held by the maker for its security, and surrender to the maker his note, and pay the difference, if any, in money.

Executors who have given a note for a debt of their testator may show an oral agreement by the payee to allow the proceeds of certain cotton as a credit on the note. Kerchner v. McRae (1879) 80 N.C. 219.

The court in Germania Bank v. Osborne (1900) 81 Minn. 272, 83 N. W. 1984, said: "In what respect written contracts may be affected by parol testimony is a problem frequently confronting the practitioner and demanding the attention of the courts, and in respect to that particular phase of its application involved in the case before us able courts have arrived at different conclusions. We should first determine what the contract was between these parties, and what relation the note bears to it. The contract was, in substance, a sale of the stock in consideration of the execution and delivery of the note, coupled with the right to return the stock and take up the note. The note expresses only the method of payment in case the maker did not exercise the right to return the stock. The note is in terms just what the parties agreed it should be. The contract preceded the execution and delivery of the note, and the note was executed and delivered as a result of the contract, not as itself the contract. The consideration for the note was the stock, provided the maker exercised the option to retain it. The consideration for the delivery of the stock was the payment of $400, according to the terms of the note, provided the maker exercised the same option. Although the whole transaction was an entirety, and the agreement for the sale was, in a sense, contemporaneous with the execution of the note, yet the parties did not reduce the agreement for the sale to writing in the terms of the note."

In Drovers' Cattle, Loan, & Invest. Co. v. McGraw (1921) — Minn. —, 184 N. W. 365, an action to recover a balance said to be owing upon a promissory note, in which the maker claimed that the note was given for a balance due upon a purchase of cattle under an agreement that he was to pasture the cattle during the summer and return them in the fall for sale by the vendors, who would apply the proceeds on the note and pay him any overplus, but that he was not liable for any deficiency, the court, after stating that the maker performed all the conditions of the agreement, said: "The note never became operative beyond the amount the cattle might bring in the fall. It was delivered and held in the nature of a pledge that the agreement would be performed. The note expresses only the method of payment in case the maker failed to keep her contract. . . . The evidence is admissible where the note was given as a part of a larger transaction, the facts with reference to which give an independent right to defeat recovery."

To admit such evidence is according to the court in Kernodle v. Williams (1910) 153 N. C. 475, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 934, 69 S. E. 431, "not varying, altering, or contradicting the written instrument, but merely showing forth the entire contract that was made." The court says further: "If the entire contract, as set up by the defendants which the jury find to be true, had been made entirely in writing, or entirely oral, there would have been no difficulty in holding it valid. For instance, a mortgage on its face is a conveyance of land with a further clause providing for a condition upon which it is a nullity, or under which the land may be sold. The latter part is not held to contradict the former, though in no event is the instrument really a conveyance. So, also, with a penal bond which is generally in a large sum, with a condition annexed by which it is of no effect unless a certain event happens, and even then the obligor is usually called on to pay a much smaller sum. There are many other instances which might be given of a like nature."

The foregoing North Carolina cases are difficult to harmonize with other decisions in this state. See International Harvester Co. v. Parham (1916) 172 N. C. 389, 90 S. E. 503, supra, III. b; Cherokee County v. Meroney (1917) 173 N. C. 653, 92 S. E. 616, supra, III. b; and Acme Mfg. Co. v. McCormick (1918) 175 N. C. 277, L.R.A. 1918F, 572, 95 S. E. 555, supra, III. b.

V. Evidence held admissible on the theory of discharge or payment.

Parol evidence of an agreement that makes the note conditional has been admitted on the theory that a compliance with the agreement discharges or pays the note.

In an action brought to enforce an alleged vendor's lien upon land conveyed by the plaintiff to the defendant, for which the latter gave notes, the defendant may prove that the conveyance was made in consideration of his agreement to support the grantor during his life, and that the notes sued on were given to secure the performance of this agreement on his part, and that he had performed the same, since the admission of such evidence would not violate the rule which forbids the introduction of parol evidence to contradict or vary a written contract. If the notes were given to secure the execution by the grantee of a promise to support and take care of the grantor, and that promise was fulfilled, the notes were discharged, and parol evidence is admissible to prove that a written agreement has been totally discharged. Howard v. Stratton (1884) 64 Cal. 487, 2 Pac. 263.

In an action by the administrator of the payee of a note, the maker was permitted to show that it was given upon a family settlement for the reversionary interest of the payee in the one third of an estate subject to dower, under an oral agreement that the interest should be applied to the widow's support, and the principal, also, if the interest proved insufficient, and if, at the death of the widow, the whole amount should have been exhausted, then the maker should pay nothing. Crosman v. Fuller (1835) 17 Pick. (Mass.) 171. The theory of the court seems to have been that supplies furnished by the defendant to the widow were, by the consent of the payee, applied towards the note, and as they exceeded the note, there was a payment thereof. The equities of this case seem to have influenced the decision very much, together with the fact the payee of the note, a short time before his death, recognized that it had been paid in the manner above indicated.

Evidence of an oral agreement between the maker and payee of a note given in satisfaction of an injury done the payee by the circulation of false reports, that if the maker would make it appear to the satisfaction of the payee that he did not originate the report, the payee would give up the note, was held competent in Sanders v. Howe (1821) 1 D. Chip. (Vt.) 363, on the theory that the evidence did not contradict the note, but proved that the parties had agreed on a mode by which the defendant might satisfy the note by the performance of a future act. According to the court, when that act was performed the note was as clearly paid and satisfied as though the defendant had paid the amount in money. See Farnham v. Ingham (1833) 5 Vt. 514, supra, III. b; and see Bradley v. Bentley (1836) 8 Vt. 243, supra, III. b, and other cases there cited.

A note given by an insolvent debtor to one of his creditors may be shown to have been given on the oral agreement that if the debtor made his settlement (apparently meaning a compromise with his creditors), the note was to be held for nothing. Bissenger v. Guiteman Bros. & Co. (1871) 6 Heisk. (Tenn.) 277. This is upon the theory that the evidence did not vary the note, but proved that it was discharged.

The successor in office of a postmaster, who purchased certain letter boxes, drawers, and other furniture in the postoffice, and gave his note for the purchase price thereof, can show an oral agreement that each one should have and receive his proportionate share of the rents of boxes and drawers for the then current quarter, which had been collected by the retiring officer, and that as soon as this was definitely ascertained, the amount thereof should apply in liquidation of the note. According to the court, such an agreement does not contradict or vary the terms of the written instrument. The agreement does not tend to show that the sum named in the note was not absolutely to become due and payable, but "the effect of the agreement would merely tend to show that at the time the note was given, it was understood that a portion was to be paid in a particular manner, and had been so paid." Jones v. Keyes (1863) 16 Wis. 562. Compare with Gregory v. Hart (1858) 7 Wis. 532, supra, III. b.

It has been held in an action against sureties on a note that parol evidence is competent to show an agreement on the part of the payee of the note, which was secured by mortgage, that, in case of default and foreclosure of the mortgage, the money derived from the sale of the property should be applied upon the note on which the defendants were sureties, where a default, foreclosure, and sale had taken place, but the money received had been applied on other notes. Continental Gin Co. v. Stocker (1916) 235 Fed. 1005, reversed on other grounds in (1917) 157 C. C. A. 535, 245 Fed. 343. Such evidence, according to the court, does not "seek to alter or change or modify the contract" signed by the defendants, but shows "facts from which they contend that the debt has been partly paid." It is further stated that if the money had not been actually received by the payee of the notes from the foreclosure, the evidence would be inadmissible.

A purchaser of property who has executed his notes for the purchase price, one to an agent of the owner and another to a third person, may show that, at the time of the execution of the notes, the owner of the property was indebted to the maker on an account, and that the agent, as agent of the owner and of the third person to whom the one note was made payable, agreed that the note should be paid by being credited and offset with the account. Bennett v. Tillmon (1896) 18 Mont. 28, 44 Pac. 80. Such an agreement, according to the court, in no way altered or changed or varied the terms of the note. It was only a reservation of the right by the maker to pay them by setting up the indebtedness of the owner of the property due him as a counterclaim.

There was an equal division of the court in Long v. Potts (1912) 70 W. Va. 719, 75 S. E. 62, as to whether sureties on a note could show an oral agreement that they were to execute the note as sureties for the principal debtor for twenty days, and that, within that time, the payee would procure from the principal debtor a deed of trust for the benefit of the payee and in exoneration and indemnification of the sureties. Brannon and Williams, JJ., were of the opinion that this evidence could not be heard, as it was a violation of the parol-evidence rule, while Poffenbarger and Miller, JJ., held that it was admissible as a collateral arrangement for discharge of the note, not violative of the parol-evidence rule. According to the latter two judges the sureties were liable only in the event of failure of the principal to give the deed of trust within the specified time.

In some cases it is held merely that an oral agreement that certain sums shall, when determined, be credited on the note, is admissible, without any clear theory as to the admissibility.

Where the payee of a note was indebted to the maker in varying sums when the note sued on was given, and such indebtedness was not then liquidated, an oral agreement that the sums so due would be credited on the note, when determined, is admissible. John Lucas & Co. v. Bradley (1917) 158 C. C. A. 649, 246 Fed. 693. The court in this case says generally, that there are many cases in which the maker of a note may prove a collateral agreement or other fact which relieves him from liability; that such proof does not vary or contradict the written note, but shows independently that it is not a binding obligation. The credit claimed here was set up as counterclaim in an action on the note.

VI. Pennsylvania decisions.

a. Holding the evidence admissible.

The parol-evidence rule, as generally interpreted, has been stated not to exist in Pennsylvania. As expressed in one case, the policy was "adopted in this state at a very early period, and since steadfastly adhered to, of excepting out of the operation of the English rule excluding parol evidence to vary, contradict, or alter a written contract, cases where a contemporaneous parol promise is proposed to be shown, on the faith of which the contract was executed. . . . And so we have it settled in Pennsylvania beyond all dispute 'that where, at the execution of a writing, a stipulation has been entered into, a condition annexed, or a promise made by word of mouth, upon the faith of which the writing has been executed, parol evidence is admissible, though it may vary and materially change the terms of the contract.' " Croyle v. Cambria Land & Improv. Co. (1912) 233 Pa. 310, 82 Atl. 360, quoting from Greenawalt v. Kohne (1877) 85 Pa. 369. The Pennsylvania decisions, however, show quite conclusively that the courts of this state have acquired no very high degree of steadfastness in following the rule that the court in Croyle v. Cambria Land & Improv. Co. supra, regards as so well settled. In fact, quite as many of the decisions in this state have held the oral agreement inadmissible to vary or explain the note as have held it admissible. Some of the latter decisions can probably be reconciled with the rule stated by the court in Croyle v. Cambria Land & Improv. Co.; at least, by indulging in some extremely attenuated distinctions; but others cannot be reconciled. The cases which hold the evidence admissible will be first discussed.

Evidence of the class hereinafter discussed in VII., to the effect that the note was given only for some special purpose, but was in no event to take effect as a note, has been held admissible. The surety may show that he signed notes under the assurance of the payee that his signing was a mere matter of form,—that he would not be held liable on the notes. Miller v. Henderson (1823) 10 Serg. & R. 290. The indorser of a note may show that he was not to be held liable on his indorsement,—that the indorsement was a mere matter of form,—that the payee would look alone to security given. Cake v. Potts- ville Bank (1887) 116 Pa. 264, 2 Am. St. Rep. 600, 9 Atl. 302. A subagent for an automobile, who, upon the return of a sample car to the agent, gave a note representing depreciation, etc., on the car, may show an oral agreement that the note was not to be retained by the agent, and no part of it was to be claimed in money, but that the note was to be used to straighten up the agent's books and to credit the subagent with the return of the automobile, and was to be returned upon the release of liability by the manufacturer. Martz v. W. H. Wilcox Co. (1914) 57 Pa. Super. Ct. 169. A purchaser of land who has given a bond secured by mortgage may show an oral agreement that the obligee in the bond would look alone to the mortgage security,—that there should be no personal liability on the bond. Greenawalt v. Kohne (1877) 85 Pa. 369.

Evidence of an agreement to return property and cancel or return the note has been held admissible. A purchaser of land who has given his bond, secured by mortgage for the purchase price, may show an oral agreement of the vendor to take back the property on certain conditions. Ibid. In an action on a note in Fischer v. Dalmas (1896) 173 Pa. 296, 34 Atl. 435, an affidavit of defense which alleged that the maker of the note purchased a piano and gave the note for the purchase price under an agreement that if he could not pay the note, or desired to surrender the instrument, the payee would take the same back again and surrender and cancel the note, was held sufficient to prevent judgment being entered against the defendant for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense. Evidence of an agreement that the payee would, in a certain contingency, release the maker from all obligations on the note, is admissible where the payee is seeking to enforce it. Faux v. Fitler (1909) 223 Pa. 568, 132 Am. St. Rep. 742, 72 Atl. 891, holding, in an action of assumpsit by a payee against the maker of a note, that parol evidence is admissible to show that the parties ventured into stock speculation, and that the note was given to evidence the maker's share in the partnership, and that it was agreed "in the event of the investment proving a loss, involving wholly the amounts to be advanced by the plaintiff, he would release the defendant from all obligations assumed by defendant under and by virtue of" the note; and that, but for this agreement, the maker would not have signed or delivered the note. Upon a second appeal of this case (1911) 232 Pa. 33, 81 Atl. 91, the evidence produced by the maker of the note was held insufficient to sustain his plea, and a recovery for the plaintiff was sustained. After referring to the testimony of the maker, in general, the court concludes that he "nowhere in his testimony states that he ever said to the plaintiff or that the plaintiff said to him that the notes were not to be paid according to the terms of the written contracts. It is a very usual thing when one friend lends money to another and requests a note as an acknowledgment to remark, as a matter of politeness, that the written promise to pay is merely taken as a memorandum of the transaction, to cover the contingency of death. The testimony of the defendant concerning the making of the notes in suit would be entirely consistent with such an incident." In an action on a note given in settlement of a charge of bastardy against one of the makers, oral evidence of an agreement that, in case the child died, the note should not be paid, is admissible. Hill v. Shucker (1863) 1 Woodw. Dec. 251. One of the makers of a note may show that he signed it upon the promise and assurance of an oral agreement that, if he paid his own personal share of the indebtedness and interest thereon within one year, his entire liability should thereby be discharged. Reed v. Kuntz (1908) 17 Pa. Dist. R. 365. An affidavit of defense filed in an action on a note, to the effect that the note was given and accepted as a guaranty for the payment of certain money loaned by the plaintiff to a mining company in which both the plaintiff and the defendants were alike financially interested, and that the makers of the note were to be called on to pay only in the event that the mining company was unable, and then only such amount as was not recoverable from the company, was held sufficient to prevent judgment. Marquis v. McKay (1907) 216 Pa. 307, 65 Atl. 678. An affidavit of defense to an action on a promissory note which stated that the maker of the note was in negotiation with a third party to buy or take from him in trade certain unfinished houses where they should be clear of liens and encumbrances, and the payee, a creditor of the third party, learning of such negotiation, importuned the defendant to give him a note in part payment of the third party's indebtedness to him, which the defendant at first refused to do, but finally consented on the express agreement and understanding that he would not be liable to pay the note unless the arrangement with the third party should be consummated before the maturity thereof, and that the third party had failed on his part to complete the transaction,—was held to state a defense, in Elliott v. Adams (1876) 3 W. N. C. 44.

So, evidence of an agreement that the payee shall look for payment to a special fund is admissible where such agreement constituted a part of the consideration, or operated as an inducement for entering into the contract. While this rule is affirmed in Alexander v. Righter (1913) 240 Pa. 22, 87 Atl. 427, in that case the payee of the note took his action on an alleged promise to pay aside from the note, and it is stated by the court that "where the written engagement is not sued upon, but comes collaterally into a case, the rule against the admission of parol evidence to vary a written contract has no control." A railroad contractor who has taken over a contract from a prior contractor, who had become insolvent, and through whom, upon the completion of the contract, certain money which had been withheld from the prior contractor would be paid, who executed a note to a creditor of the prior contractor, may show, when sued on the note, that there was an express agreement that the note should be payable only out of the fund earned by the prior contractor, which he, the maker of the note, would receive on the completion of the work, and that payment of it should not be demanded before that time. Forcite Powder Co. v. Howley (1909) 40 Pa. Super. Ct. 412.

Evidence of an oral agreement that the note was not to be paid until the happening of a certain event is admissible. One who, after lending money to a corporation, gives his note for corporate stock to the president, who induces him to make the loan and take the stock on the agreement that he will not be called upon to pay his note until the loan is repaid by the corporation, may set up such agreement as a defense to a suit on the note by the original payee. Gandy v. Weckerly (1908) 220 Pa. 285, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 434, 123 Am. St. Rep. 691, 69 Atl. 858. Evidence is admissible in an action by a loan association upon a bond and mortgage to show a parol agreement that the bond was not to be paid until the amount due on a first mortgage given by the defendant had been paid by the maturing of certain stock for which he had subscribed in the building and loan association, at which time the defendant would have the option of taking out additional shares of stock in the association to the amount of the bond and mortgage, and of having the loan changed to one secured by a building association mortgage, with the additional stock as collateral. Excelsior Sav. Fund & L. Assn. v. Fox (1916) 253 Pa. 257, 98 Atl. 593. It was alleged by the defendant that he did not read the bond and mortgage at the time of their execution, and that he was not informed that the papers were not drawn in accordance with the parol agreement, and that, but for the promise which was sought to be shown by parol, the writing would not have been executed. The acceptor of a draft may show that it was not to be payable until certain houses, being built by him, were completed. Leary v. Meredith (1878) 5 W. N. C. 37. An affidavit of defense which set out a parol agreement made at the time of drawing the note, that, if the defendant could not meet it at maturity, he was to have two years from date, and was not to be pressed until the expiration of that time; that it was only on account of this agreement that the note was given,—was held to prevent a judgment for want of sufficient affidavits of defense, in National Bank v. Jones (1881) 10 W. N. C. 436.

The purchaser of land who has given notes secured by trust deed for the unpaid part of the purchase price may show in defense of the notes a contemporaneous parol agreement on the faith of which the notes were signed, that the land was to be at once reconveyed to a trustee, who should hold it as security for the sum due upon the notes, and who should exhaust the security thus furnished before the payment of the notes should be required of the maker. Clinch Valley Coal & I. Co. v. Willing (1897) 180 Pa. 165, 57 Am. St. Rep. 626, 35 Atl. 737.

An affidavit of defense which set up that mutual accounts existed between the maker and the payee of the notes, and that, upon the execution of the notes, it was agreed that an account should be furnished, and that, if the full amount of the notes was not due the payee, he should provide payment pro tanto, or for the whole sum, as the case might be, when the notes reached maturity, was held to prevent judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense. Corr v. Kelly (1874) 1 W. N. C. 387.

The theory of these cases is that it is a fraud to secure the execution of an instrument by representations as to the payment different from those contained in the instrument, and then attempt to compel compliance with the terms of the instrument. Gandy v. Weckerly (1908) 220 Pa. 285, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 434, 123 Am. St. Rep. 691, 69 Atl. 858. The fraudulent intent, however, need not have existed at the time of the execution of the writing, under this rule; if the parol modification is subsequently denied, it is such a fraud as will, under the rule, operate to let in evidence of the real intent, to the final conclusion of the parties. Excelsior Sav. Fund & L. Asso. v. Fox, and Gandy v. Weckerly, supra.

In Clinch Valley Coal & I. Co. v. Willing, supra, the court said: "The existence of a contemporaneous parol agreement between the parties, under the influence of which a note or contract had been signed which is violated as soon as it has accomplished its purpose in securing the execution of the paper, may always be shown when the enforcement of the paper is attempted. It is a plain fraud to secure the execution of an instrument by representations as to the manner in which payment shall be made differing in important particulars from those contained in the paper, and, after the paper has been signed, attempt to compel literal compliance with its terms, regardless of the contemporaneous agreement without which it would never have been signed at all."

But in Fuller v. Law (1903) 207 Pa. 101, 56 Atl. 333, the court says that "it is straining both legal and moral definitions to call the mere failure to perform an oral promise to accept payment in a particular form a fraud; dishonest it may be, but it is no more a legal fraud than immediate collection of a past-due debt on which the creditor has orally promised the debtor indulgence."

b. Holding the evidence inadmissible.

Many of the cases holding the evidence admissible insist upon the fact that the execution of the note was induced by the oral promise or agreement. This, however, seems to be little more than a matter of pleading, for, in practically every case in which the oral agreement is relied upon as modifying the writing, the maker of the note can truthfully say that he relied upon the oral agreement, or was induced thereby to execute the writing. On this theory, however, some of the cases denying the admissibility of the evidence are harmonized with those admitting the evidence. One who has received a note for collection from the owner, and who has given his note for the amount of the note thus received, cannot relieve himself from liability on his note by showing that it was never intended as evidence of a debt, but simply as an acknowledgment that he received a note of equal amount from the payee for collection. Phillips v. Meily (1884) 106 Pa. 536. The court here makes an attempt to distinguish the case from the earlier cases, saying that parol evidence is admissible where there has been fraud, accident, or mistake in the creation of the instrument itself, and also where there has been an attempt to make fraudulent use of the instrument in violation of a promise or agreement, made at the time the instrument was signed, and without which it would not have been executed. It is then stated that there is not a word to show that the note in suit was signed by the defendant upon the faith of any assurance or promise on the part of the plaintiff that he would not proceed to collect it, or use or treat it as a promissory note. In Anspach v. Bast (1865) 52 Pa. 356, 12 Mor. Min. Rep. 110, a parol agreement, made contemporaneously with the note, that it should not mature absolutely until six months, according to its terms, was held inadmissible; the court stating that no case goes to the length of ruling that parol evidence is admissible to change the promise itself without proof or even allegation of fraud or mistake. According to the court in Patton v. Fox (1903) 22 Pa. Super. Ct. 416, a contemporaneous agreement, in order to avail the maker of a note, must not only be the basis of its execution, but it must be exclusively set forth as the moving cause to induce the execution of the written contract, and the circumstances must be such that the enforcement of the contract would be a fraud on the maker. The question usually arises in this state upon the sufficiency of an affidavit of defense.

The decision in some of the cases denying the admissibility of the evidence may be explained by reason of the omission of an averment in the affidavit of defense that the maker was induced to sign the note by reason of the oral stipulation. For instance, in Appleby v. Barrett (1905) 28 Pa. Super. Ct. 349, where the maker of a note filed an affidavit of defense alleging an oral agreement that the note should be given merely as a memorandum, and that it was distinctly understood between him and the payee that it was to be paid out of his share of the profits of certain business transactions. This defense was held insufficient because the affidavit contained no averment that the defendant was induced to sign the note by reason of the oral stipulation. In Weaver v. Paul (1895) 16 Pa. Co. Ct. 471, the court, after stating that there was neither allegation nor proof that the form of the note was due to fraud, mistake, or accident, nor that its execution was induced by a promise which would be broken if recovery should be permitted, says that therefore, under nearly all the authorities, parol agreement that the note should be an oral agreement cannot be proved by the testimony of the maker of the note alone is held in Fuller v. Law (1903) 207 Pa. 101, 56 Atl. 333,—a case in which the purchaser of stock, who has given his note for the unpaid part of the purchase price, was attempting to show a contemporaneous parol agreement that the note should be paid out of dividends on the stock, and that, if the dividends failed to pay the purchase price in six years, he need not pay the note at all.

The court in Clinch Valley Coal & I. Co. v. Willing (1897) 180 Pa. 165, 57 Am. St. Rep. 626, 36 Atl. 737, says of Clarke v. Allen (1890) 132 Pa. 40, 16 Atl. 1071, and Ziegler v. McFarland (1892) 147 Pa. 607, 23 Atl. 1045, infra, that in these cases the agreement set up was wholly inconsistent with the terms of the note; the written contract, and the alleged parol contract set up as an inducement to its execution, were so inconsistent that both could not stand; and that, in the case before the court in Clinch Valley Coal & I. Co. v. Willing, this was not true.

And see distinction made in Second Nat. Bank v. Yeager (1920) 268 Pa. 167, 111 Atl. 159, infra.

The court in Fuller v. Law (1903) 207 Pa. 101, 56 Atl. 333, says: "There is no doubt that there is much apparent and some real conflict in the numerous cases involving the question as to when parol testimony is admissible in contradiction of written instruments."

Enough has been said to show that there is some real conflict in the decisions in this state. Without further attempts to harmonize the decisions, the cases denying the admissibility of the evidence will now be set out. Anyone interested in pursuing the subject further will find a valuable discussion of the rule in this state in American Law Reg. (1904) (52 O. S. 43 N. S.) p. 601.

Evidence has been held inadmissible to show that there was to be a liability only in a certain event. A stockbroker who has sold stock on deferred payments, and who has given his note to the owners for the amount of the purchase price, cannot show, in defense of an action on the note, an oral agreement that he was not to be liable on the note except in the event that he should receive from the purchaser of the stock the money due thereon. American Baptist Publication Soc. v. Erb (1887) 44 Phila. Leg. Int. 144. In Hacker v. National Oil Ref. Co. (1873) 73 Pa. 93, 13 Mor. Min. Rep. 538, a purchaser of stock who gave her note for the purchase price was held not entitled to show an oral agreement that she should subscribe for the stock, providing she received a sum of money from a debtor, and that the debtor paid no part of the sum, whereupon she declined to take the stock, and notified the corporation. An affidavit by the defendant in an action on the note, that the money for which the note was given was a loan to a third person, and that the maker was not to be held responsible except upon a contingency was held not to be a defense in Rodgers v. Donovan (1879) 36 Phila. Leg. Int. 156. It was also held in this case that an allegation that the note was signed upon the express agreement that the maker was not in any way to be liable thereon was not a defense. Nothing is said as to the parol-evidence rule.

Evidence that the note was to be paid in a certain way has been denied admission. In Fuller v. Law (1903) 207 Pa. 101, 56 Atl. 333, it is held not competent for the purchaser of corporate stock, for the unpaid part of the purchase price of which he had given his note, to show a contemporaneous parol agreement that the note was to be paid out of dividends on the stock, and that, if the dividends failed to pay the note, it need not be paid. In an action on a note given by one partner to another upon his purchase of his partner's interest in the partnership, an affidavit of defense that the note had been given upon the understanding and agreement that it should be paid out of the profits arising from the business, and that this was afterwards prevented by the payee filing a bill in equity for the dissolution of the partnership and the appointment of a receiver, was held insufficient in Lee v. Longbottom (1896) 173 Pa. 408, 34 Atl. 436.

One of the joint makers of a note cannot defeat judgment thereon by showing an oral understanding that he was not to be liable unless another joint maker was unable to repay plaintiff a stated sum loaned to a corporation of which the other joint maker was president, and in default of such payment that the first joint maker was not to be liable until the corporation had built a new dam then in contemplation, and had made and floated a bond issue, from the proceeds of which issue the note was to be paid. Second Nat. Bank v. Yeager, supra. Referring to the earlier Pennsylvania cases the court says: "In an action on a promissory note defense may be made by an oral contemporaneous parol agreement providing for payment of the note from a certain fund, or the raising of such fund for payment by means over which the promisor had control; in such case the source of payment must be first exhausted before recourse can be had upon the note. . . . Assuming that the averments were otherwise sufficient, the affidavit does not aver any such fund existed, or that any of the persons had control of the means whereby the funds might be raised. . . . This is not a case of modification by parol. The agreement does more than vary the written instrument, it destroys it." A further defense that the first joint maker was not to be liable in any event except for one fourth of the note was held to be indefinite in substance and not to be considered.

Evidence that the note was not in fact an obligation, as therein indicated, has been denied admission. A husband who has given a note for an amount of money received by his wife from her mother cannot show that the money so received was an advancement, and that it was agreed that the principal should never be returned, but that only interest should be paid. Heydt v. Frey (1888) 10 Sadler, 84, 21 W. N. C. 265, 13 Atl. 475. The maker of a duebill cannot show that he had sold a horse to the payee, which was returned as unsatisfactory, and that the duebill was given as a mere memorandum, not understood to be any settlement or obligation to pay the debt or sum of money mentioned therein, but as an undertaking to furnish the payee with a satisfactory horse in place of the one which had been brought back. Ziegler v. McFarland (1892) 147 Pa. 607, 23 Atl. 1045. Evidence of an oral agreement that the note which was given by one partner to another was executed on the promise of the payee that it would be used simply in the settlement of their partnership account is inadmissible. Wharton v. Douglass (1874) 76 Pa. 273.

A prior or contemporaneous oral agreement that the note was not to be paid until a certain event, or was to be renewed, is incompetent to vary the note. An affidavit of defense which stated that the note was not to be paid until such time as certain corporate stock could be sold advantageously was held not sufficient to prevent a judgment, in Dyott v. Williams (1888) 21 W. N. C. 226. One who has borrowed money and given a note therefor cannot show an express oral agreement that he should use the money in the erection of certain buildings, and that the note would be renewed from time to time until the buildings were sold; that then, and not until then, was the note to be paid. Homewood People's Bank v. Heckert (1903) 207 Pa. 231, 56 Atl. 431. An applicant for life insurance who has given a note for the amount of the premium cannot show an oral agreement that the payment of the note was not to be asked, expected, or demanded until it was possible and convenient for the maker to spare from his business the amount thereof. Clarke v. Allen (1890) 132 Pa. 40, 16 Atl. 1071. In Spanlove v. Westrup (1875) 1 W. N. C. 156, a rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense was made absolute in an action on a promissory note where the affidavit of defense set up that the note was given for the price of certain machinery, and with the verbal agreement that it was to be renewed, and the defendant was not to be called on to pay it until he had sold the machinery, where the affidavit alleged that the defendant had not sold the machinery, but did not aver any diligence in endeavoring to do so. The maker of a note cannot show an oral agreement that the note was to be renewed for a period of three months from maturity. Patton v. Fox (1903) 22 Pa. Super. Ct. 416.

Where a written agreement providing for the giving of a note specifies that the person to whom the note is to be given agrees that, in any proceeding she may institute against her husband for divorce, she will not assign any other reason therefor than the desertion of her by her husband, the maker of the note cannot show, in an action thereon, that the plaintiff was not to receive the note until she procured a divorce from her husband. Irvin v. Irvin (1890) 142 Pa. 271, 21 Atl. 816.

VII. Evidence that the maker was to incur no obligation on the note, or that the note was given for a special purpose.

a. Introduction.

The oral agreements which have been discussed in subdivisions II. and III. of this annotation have been agreements that the note should or should not take effect as a note, or should or should not be paid, according as a contingency named did or did not occur. In other words, the note or the obligation thereof was dependent upon a contingency. The present subdivision is concerned with agreements that the maker was to incur no liability on the bill or note, or that it was delivered for a special purpose, but was not, as it purported to be, an absolute obligation for the payment of money. The distinction between these two classes of agreements is clear. Notwithstanding this, they have been confused; particularly under the Negotiable Instruments Act.

The great majority of cases prior to the Negotiable Instruments Act held that evidence of an oral agreement that the instrument was delivered for a special purpose, or that the maker was to incur no liability thereon, was inadmissible.

b. Rule that evidence is inadmissible.

Agreement that the maker should incur no liability.

Thus it is held that parol evidence of an agreement that the maker of a note should incur no liability thereon, or that it would never have to be paid, cannot be shown.

An oral agreement that the drawer of a draft should be released from liability upon acceptance thereof by the drawee is inadmissible. Wood v. Surrells (1878) 89 Ill. 107; Bright v. Kenefick (1901) 94 Ill. App. 137; Citizens' Bank v. Millett (1898) 103 Ky.

1, 44 L.R.A. 664, 82 Am. St. Rep. 546, 44 S. W. 366; Cummings v. Kent (1886) 44 Ohio St. 92, 58 Am. Rep. 796, 4 N. E. 710; Bryan v. Duff (1895) 12 Wash. 233, 50 Am. St. Rep. 889, 40 Pac. 936.

It was argued in Bryan v. Duff (Wash.) supra, that since the liability of the drawer of the draft grows out of a legal conclusion which is not in writing, to vary or contradict such conclusion is not to vary or contradict a written instrument. In answer to this contention the court says: "In our opinion the liability of the drawer of a bill of exchange or the indorser of a note has become so well established under the rules of the law merchant, and is so well understood, that the person who assumes such liability must be held to have understood the effect thereof, and by his signature to have bound himself in the same manner as he would have done had the conditions been, at the time of such signature, fully written out and signed by him." From this conclusion there is a dissenting opinion by Dunbar, J. See note in 4 A.L.R. 764, as to the admissibility of parol evidence to vary or explain the contract implied from the regular indorsement of a bill or note, in which the right to vary the contract implied by law from the indorsement of a bill or note is fully discussed.

Parol evidence of an agreement that one who signed as surety was not to be held liable is inadmissible. Dendy v. Gamble (1877) 59 Ga. 434; Altman v. Anton (1894) 91 Iowa, 612, 60 N. W. 191; Barnstable Sav. Bank v. Ballou (1876) 119 Mass. 487; Kulenkamp v. Groff (1888) 71 Mich. 675, 1 L.R.A. 594, 15 Am. St. Rep. 283, 40 N. W. 57; Towner v. Lucas (1857) 13 Gratt. (Va.) 705.

A surety on a note cannot show an oral agreement with the payee that the payee should extend to the principal maker such further credit as would enable him to carry on his business, and that he, the payee, would credit in the note all sums the principal maker should pay him until the note was fully paid. Trentman v. Fletcher (1884) 100 Ind. 105.

The plea of a surety, that he signed the note upon the request of the principal maker, and upon the representation made to him by the payee that the note would never be enforced against him, is said to offer no defense to the action, as it involves the absurdity that an oral promise of the payee to the payor, made when a note is executed, not to enforce its payment, destroys the obligation evidenced by a written instrument. Fambro v. Keith (1909) 57 Tex. Civ. App. 302, 122 S. W. 40.

See First Nat. Bank v. Burney (1912) 91 Neb. 269, 136 N. W. 37, set out in SECURITY SAV. BANK v. RHODES (reported herewith) ante, 412.

A distinction must be made between an agreement that the note was to be paid out of the security,—that the maker was not to incur any liability,—and an agreement that he was to be liable only in case of insufficiency of the security. As to those cases, see III. b, supra.

In addition to the foregoing cases there are others dealing with various agreements in which the evidence has been held inadmissible. The maker of a note cannot show an oral agreement with the payee that he was to be liable for only one half of the note. Bailey v. Lankford (1916) 54 Okla. 692, 154 Pac. 572; Ford v. Drake (1912) 46 Mont. 314, 127 Pac. 1019. A statute under which Ford v. Drake was rendered provided that the execution of a contract in writing, whether the law required it to be in writing or not, supersedes all the oral negotiations or stipulations concerning this matter which preceded or accompanied the execution of the instrument. An oral agreement that the maker of a note should be required to pay nothing on it but interest is inadmissible. True v. Shepard (1872) 51 N. H. 501. An oral agreement with one of the three makers of the note that, if he would execute the note and advance a stated sum, he should not be held liable for any other or further amount of said note, apparently was held inadmissible in Ewing v. Clark (1882) 76 Mo. 545. The ground of this decision is not stated in the opinion. The maker of a note cannot show in defense of an action on the note that she had a claim against the payees as administratrix for an amount largely exceeding the amount of the note, and that, being desirous of realizing the amount of the note, applied to the payees for that purpose; that they agreed that, if she would execute the note with security, they would procure for her that sum, and by the time the note matured they would pay her upon the demand she held against them a sum sufficient to pay the note; and, relying upon the agreement, she gave the note, but that they failed to pay her a sum sufficient to meet the note. Miller v. Wells (1867) 46 Ill. 46. Persons interested in the formation of a corporation, who purchase property to be delivered to the corporation when it is organized, and who give their note for the purchase price, cannot show an oral agreement that the note was to have no binding effect against the makers after the corporation has been so organized. Gurney v. Morrison (1895) 12 Wash. 456, 41 Pac. 192. A husband who has executed a joint promissory note secured by a mortgage on his wife's land cannot show an oral agreement to the effect that he was not to incur any personal liability, but would sign the note simply as evidence of his consent to the execution of the note and mortgage by the wife. Jackson v. Jackson (1890) 12 Ky. L. Rep. 388. A surety on a sealed note cannot show an oral agreement that certain property which was then in the hands of the principal debtor should be sold to pay the same, and that the payee should accompany the principal debtor until the property should be sold, and should receive and take the proceeds of the same and apply it in satisfaction thereof. Ellis v. Hamilton (1857) 4 Sneed (Tenn.) 512. The maker of notes, when sued thereon, cannot show that the notes were not given as evidence of an indebtedness, but for the purpose of indicating the interest which the payee had in certain real property. Chapman v. Chapman (1906) 132 Iowa, 5, 109 N. W. 300.

The evidence in this case seems to have gone more to show the facts and circumstances than any specific agreement as to the notes. The decision, however, is placed upon the rule that a prior or contemporaneous oral agreement cannot be shown in evidence to vary the terms of the note. Parol evidence is incompetent to show that a subscription for the building of a church was made under an agreement that it was not to be binding upon the subscriber, but was to be used merely to influence others. Blodgett v. Morrill (1848) 20 Vt. 509.

The facts in the cases holding that the maker or surety cannot show that he was not to be bound on the note present an interesting variety.

In Arthur v. Brown (1912) 91 S. C. 316, 74 S. E. 652, parol evidence is held incompetent to show that a note was to have no force or effect of any kind. The fact that the letter "c" appeared after the signature does not make the testimony competent.

A partner who is settling up the partnership business, and who has possession of property belonging to it, cannot show that a note given by him to one of the partners was given with the understanding that the same was not to be sued on, but was to be deemed a mere memorandum of the amount which should be estimated as the share of the payee on account of the property, in a settlement among the partners. Burnes v. Scott (1886) 117 U. S. 582, 29 L. ed. 991, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865.

The maker of a note cannot show that it was a mere memorandum or receipt for money received by him from the payee, which he was to apply in extinguishment of a judgment against the payee's son. Dickson v. Harris (1883) 60 Iowa, 727, 113 N. W. 335.

The maker of a note cannot show that the note was given as a voucher or receipt for money paid by the payee in pursuance of a partnership agreement, and that it was understood and agreed that the note would be delivered up and canceled on the delivery of a bill of sale of the payee's interest in the partnership. Perkins v. Young (1860) 16 Gray (Mass.) 389.

It cannot be shown that a note payable to a corporation was given to enable the trustees to have an apparent amount of funds in order to obtain a charter, and that it was promised and agreed that the note should be given up after a few years' interest had been paid. Warren Academy v. Starrett (1839) 15 Me. 443.

A plea in an action upon rent notes that, if there was any liability on the notes, it was not that of the maker, but of a named company; that the maker, at the instance of the plaintiff's agent, signed the notes with the distinct understanding that there was no liability on the defendant, but that the signing was simply to satisfy plaintiff that she held the rent notes for the place, it being then and there known to her that the defendant was only to act as agent for the company named, which, at the time of the signing of the notes, was forming, and had not given itself a name; that the maker never used the storehouse as his, but said company at once took possession and used it with full knowledge and consent of the plaintiff, the plaintiff collecting the rent from it, and none from the defendant, and recognizing at all times the fact that the defendant was not liable on the note, but that the company was,— was held bad as an attempt to modify the note by evidence of a prior or contemporaneous parol agreement. Hirsch v. Oliver (1873) 91 Ga. 554, 80 S. E. 354.

Parol evidence is not admissible to show that a draft drawn by one as an individual upon a firm for which he was acting as agent was drawn in accordance with a parol agreement between him and the payee that he should not be bound thereon. Citizens' Bank v. Millett (1898) 103 Ky. 1, 44 L.R.A. 664, 82 Am. St. Rep. 546, 44 S. W. 366.

The makers of notes cannot show that they were executed merely as memoranda to be used by the payee for the purpose of showing a corporation in which the makers were interested how much they had paid out individually for its account. Stewart v. Gardner (1913) 152 Ky. 120, 153 S. W. 3.

An oral agreement that the drawer of a draft, who was the agent of the drawee, should not be held liable upon the draft as drawer, is inadmissible. Farfield v. Hancock (1852) 34 Me. 93.

The maker of a note to a bank, secured by stock of the bank as collateral, cannot show that the plaintiff bank was desirous that he become one of its stockholders and act as one of its directors; that the president of the bank asked him to take stock in it, and agreed to accept his note for the stock, and agreed that the dividends on the stock should be applied to the payment of the interest on the note, and the transaction should be merely colorable; that the stock should never be in reality his, and that neither principal nor interest of the note should ever be demanded of him. Dominion Nat. Bank v. Manning (1899) 60 Kan. 729, 67 Pac. 949.

One who has accepted a transfer of corporate stock and given his note for the purchase price cannot show that the transaction was merely formal, and that there was an oral agreement that the note should never be collected or presented for payment. Western Carolina Bank v. Moore (1905) 138 N. C. 529, 51 S. E. 79.

The maker of a note to a bank cannot show that the bank desired to make a loan to a third person, who had already borrowed from the bank as much as it could loan to any one individual, and that it desired to make the loan in the name of the defendant; that the defendant consented to this on the agreement of the bank that it would not be regarded as any personal obligation of his. German American State Bank v. Watson (1917) 99 Kan. 686, 163 Pac. 637.

The maker of a note cannot show that it was agreed it should be regarded as a memorandum, not an absolute promise, and have the legal effect arising from its terms only upon the collection by the maker of two notes placed in his hands by the payee. McClanaghan v. Hines (1847) 33 S. C. L. (2 Strobb.) 122.

One who has given his note to a payee, cannot show an oral agreement that the payee would not attempt to collect the note from him, but would look solely to the corporation. Pitt v. Little (1910) 58 Wash. 855, 108 Pac. 941.

In Stevens v. Inch (1916) 98 Kan. 806, 158 Pac. 43, upon the sale of a business by one partner to the other, who was unable to pay the purchase price, a note was executed by the purchaser's relatives to the seller. Parol evidence to the effect that the seller stated that the note was a mere form, and agreed with the maker that the debt would be considered the debt of the purchaser, and that she could pay it out of the business of the store, and that, if she were unable to do so, the maker would never be asked to pay the note, was held inadmissible.

One who has given his note to a bank cannot show that it was executed upon the representation of an officer of the bank that the bank was the owner of certain land which it could not carry on its books as assets, and desired the note for the purpose of showing assets at the bank in the place of the land; that the note should not be put in circulation or used for any other purpose. Jackson v. Chemical Nat. Bank (1898) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 46 S. W. 295.

The maker of a note cannot show an oral agreement that it was executed upon the representation of the payee that it was simply intended as a matter of form,—that the maker would not be called upon to pay it. First Nat. Bank v. Foote (1895) 12 Utah, 157, 42 Pac. 205.

The maker of a note given for the amount of a premium on a life insurance policy cannot show an oral agreement that he was to give the agent letters of introduction to prominent people with whom he was acquainted, recommending the policy, and thereby enabling the agent to write insurance, and that, in consideration of such services, the agent promised that he would never have to pay the note. Garneau v. Cohn (1901) 61 Neb. 500, 85 N. W. 531.

One to whom a company is indebted, who has given his note to the owner of the company for the amount of an advancement made by him, cannot show an oral agreement by the owner that he would look to the company for reimbursement, and that the maker would not have to pay his note. Clinton v. Royal (1917) 208 Ill. App. 248.

The president of a corporation who has, for a sufficient consideration, given his individual note for corporate debts, cannot show an oral agreement that the payee would not attempt to collect the note from him, but would look solely to the corporation. Pitt v. Little (1910) 58 Wash. 855, 108 Pac. 941.

The maker of a note cannot show that he was not to be liable thereon, and that the note was to be paid by a third person. Lillie v. Bates (1888) 3 Ohio C. C. 94, 2 Ohio C. D. 54.

The maker of a note for a consideration which passes to a third person cannot show an oral agreement that the third person was to be liable for the payment thereof, and the maker was not to be held. Portland Nat. Bank v. Scott (1891) 20 Or. 421, 26 Pac. 276.

The accommodation maker of a note cannot show an oral agreement with the payee that the party for whose accommodation the note was given should pay it. Wagner v. Kohn (1917) 140 C. C. A. 592, 225 Fed. 718; Bank of California v. Starrett (1920) 110 Wash. 231, 9 A.L.R. 177, 188 Pac. 410; Gerli v. National Mill Supply Co. (1909) 78 N. J. L. 1, 73 Atl. 252, affirmed on opinion below in (1910) 80 N. J. L. 464, 78 Atl. 734.

The accommodation maker of a note cannot show an oral agreement with the payee that the payee would not look to the maker for the payment of the note, or hold him liable thereon, but would look to the accommodated party alone, and to his collateral deposited with the payee for payment. Earle v. Enos (1904) 130 Fed. 467.

The acceptor of a draft for the accommodation of the drawer cannot show an oral agreement with the payee that the acceptor should not be called upon to pay the draft, but that the payee would look to other security which it held. Davis v. Randall (1874) 115 Mass. 547, 15 Am. Rep. 146.

In Portland Nat. Bank v. Scott (1891) 20 Or. 421, 26 Pac. 276, parol evidence is held inadmissible to show an agreement that the payee of a note was to look alone to a party which received the consideration for the payment of the note.

The surety of notes payable to a bank cannot show that, before signing the notes, the bank assured him that they were entirely good and amply secured by collateral; that they wanted him as surety only because of the rule of the bank requiring three names to secure a loan; that he would take no risk by so signing; and that they gave him to understand that the bank would not look to him to pay. Barnstable Sav. Bank v. Ballou (1876) 119 Mass. 487.

And see Union Nat. Bank v. Pirotte (1920) 107 Kan. 573, 193 Pac. 327.

The surety on a note executed to a bank cannot show a contemporaneous oral agreement that the principal maker was to execute to him a mortgage on certain property, and that the bank would look to the mortgage for the debt, and not hold him responsible in any way. Farmers' Bank v. Wickiffe (1909) 131 Ky. 787, 116 S. W. 249.

One selling land for another, who accepts a conveyance of the land, executing to the vendor a note secured by a mortgage for the unpaid part of the purchase price, and then conveys to the purchaser, subject to the mortgage, cannot show an oral agreement that the vendor should look alone to the mortgage security, and not hold him liable on the note. Gillman v. Henry (1881) 53 Wis. 465, 10 N. W. 692.

It has been held that, in a case of a note secured by mortgage, it cannot be shown that the creditor agreed to seek satisfaction solely out of the mortgaged premises. Smith v. McLaughlin (1915) 120 Ark. 366, 179 S. W. 496. Nor that a creditor agreed to protect guarantors against any liability on a note by taking security from the principal debtor. Lompoc Valley Bank v. Stephenson (1909) 156 Cal. 350, 104 Pac. 449.

A wife who has joined with her husband in signing a note given for a claim held against her husband cannot show an oral agreement that she would not be required to pay it. Duty v. Sprinkle (1908) 64 W. Va. 39, 60 S. E. 882.

A wife who, with her husband, has executed a joint and several promissory note, cannot, when sued upon the note, set up an oral agreement that she was not to be held personally liable thereon, but had only signed the note as a member of the community. Hemrich v. Wist (1898) 19 Wash. 516, 53 Pac. 710.

One of two joint makers of a note cannot show an oral agreement that he was not to be liable thereon, but that the note was executed by him for the purpose of allowing the payee to come in under a mortgage previously given by the other joint maker. Tacoma Mill Co. v. Sherwood (1895) 11 Wash. 492, 39 Pac. 977.

One of the joint makers of a note cannot show an oral agreement with the payee that he was not to be personally liable for any amount by reason of his having signed the note, but that the same was to be paid out of the mortgage security. Colbert v. First Nat. Bank (1913) 38 Okla. 391, 133 Pac. 206.

The maker of a note cannot prove an oral agreement that the payee would rely upon a mortgage securing the note alone, and would not assert any personal liability against the maker. McFarland v. Hueners (1920) 96 Or. 579, 190 Pac. 584.

The maker of a note cannot show that it was given in pursuance of a family arrangement, under an agreement that only the interest on the note should be paid, and this only in the event that the payee should need it and call for it during his lifetime. Morse v. Low (1872) 44 Vt. 561.

Where the maker of a promissory note had, prior to the execution of the note, received a sum of money under a condition which might have been a gift or a loan, the giving of a promissory note is conclusive evidence that the parties determined that it should be a loan, and not a gift, and therefore parol evidence is not admissible for the purpose of proving that the parties verbally agreed that the note should not be paid, but should stand only as security for the interest. Hill v. Wilson (1873) L. R. 8 Ch. 888, 42 L. J. Ch. N. S. 817, 29 L. T. N. S. 238, 21 Week. Rep. 757, 24 Eng. Rul. Cas. 502.

The sureties on a note cannot show that they refused to sign it except in consideration of a promise on the part of the payee that he would take from the principal mortgages on real estate sufficient to secure the note and save the sureties harmless. Concord Bank v. Rogers (1844) 16 N. H. 8.

Parol evidence of a prior and contemporaneous agreement is not admissible to show that a note given by a child to a parent was a mere memorandum of an advancement, and not intended as a note. Fennell v. Henry (1881) 70 Ala. 484, 45 Am. Rep. 88; Mason v. Mason (1887) 72 Iowa, 457, 34 N. W. 208; Russell v. Smith (1901) 115 Iowa, 261, 88 N. W. 361. A daughter to whom her father delivered slaves, and who gave her notes, bearing interest, for the estimated value, cannot by parol evidence show that the notes were not to evidence a debt, but merely an advancement. Fennell v. Henry (Ala.) supra.

The maker of a note to his wife's father cannot show that it was executed as a memorandum or evidence of money given by the father to his daughter as an advancement, and that the money was received by the husband in trust for his wife, who was insane. Gerth v. Engler (1887) 71 Iowa, 616, 33 N. W. 131. A son who has given his note for the purchase price of goods purchased at a public sale held by his father cannot show an oral agreement that the note was to be regarded merely as evidence of an advancement. Mason v. Mason (1887) 72 Iowa, 457, 34 N. W. 208. A promissory note held by a father against a son cannot, by parol evidence, be shown to have been evidence of an advancement merely, and not of a debt. Russell v. Smith (Iowa) supra.

But compare with cases relating to the same evidence in VII. c, infra.

Agreement that the note should be surrendered.

Parol evidence is inadmissible to show an agreement that the note would be surrendered to the maker. Bomar v. Rosser (1901) 131 Ala. 215, 31 So. 430; Howard v. Stephens (1874) 52 Ga. 448; Knote v. Bense (1915) 94 Kan. 294, 146 Pac. 363; Warren Academy v. Starrett (1839) 15 Me. 443; Bryant v. Mansfield (1843) 22 Me. 360; Spring v. Lovett (1831) 11 Pick. (Mass.) 417; Tower v. Richardson (1863) 6 Allen (Mass.) 351; Barnard State Bank v. Fesler (1901) 89 Mo. App. 217. See Perkins v. Young (1860) 16 Gray (Mass.) 389.

An answer in an action by an administrator on notes given to him, alleging that the notes were made for the purchase money of certain lands sold by the administrator, and that the maker had a demand against the estate of plaintiff's intestate, and, at the time of the sale, he had a verbal understanding and agreement with the administrator that payment of the notes would not be required, but that he might retain the amount thereof on his claim, presents no defense to the action, since the answer sets up a verbal agreement that is contradictory of the written contract. Bishop v. Dillard (1887) 49 Ark. 285, 5 S. W. 341.

A surety cannot set up an agreement that he was to be liable for only a few days, and then be discharged. Mansfield v. Barber (1877) 59 Ga. 851.

Nor that the payee would take a chattel mortgage from the principal debtor, and the surety would thereupon be released from all liability. Graff v. Fox (1917) 204 Ill. App. 598.

The maker of a note containing, as a part thereof, a mortgage on the maker's chattels, cannot show that the note was executed as a memorandum of the balance due the payee, and that it was agreed that it should be returned to the maker upon the delivery of certain personal property. Knote v. Bense (1915) 94 Kan. 294, 146 Pac. 363.

The maker of a note cannot show that it was executed to the payee, who conveyed land to her under an agreement that, as soon as he should find a purchaser for the land, the note should be surrendered upon her re-conveying the land to him. Bryant v. Mansfield (1843) 22 Me. 360.

The maker of a note cannot show that it was given in a real estate transaction upon a verbal agreement that, upon his giving a deed of the real estate to the payee, the note should be given up. Spring v. Lovett (1831) 11 Pick. (Mass.) 417.

The maker of a note cannot show an oral agreement between himself and the payee that the note should be given up unless the maker should obtain a discharge from all his debts. Tower v. Richardson (1853) 6 Allen (Mass.) 351.

The maker of three notes cannot show that, upon the payment of one, the others were not to be enforced, but were to be returned to him. Barnard State Bank v. Fesler (1901) 89 Mo. App. 217.

Parol evidence of an agreement that the note was given for a sewing machine, and that the plaintiff agreed at the time the note was given that, if the machine did not give satisfaction to the maker's wife, he, the agent, would take it back at any time within six months, the agent saying that his time would soon be out, and that he wanted the note so as to enable him to get his commission for selling the machine. Howard v. Stephens (1874) 52 Ga. 448.

Agreement that the maker should not be called on for payment, or that the note would not be enforced.

Evidence of an oral agreement that the maker would never be called upon to pay the note is inadmissible. Sasser v. McGovern (1912) 11 Ga. App. 88, 74 S. E. 797. An oral agreement that the maker should not be called on to pay the principal so long as he paid interest is inadmissible. Church & Congregation in Second Precinct v. Stetson (1828) 5 Pick. (Mass.) 506.

Nor can the maker show that the payee agreed to look to a third person for payment. Niblack v. Frank (1917) 209 Ill. App. 162; Bank of California v. Starrett (1920) 110 Wash. 231, 9 A.L.R. 177, 188 Pac. 410. See further cases of this class supra, "Agreement that maker should incur no liability."

Evidence of an oral agreement not to sue on the note is inadmissible. Crooker v. Hamilton (1907) 3 Ga. App. 190, 59 S. E. 722.

The maker of a note cannot show that it was given as evidence of the purchase price for a stock of goods which was sold to him under a contract that he should not be bound to pay for the stock until he should work it up and make some money out of the same, but that the payee of the note induced him to give the note under an agreement that he would never bring suit thereon. Withrow v. Wiley (1852) 3 Ind. 379.

A prior or contemporaneous oral agreement not to enforce a note according to its terms cannot be shown. Henry Wood's Sons Co. v. Schaefer (1899) 173 Mass. 448, 73 Am. St. Rep. 305, 53 N. E. 881; First Nat. Bank v. Holmes (1921) 213 Mich. 41, 181 N. W. 46.

In Fambro v. Keith (1909) 57 Tex. Civ. App. 302, 122 S. W. 40, an oral promise of the payee to a surety on the note, that the note would not be enforced against the surety, is held no defense to an action on the note.

Agreement that note was collateral security.

The maker of a note cannot claim that it was collateral security, payable only upon a contingency. Moore v. Prussing (1896) 165 Ill. 319, 46 N. E. 184.

The court in Moore v. Prussing (Ill.) supra, says: "Whilst a person signing a note has a right to prove by parol the capacity in which he signs the paper, and such proof is not an attempt to vary the terms of the written instrument, yet, where the note is accepted as a separate and independent contract, an attempt to vary the terms of the contract by parol is not admissible, and the plea attempting to set up that the note signed was accepted as collateral security could not change the legal effect of the instrument, as a liability would exist according to the terms of the contract, and the attempt to set up such an agreement constituted no defense. As the sole makers of the note, defendants cannot show they only signed as sureties."

The maker of a note cannot show that it was delivered as collateral security for the performance of a parol promise or agreement by the maker. Walker v. Crawford (1870) 56 Ill. 444, 8 Am. Rep. 701.

c. Rule that evidence is admissible.

Some cases take the view that an oral agreement that the note was delivered for a special purpose, or was not to become an obligation, is admissible. An agreement that the note is a mere memorandum, and was never to be an enforceable obligation, but was to be delivered upon certain contingencies, is admissible. Denver Brewing Co. v. Barets (1897) 9 Colo. App. 341, 48 Pac. 834; Schindler v. Muhlheiser (1877) 45 Conn. 153. In some cases in which parol evidence was admissible it amounted to but little more than evidence of the circumstances under which the alleged note was given. Denver Brewing Co. v. Barets (Colo.) supra. In this case the maker of the alleged note proposed to a brewing company that it put up the money to purchase a saloon, and take the promissory note of a prospective purchaser which the maker had in view. To this proposition the brewing company acceded and gave the maker the amount of money required to make the purchase. After its delivery, the brewing company asked him to give a memorandum showing his receipt of the money; thereupon the note was drawn up and signed by him, and left with the brewing company, which agreed to return it on receipt of the note and chattel mortgage of the prospective purchaser of the property. This arrangement was completed, the sale to the prospective purchaser was being carried out, and his note, secured by chattel mortgage, as agreed, was delivered to the brewing company.

The maker of a note may prove that it was given under an arrangement between him and the payee that the payee should convey land to the maker for a certain purpose, and that the note should be executed and delivered, and when the purpose for which the land was conveyed had been accomplished, it should be reconveyed to the payee, and the payee should deliver up the note. Schindler v. Muhlheiser (Conn.) supra.

In other cases the oral agreement admitted in evidence showed that the note was not in fact a note, but was given for some other purpose, and was to be surrendered when the purpose was accomplished.

Thus, in Julliard v. Chaffee (1883) 92 N. Y. 529, the evidence was to the effect that the note was only part of the prior parol arrangement by the terms of which the payees were to advance money in anticipation upon the debts owing by them, and the maker promised that the money so paid should be applied in discharge of those debts, and it was provided that the papers should be returned to the maker when the money was so applied. According to the court, the note did not constitute the agreement, and in this case it was not set out in the complaint as the foundation of the action; it was merely evidence of part of the agreement, and, when relied upon by one party, the other might properly show in defense the whole transaction; and when that was shown, the defense was made out, not by controlling the contract indicated by the writing, but by a collateral agreement with which it was incidentally connected, the execution of which inured as payment of the note in the manner directed by the payees, and upon faith in which the note was given.

In Higgins v. Ridgway (1897) 153 N. Y. 130, 47 N. E. 32, it was held competent for the maker of the note to show an oral agreement that it was delivered upon the express condition that the maker should not be liable thereon.

A duebill may be shown to have been delivered as a mere memorandum, to evidence the amount of money furnished by the obligee to the maker for use in a partnership transaction. Ostrander v. Snyder (1893) 73 Hun, 378, 26 N. Y. Supp. 263.

It was held competent in Clark v. Ducheneau (1903) 26 Utah, 97, 72 Pac. 331, to show that a note was given to secure the performance of an agreement to purchase the stock, and that it was to be surrendered when the stock was delivered.

Parol evidence has been held to show that an absolute promise in writing to pay a certain sum of money was a mere receipt or memorandum to show the amount of an advancement. Storey v. Storey (1914) 131 C. C. A. 269, 214 Fed. 973; Norman v. Norman (1858) 11 Ind. 288; Brook v. Latimer (1890) 44 Kan. 431, 11 L.R.A. 805, 21 Am. St. Rep. 292, 24 Pac. 946; Garner v. Taylor (1900) — Tenn. —, 58 S. W. 758.

But compare with cases relating to the same evidence in VII. b, supra.

The court in Brook v. Latimer (1890) 44 Kan. 431, 11 L.R.A. 805, 21 Am. St. Rep. 292, 24 Pac. 946, says: "We do not deem the admission of evidence tending to show that a promissory note, absolute by its express terms, is a mere evidence of an advancement by a parent to a child, to be a violation of that rule of evidence that forbids a written instrument to be varied or contradicted by parol."

In other cases, while the existence of the note as such is admitted by the case made by the oral evidence, it has been held competent to show that the maker was not to be held liable thereon. Garfield Nat. Bank v. Colwell (1890) 57 Hun, 169, 10 N. Y. Supp. 169; Simmons v. Thompson (1898) 29 App. Div. 559, 51 N. Y. Supp. 1018; Williams v. First Nat. Bank (1899) 45 App. Div. 239, 60 N. Y. Supp. 1105, affirmed in (1901) 167 N. Y. 594, 60 N. E. 1122; Farnum v. Carr (1902) 69 App. Div. 493, 74 N. Y. Supp. 1111.

The purchaser of certain territorial rights in a patent device, who has given his note therefor, may show that the note was given upon the oral agreement of the payee that he, the payee, would obtain advertisements sufficient to pay the note, and that the maker would never be called upon to pay other than from the proceeds of such advertisements. A. H. Andrews & Co. v. Hess (1897) 20 App. Div. 194, 46 N. Y. Supp. 796. This state of facts, according to the court, brings the case fairly within the rule that the delivery of the note having been limited by the conditions upon which the delivery was made, the performance of those conditions was essential to the validity of the note.

The maker of a note may show that the note was merely a formal matter to enable the payee to make a loan to a borrower without criticism, and under an agreement that the maker would incur no personal liability by signing the note, but that the payee would take care of it. Simmons v. Thompson (1898) 29 App. Div. 559, 51 N. Y. Supp. 1018.

An oral agreement that the indorsers of the note should not be held liable for its payment was admitted in Lattimer v. Hill (1876) 8 Hun (N. Y.) 171, on the theory of conditional delivery.

It was held competent in Solenberger v. Gilbert (1890) 86 Va. 778, 11 S. E. 789, to show that notes were delivered only for the purpose of having them discounted, and with the understanding that they were to be renewed.

Even prior to the Negotiable Instruments Act, a prior or contemporaneous agreement was held competent to show that a note was delivered for a special purpose.

Thus, in Oakland Cemetery Asso. v. Lakins (1904) 126 Iowa, 121, 101 N. W. 778, 3 Ann. Cas. 359, an oral agreement that the note was not delivered to the payee as a note or as his property, but that it was simply to be held by him during his lifetime as evidence of and as security for the makers' obligation to pay interest, and that, upon the payee's death, the makers became entitled to the possession of the note, was held admissible. The court says: "Here the delivery was only as security for the main promise, which was in parol, and the note was never delivered otherwise than as security for the fulfilment of this promise." A letter had been written by the payee which bore out the intention of the makers of the note, and the court says that this letter should be construed with the other writings as if a part of the transaction, and that it showed that the entire agreement was not embodied in the writing.

Although the court seems to regard this evidence as showing a conditional delivery, the evidence shows more clearly a delivery for a special purpose.

In other cases in this state the maker of a note has been allowed to show an oral agreement that the note was in reality only an obligation to pay interest, and not to pay the principal. Marsh v. Chown (1898) 104 Iowa, 556, 73 N. W. 1046; Ball v. James (1916) 176 Iowa, 647, 158 N. W. 684; but neither of these cases based the decision upon conditional delivery. In Marsh v. Chown the amount of money which was stated in the note as the principal thereof had been advanced by the payee to the maker, who was his child, and the oral evidence was admitted on the theory that the consideration of the note would always be inquired into. In Ball v. James a verbal agreement on the part of the payee of the note that she would leave the money to the maker at her death, and that the principal would never have to be paid, was admitted on the theory that it did not purport to vary the terms of the note, but was merely evidence of the inducement to the execution of the note.

But see Chapman v. Chapman (1906) 132 Iowa, 5, 109 N. W. 300, supra, VII. b.

The Negotiable Instruments Act expressly provides that evidence is admissible to show a delivery for a special purpose.

The maker of a note given to a corporation was permitted to show in an action by the corporation that he executed and delivered the note for the sole purpose of enabling the corporation to place the same with a bank as collateral security for money which it borrowed in order to enable it to transact business for which it was organized, until it should come into possession of ample funds of its own. That the note had been so pledged, but that the corporation had paid its obligation to the bank, and had come again in the possession of the note (Divine v. Western Slope Fruit Growers Asso. (1915) 27 Colo. App. 368, 149 Pac. 841); but whether this was on the theory that it was a conditional delivery, or that it was delivered for a special purpose, is not made clear.

The makers of a note may show that it was executed for the special purpose of furnishing cash bail for one accused of crime, and upon the condition that the note would be returned when the bail was exonerated. First Nat. Bank v. Miller (1920) — N. D. —, 179 N. W. 997.

The maker of a note may show that he was engaged to marry the daughter of the payee, and that the payee, intending to make a wedding present to his daughter of $500, deposited this amount in an account in the joint names of his daughter and her intended husband; and that, being desirous of some security from the husband against his withdrawing the money and not marrying the daughter, the note in suit was executed; and that, on the day after the marriage, he asked the payee for the note, and was advised by him that he had torn it up. Lopato v. Hayman (1920) — R. I. —, 111 Atl. 529.

Although the Negotiable Instruments Law, expressly providing that it may be shown that a note was delivered for a specified purpose, had been enacted in Michigan long prior to the giving of the note involved in First Nat. Bank v. Holmes (1921) 213 Mich. 41, 181 N. W. 46, there is an implication in that case that it cannot be shown that a note was delivered for a special purpose. No reference is made to the Negotiable Instruments Law, nor is there any clear statement to the above effect.

The delivery in Herron v. Brinton

(1920) 188 Iowa, 60, 175 N. W. 881, supra, seems to have been for a special purpose rather than a conditional delivery.

Although nothing is said in Gwinn v. Ford (1915) 85 Wash. 571, 148 Pac. 891, s. c. on rehearing in (1916) 91 Wash. 498, 158 Pac. 536, as to the Negotiable Instruments Law, the notes involved in that case were given after the law went into effect in that state. It is there held that an allegation in an answer to the effect "that it was distinctly understood and agreed by and between these defendants and the said Rice that the said note was to be used by said Rice for the purpose of raising the necessary money to finance the transaction above described, and to purchase a certain amount of the stock of the Jexite Powder Company at 35 cents per share," was to negative the idea of a conditional delivery.

Storey v. Storey (1914) 131 C. C. A. 269, 214 Fed. 973, supra, was decided under the Negotiable Instruments Act, but the provisions of that act are stated to be merely a codification of the general law in that respect, as established by a preponderance of sound authority. The court here takes the view that there was no delivery of the note for the purpose of giving effect to it as a contract, because the manual transfer was for a special purpose, and not for the purpose of transferring the property in the instrument.

In Drovers' Cattle, Loan, & Invest. Co. v. McGraw (1921) — Minn. —, 184 N. W. 365, it was held competent for the purchaser of cattle, who had given her note for a balance due on the purchase price, to prove by parol that, notwithstanding the delivery of the note, it was intended by the parties that it would become operative as a contract only in case she failed to live up to the terms of her contract to care for and return the cattle for sale in the fall, and apply the proceeds thereof in extinguishment of the contract. According to the court, the note was delivered and held in the nature of a pledge that the agreement would be performed. The decision, however, in this case, is not based, at least, not expressly based, upon delivery for a special purpose, nor is the Negotiable Instruments Law referred to.

STATE OF KANSAS

v.

GEORGE TOLIVER, Appt.

Kansas Supreme Court — November 12, 1921.

(109 Kan. 660, 202 Pac. 99.)

Indictment — burglary — failure to name owner.

1. An information for burglary may be sufficient as against a motion to quash on the ground no offense is stated, although the name of the known owner of the building be not disclosed.

[See note on this question beginning on page 510.]

— motion to quash — effect.

2. A motion to quash an information for burglary, on the ground the facts stated do not constitute a public offense, raises the question whether all ingredients of the crime are present, but does not raise the question whether details, not of the substance of the offense, but which good pleading requires should be stated, are present.

Headnotes by BURCH, J.

Burglary — who is owner.

3. Under the statute of this state making it burglary to break and enter in the nighttime, with felonious intent, a store in which goods are kept, the essence of the crime is violation of the security of the occupancy. The person injured is the one who occupies the store by keeping goods there, and ownership of the store is properly laid in such occupant.

Indictment — burglary — identifying owner.

4. In an information for burglary of a store and for larceny committed in connection with the burglary, ownership of the store and goods was alleged to be in "the Durnil Dry Goods Company." Held, it was not necessary further to identify the owner by stating whether the company were a corporation or a partnership.

[See 4 R. C. L. 434.]

Appeal — omission of monitory instruction — effect.

5. Under the facts stated in the opinion, it was not prejudicial error to omit to give, upon request, a monitory instruction concerning the individual responsibility of each juror in determining what the verdict should be.

— instruction that crime is established.

6. The proceedings considered, and held, the court did not err in instructing the jury that the crime of burglary had been established beyond dispute, and that the only issue for their consideration was whether or not the defendant participated in the burglary as a principal.

— absence of error.

7. Various assignments of error considered, and held to be without substantial merit.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Wilson County (Brown, J.) convicting him of burglary and larceny. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. F. S. Jackson and E. D. Mikesell, for appellant:

Failure of the information to allege the ownership of the building burglarized, and the failure to allege the character of the Durnil Dry Goods Company as to whether it was a corporation or a copartnership, and, if it was a copartnership, the failure to allege the names of the partners, was fatally defective.

Burch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted of burglary and larceny, and appeals.

The charging parts of the information read as follows:

" . . . Did then and there unlawfully, wrongfully, wilfully, feloniously, and burglariously break and enter in the nighttime a store building in the city of Neodesha, Wilson county, Kan., occupied and used by the Durnil Dry Goods Company as a retail store, where were kept and offered for sale, goods, wares, and merchandise, with intent to take, steal, and carry away therefrom goods, wares, and merchandise belonging to the said the Durnil Dry Goods Company. . . .

"Did then and there unlawfully, wrongfully, and feloniously, take, steal, and carry away from a store building situated in the city of Neodesha, Wilson county, Kan., and occupied by the Durnil Dry Goods Company as a retail store, goods, wares, and merchandise. . . .

"All being of the goods, wares, merchandise, and chattels of the said the Durnil Dry Goods Company. . . ."

A motion to quash the information, on the sole ground it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, was made and overruled. It is contended the court erred in overruling the motion, because ownership of the building burglarized was not stated, and because the nature of the organization or association called the Durnil Dry Goods Company was not stated.

The statutes defining the crimes charged read as follows:

"Every person who shall be convicted of breaking and entering in the nighttime . . . any . . . store . . . in which there shall be at the time some human being, or any goods, wares, or merchandise, or other valuable thing kept or deposited, . . . with the intent to steal or commit any felony therein, shall on conviction be adjudged guilty of burglary in the second degree."

"If any person in committing burglary shall also commit a larceny, he may be prosecuted for both offenses in the same count, or in separate counts of the same indictment; and on conviction of such burglary and larceny, shall be punished by confinement and hard labor, in addition to the punishment hereinbefore prescribed for the burglary, not exceeding five years."

Gen. Stat. 1915, §§ 3436, 3440.

An information may be defective because some element of the crime attempted to be charged is omitted. Pleading to such an information, and going to trial upon it waive nothing. Should a verdict of guilty be returned, judgment may be arrested on motion of the defendant, or on the court's own motion, because the information did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense. An information may be defective for lack of details which are not of the substance of the offense, but which good pleading requires should be stated. Such defects may be waived, and they are waived, unless the information be challenged in due time by a motion to quash which points out the particular insufficiencies. In this instance every element of the crimes defined by the statutes appears in the information, ^{Indictment—}and the motion to ^{motion to quash}quash, which specified no defect except failure to state a public offense, was properly overruled. ^{—effect.}

The defendant very earnestly insists that, under the authorities, including decisions of this court, the information was fatally defective because ownership of the store was not stated. In the case of State v. Fockler, 22 Kan. 542, the store burglarized was described in the information as follows: "A certain store situated on the north end of lot No. 5, in block number seventeen (17), in Witherell's addition to the town (now the city) of Osage City, in the county and state aforesaid." 22 Kan. 542.

In the opinion it was said: "We think the name of the owner of the 'store' should have been stated in the information. We think the authorities are uniform in holding that in burglary the name of the owner of the building must be given in the charge, if known, and, if not known, then that fact must be set out." 22 Kan. 543.

In framing the syllabus, however, the court was much more reserved. The syllabus reads: "A criminal information which charges the commission of burglary by the breaking and entering into a certain store building in the nighttime with intent to steal, but which does not state or show who the owner of the building was, or whether it was owned or possessed by any person or not, is not sufficient." 22 Kan. 542.

An examination of the decided case will disclose that the word "owner" does not of necessity mean owner at all. Generally the term refers to occupancy or possession at the time of the burglary, and it may apply to one who has wrongful possession as against the owner. If ownership be unknown, it need not be stated; if it be in several, it is enough to name one (Gen. Stat. 1915, § 8020 [Code Crim. Proc. § 106]); and, so far as legal title is concerned, a man may be guilty of burglarizing his own house. What, then, is the basis of the requirement, said to be imperative in a multitude of decisions, that ownership of the building burglarized must be stated in the indictment or information?

A full account of the law of burglary has not yet been written. Pollock and Maitland were unable to trace its genesis (2 Hist. Eng. Law, p. 493), and Holdsworth leaves the course of its development incompletely sketched (3 Hist. Eng. Law, p. 292). When Britton wrote, burglary was beginning to be something different from the ancient hamsoken or housebreaking: "Let inquiry also be made of burglars. Such we hold to be all those who feloniously in time of peace break churches, or the houses of others, or the walls or gates of our cities or boroughs. Infants under age, and poor people, who through hunger enter the house for victuals under the value of twelve pence, are excepted; as are also idiots and madmen, and others, who are incapable of felony; and those who enter into any tenement of seisin in respect of some right which they think they have are not held to be burglars. The punishment of such felons is death." Book 1, chap. 11, Nichol's Translation, p. 36.

When Coke wrote, common-law burglary was practically limited to nighttime depredations on mansion houses:

"A burglar (or the person that committeth burglary) is by the common law a felon, that in the night breaketh and entereth into a mansion house of another, of intent to kill some reasonable creature, or to commit some other felony within the same, whether his felonious intent be executed or not. . . .

"The word in the indictment or appeals is 'noctanter.' . . .

"The indictment saith, domous mansionalis, a mansion or dwelling house."

3 Inst. pp. 63, 64.

The approximate time when the word "noctanter" became indispensable to an indictment for burglary has not been ascertained. The disposition to restrict burglary to mansion houses led Coke to explain burglary of a church by saying a church is the mansion house of Almighty God.

Hale quotes Spelman's definition of burglary, which recognizes breaking of churches and gates and walls of towns, and quotes Coke's definition, but confines his text to what may be regarded as a mansion house: 1 Hist. P. C. pp. 549, 556. This phase of the development of the law of burglary is described by Hawkins as follows:

"It seems to be the current opinion at this day that it can be committed only in a dwelling house, and that the indictment for it must necessarily allege the fact in domo mansionali.

"And Sir Edward Coke seems to say that the breaking a church, etc., is therefore burglary, because the church is the mansion house of God. But I can find nothing in the more ancient authors to countenance this nicety; for the general tenor of the old books seems to be that burglary may be committed in breaking houses, or churches, or the walls or gates of a town. And Staunforde and Anderson mention precedents of indictment of burglary 'in domo' without adding 'mansionali' However, the constant course of late precedents and opinions makes it certainly very dangerous, if not an incurable fault, to omit the word mansionalis in an indictment of burglary in a house; and therefore, without question, it ought always to be inserted where the truth of the case will bear it. But surely it cannot be necessary or proper to have any such word in an indictment of burglary in a church, which, by all books above cited, seems to be taken as a distinct burglary from that in a house."

1 Hawk. P. C. chap. 17, §§ 16, 17.

As Coke indicated, it was not necessary that the felonious intent accompanying breaking and entering be accomplished, and the essence of the crime consisted in violating the security of the habitation. When statutes made invasion of places other than dwelling houses burglary, the essence of the crime consisted in violating the security of the occupancy or possession.

Burglary—
who is owner.

Side by side with the substantive law of burglary, and perhaps to an extent dominating it, grew the system of pleading. In this field the legal mind refined with luxuriant subtlety, and some doctrines including that of certainty, assumed such extravagant importance that they are astonishing to the practical intelligence of to-day. Expansion of the notion of certainty in criminal pleading is apparent in the following quotation from Hawkins: "It seems to be taken as ground in many books that regularly the persons offended, as well as the defendant, ought to be certainly described in every indictment." P. C. book 2, chap. 25, § 71.

Hawkins's authorities, except the case from Coke, are not immediately available. Crystalization of rule is indicated by the decision in that case: "A Third Exception. — Because the indictment is 'Quod felonice furatus fuit quandam peciam panni linei cujusdam Antho. Nixon præd' draper, ad valentiam,' etc., and doth not say, 'De bonis et catallis cujusdam Anthonii Nixon,' as the common form of the precedents are, and therefore ill; for an indictment ought to be certain to every intent, without any intendment to the contrary; and here it may be that this piece of linen was not the goods and chattels of Anthony Nixon at the time of his taking of them, but by him let out, or delivered, or pledged to another; and it ought to have been shown whose bona et catalla they were; and it ought not to vary from all other precedents. And the court held it to be a material exception, for the reasons aforesaid; and for that cause the indictment was discharged by the whole court." Long's Case, Cro. Eliz. p. 490, 78 Eng. Reprint, 740.

Chitty cites many authorities in support of the rule that, when the name of the person injured is known, it is fatal to omit the name from the indictment (1 Crim. Law, p. 213), and the rule extended to indictments for burglary. Thus East says: "It is necessary to ascertain to whom the mansion belongs, and to state that with accuracy in the indictment. And here it is to be lamented that the same rule does not prevail in this case as in arson, which is considered as an offense against the actual possessor by whatever title he may hold the possession. But in burglary the rule is much more complex; the ownership being neither referable altogether to the legal title, nor to the possession, but partaking sometimes of one, sometimes of the other, as well as of both." 2 P. C. p. 499.

Now, in order that a mansion house should be such, it was essential that somebody should bear to it the relation indicated by the flexible term "owner," and it was essential to burglary that such owner be some one other than the person making the hostile incursion. Definition of the crime, however, stopped with saying the dwelling house "of another." While ownership was in a sense an ingredient of the offense, it was always sufficient that it be vested in anyone except the intruder. It was never material that the owner be any particular person or have any specific name or addition. Except for the tyranny of the rule of pleading, burglary under the statute of this state would be made out in an information in the terms of the information in the Fockler Case (State v. Fockler, 22 Kan. 542), or in an information which merely charged that the locus in quo was owned by a person other than the defendant. The purpose of the rule of pleading requiring the name of the person offended to be stated was merely identification, albeit identification "certain to every intent." The result is the requirement that the name of the person injured by burglary be stated, in order fully to apprise the defendant of the accusation against him, is one thing, while the requirement that the name of the person injured be stated, not as a descriptive circumstance, but as a substantive part of the offense itself, is quite another thing, and the court holds an information for burglary may be sufficient as against er of the building burglarized be not disclosed.

The statute makes it burglary to break and enter a store in which goods are kept. In the present case it was alleged the breaking and entering were done unlawfully, wrongfully, feloniously, and burglariously. That was sufficient to apprise the defendant the store did not belong to him. It was alleged the building was occupied and used by the Durnil Dry Goods Company as a retail store where goods, wares, and merchandise were kept for sale. The crime being one against security of possession, the criterion of ownership for the purpose of pleading burglary is not legal title, but occupancy or possession. 9 C. J. 1044. The person injured is the one who occupies the store by keeping goods there. The Code of Criminal Procedure requires that an information state the facts in plain and concise language (Gen. Stat. 1915, § 8017 [Code Crim. Proc. 103]), and the plain statement of the facts in the information under consideration fully identified the "owner" of the store.

It is said the description of the owner of the store and goods was bad, because the word "company" was used without designating its character. In the case of State v. Suppe, 60 Kan. 566, 57 Pac. 106, the syllabus reads as follows: "An information alleged that the defendant knowingly and feloniously received into his possession personal property which had been stolen from the Carterville Mercantile Company, without averring whether said company was a corporation, joint-stock company, or partnership. Held, that the court erred in overruling a motion to quash the information." ¶ 1.

The opinion expounded the doctrine that a defendant should be apprised of the exact charge against him, to enable him to prepare his defense, and to protect him from further prosecution. It was said a statement of the ownership of property is essential to such ex-

Indictment——burglary—failure to name owner. a motion to quash on the ground no offense is stated, although the name of the known ownactness, and because the Carterville Mercantile Company, although bearing a name appropriate to corporate existence, might be a partnership, and title might be in the individual partners, the information did not state a public offense. The conclusion that the information did not state a public offense at all was unsound, for reasons which have been indicated. A conclusion that the information was defective for want of certainty, in describing the owner would be justified by all the authorities which have perpetuated the medievalism of the common-law system of criminal jurisprudence. The writer does not join in recognition of the supremacy of those authorities, and the court declines to extend their reasoning to burglary and to larceny committed in connection with burglary.

The Suppe Case was decided in 1899. In the year 1900, in a case involving a bond given by "the Boyden Abstract Company," the court delivered itself as follows: "It purports upon its face to be the bond of a corporation. The decisions are uniformly to the effect that institutions with names of a character like unto that of the concern in question will be understood to be corporations, in the absence of contrary knowledge. The name 'The Thomas Harrow Company' fairly imports a corporation. Seymour v. Thomas Harrow Co. 81 Ala. 250, 1 So. 45. The name 'The Muskingum Manufacturing Company' implies a corporation. Harris v. Muskingum Mfg. Co. 4 Blackf. 267, 29 Am. Dec. 372. The name 'The Cicero Hygiene Draining Company' denotes a corporation. Cicero Hygiene Draining Co. v. Craighead, 28 Ind. 274. So also does the name 'The Indianapolis Sun Company.' Indianapolis Sun Co. v. Horrell, 53 Ind. 527." Allen v. Hopkins, 62 Kan. 175, 187, 61 Pac. 754.

Therefore the name "the Durnil Dry Goods Company" imported an incorporated body. The defendant was authorized to frame his defense accordingly, and the record would have protected him from subsequent prosecution accordingly. The weight of authority is that, in charging burglary of corporate property, it is not necessary to allege incorporation (note in 12 Ann. Cas. 683), and the same rule should apply to larceny committed in connection with burglary.

burglary—
identifying owner.

There is another view. One of the most common applications of the word "company" is to an association of persons for business purposes. Usually companies are either corporations or partnerships. If the association be incorporated, the corporate entity will hold title to its property. If the association be a partnership, the partners will hold title. The partners will necessarily be those, and only those, who compose the named company; and their individual names are in fact of no more practical consequence to a defendant charged with burglary than the names of incorporators would be. The precise state of the legal title to the property is not a matter of concern to him. Naming the owner in the information serves no purpose except to identify the property, and, whatever the composition of the Durnil Dry Goods Company, that purpose was sufficiently accomplished, under any rational conception of the administration of justice, by naming it as owner.

The Durnil Dry Goods Company was a corporation. Evidence of the fact was not disputed, and ownership of the store and goods was not disputed. The proceedings at the trial disclosed that the asserted imperfection in the information did not embarrass the defendant with respect to the merits of the case, and no substantial right of the defendant was in fact prejudiced. Therefore the judgment may not be reversed because the information was not quashed. Gen. Stat. 1915, §§ 8024, 8215 (Code Crim. Proc. §§ 110, 293).

The defendant requested an instruction concerning the individual responsibility of each juror in determining what the verdict should be, and none was given. The case of State v. Witt, 34 Kan. 488, 8 Pac. 769, is relied on as establishing the principle that such an instruction must be given in a criminal case if requested. The offense charged in the Witt Case was capital, the proof was wholly circumstantial, and the decision was predicated on those facts. In this instance burglary and larceny were proved beyond controversy. The defendant's connection with the crimes was proved directly by the testimony of his confederates, who were abundantly corroborated, and by proof of incriminating statements and conduct of the defendant himself. Therefore need for the monitory instruction is not apparent.

Appeal—omission of monitory instruction—effect.

The defendant polled the jury after the verdict was returned, and each juror signified that the verdict was his verdict and that he was satisfied with it. Polling the jury subserved no purpose except to test the genuineness of each juror's concurrence in the verdict. Under these circumstances, failure to give the instruction did not constitute prejudicial error.

The court gave the following instruction; "That there was a burglary committed in violation of the statute above quoted on the night of the 25th of September, 1919, at the store of the Durnil Dry Goods Company at Neodesha, Wilson county, Kansas, has been established by the evidence in this cause beyond dispute. So that the only issue for your consideration is whether or not the defendant, George Toliver, participated in said burglary in such manner as to be guilty as a principal in said burglary."

The defendant argues that he placed the commission of burglary in issue by his plea of not guilty, and the issue of fact thus raised could not be taken from the jury and determined by the court. The case of State v. Jackson, 42 Kan.

384, 22 Pac. 427, is cited in support of the argument. The syllabus reads as follows: "In a criminal prosecution, where it is necessary for the maintenance of the action that a certain fact should be shown, and such fact is disputed by the defendant, both by his plea of not guilty and during the trial by his evidence, and evidence is introduced with reference to such fact, but the evidence introduced does not clearly, unquestionably, directly, and conclusively prove the fact, it is error for the trial court to take the question with reference to such fact away from the jury and to decide it itself." 42 Kan. 384.

In this instance the defendant did not dispute burglary, except by his plea, and the evidence introduced directly and conclusively proved the crime. It was proved directly by the burglars themselves, and their testimony was corroborated, not merely by circumstances, but by other convincing evidence. The sole fact controverted at the trial was whether or not the defendant had guilty connection with the active participants, and the instruction given was doubtless prompted by the following language, found in the opinion in the cited case: "In criminal cases it is never competent for the court to take a question of fact away from the jury and to decide it itself. Of course, a necessary fact may in some cases not be a question of fact; for the fact itself might be admitted by the parties, or it might not be disputed, and the entire and uncontradicted evidence in the case might clearly, unquestionably, conclusively, and directly prove the same. In such a case there might not be any question of fact to be decided." 42 Kan. 386.

Since no ingenuity, or even perversity of mind, could find a basis for disputing burglary, it was not error to give the instruction.

—instruction that crime is established.

There is nothing else of importance in the case. A captured telegram to the defendant from one of his confederates, and testimony relating to it, were properly received in evidence. The corporate character of the dry goods company was properly proved. Ownership of the building and goods and the value of the goods were sufficiently established. The testimony of the defendant's accomplices relating to his participation in the burglary and larceny was well corroborated. A requested instruction appropriate to a case depending on circumstantial evidence was inapt. Objections to various instructions given are without substantial merit.

—absence of error.

The verdict was sustained by the evidence, and the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Necessity of naming owner of building in indictment or information for burglary.

- I. Scope of note, 510.
- II. Majority view, 510.
- III. Minority view, 511.

I. Scope of note.

This annotation is confined specifically to the necessity of alleging in an indictment or information for burglary the ownership of a building entered. The sufficiency of such an allegation, and the evidence by which it must be supported, are excluded from consideration.

II. Majority view.

By the great weight of authority an indictment or information for burglary must allege directly the ownership of the building entered.

If the ownership of the building is unknown that fact must be alleged. State v. Morrissey (Iowa) supra; State v. Davis (Mo.) supra.

The purpose of the requirement has been said to be to fix the identity of the building entered. State v. Jelinek (1895) 95 Iowa, 420, 64 N. W. 259.

In State v. Trapp (S. C.) supra, a further reason for the rule was advanced, viz., "for the purpose of showing on the record that the house alleged to have been broken into was not a dwelling house of the accused, inasmuch as one cannot commit the offense of burglary by breaking into his own house." See to the same effect Adams v. State (1915) 13 Ala. App. 330, 69 So. 357. The reason last stated would seem to be more convincing, since the building may be identified with certainty without an averment of ownership (see infra, III.) and moreover it has been held that the allegation of ownership must be positive in form, and not merely by way of description. Davis v. State (1906) 51 Fla. 37, 40 So. 179, wherein the court held to be insufficient for want of an allegation of ownership, an indictment charging the breaking and entry of "that certain building commonly known as and called the storehouse of one B. F. Pope."

III. Minority view.

In several jurisdictions it is held that if an indictment or information for burglary sufficiently identifies the building entered, an allegation of ownership is not necessary. State v. Clifton (1878) 30 La. Ann. 951; State v. Mish (1907) 36 Mont. 168, 122 Am. St. Rep. 343, 92 Pac. 459; State v. Wilson (1915) 36 S. D. 416, 155 N. W. 186. And see the reported case (STATE v. TOLIVER, ante, 502) which overrules State v. Fockler (1879) 22 Kan. 542.

In State v. Clifton (La.) supra, it was said: "He objects that the information does not state the ownership of the dwelling house. This was not necessary, nor of the essence of the charge. The dwelling house was sufficiently described as situated at and designated as No. 148 Canal street, and known as the New Orleans Club House and occupied by some person or persons to the district attorney unknown, 'the said person or persons being lawfully therein at the time.' "

So, the court said in State v. Mish (1907) 36 Mont. 168, 122 Am. St. Rep. 343, 92 Pac. 459, supra: "We hold that the information should negative the idea that the defendant, at the time of entry, had the right to enter, or, in other words, should show that the entry was a trespass. It does not necessarily follow that the ownership of the room or building must be specifically alleged, although, where this is known to the pleader, it would be the safer practice to do so. The name of the person having the right of possession, other than the defendant, may be alleged, or, in the absence of such allegation, terms should be employed indicating that the defendant, at the time of entry, was a trespasser."

In California, a statute provides that "when an offense involves the commission of, or an attempt to commit, a private injury, and is described with sufficient certainty in other respects to identify the act, an erroneous allegation as to the person injured, or intended to be injured, is not material." Under that act an indictment for burglary need not allege the ownership of the building entered if the building is otherwise identified. People v. Price (1904) 143 Cal. 351, 77 Pac. 73; People v. Redman (1919) 39 Cal. App. 566, 179 Pac. 725; People v. Mendoza (1911) 17 Cal. App. 157, 118 Pac. 964. In the case last cited it was said that the ownership of the building was immaterial, except for the purpose of affording a means of its identification; that this was done by alleging it to be a tool house located at Lemoyne street and Marcom avenue, in the city of Los Angeles; that in the absence of proof that there was more than one such building so located, such description was sufficient, and fully apprised the defendant of the house he was charged with feloniously entering; and hence that the allegation of ownership was surplusage. But in People v. Parker (1891)

91 Cal. 91, 27 Pac. 587, it was held that where no other description of the building is given an allegation of ownership is essential. See also People v. Webber (1902) 138 Cal. 145, 70 Pac. 1089, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 698.

In Oregon an indictment for burglary, following the statutory form, which omits an averment of the ownership of the building, is good. State v. Wright (1890) 19 Or. 258, 24 Pac. 229. W. A. S.

BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF LOGAN COUNTY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
JOHN ADLER.

Colorado Supreme Court (In Banc) — December 6, 1920.

(69 Colo. 290, 194 Pac. 621.)

Eminent domain — injury by public improvement — right to damages.

1. An action lies against a county for damages for injuries to property by the construction of a public improvement, although no part of the injured property was taken, under a constitutional provision requiring compensation for property taken or damaged for public use.

[See note on this question beginning on page 516.]

Action — against county — constitutional provision.

2. A constitutional provision that property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without compensation authorizes an action against counties to recover compensation for injuries to property by the construction of public improvements.

[See 4 R. C. L. 199.]

ERROR to the District Court for Logan County (Stephenson, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injury to plaintiff's property by an overflow of water alleged to have been caused by the negligent construction of a bridge. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. T. E. Munson, for plaintiff in error:

A county is not liable in an action for damages based upon negligence, or, in other words, for torts.

Messrs. Coen & Sauter, for defendant in error:

The basic law of the state of Colorado grants to the citizens of the state the privilege and the legal right of maintaining an action for damages which may result as the consequence of the construction of a bridge for the use of the general public, by a county through its proper agents acting in a lawful manner.

There can be a taking, within the constitutional sense, without an actual invasion of the property of the complaining party.

Spokane County*, 27 Wash. 121, 91 Am. St. Rep. 825, 67 Pac. 576.

Teller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff in error, in constructing a bridge across the Platte River, filled up certain of its channels, thereby causing the water in time of flood to back up and overflow lands of the defendant in error. He brought suit to recover damages for the injury caused by such overflow.

A demurrer to the complaint having been overruled, and answer filed, the cause went to trial, and plaintiff had judgment.

Plaintiff in error now contends that the court erred in not sustaining the demurrer to the complaint, and in entering judgment on a verdict for plaintiff, because: First, the county is not liable for a tort; and, second, plaintiff cannot recover under § 15 of article 2 of our Constitution, because this court has held that it applies only to proceedings under the eminent domain act.

Counsel for the defendant in error concede that a county is not liable for the torts of its agents, in the absence of an express statute making it liable. El Paso County v. Bish, 18 Colo. 474, 33 Pac. 184.

They have abandoned the charge of negligence as not necessary to the cause of action, and maintain that an action lies, under said constitutional provision, for the damages suffered, regardless of the question of negligence in the construction of the improvement. They contend, further, that this provision constitutes express authority for an action against a county under the facts of this case.

It being a prerogative of the state to be exempt from coercion by suit, a provision of the fundamental law for compensation in case of damage which is applicable to injuries caused by instrumentalities of the state, or by its agents, and to no other injuries, must be held to except such cases from the exemption. If this be not so, the plain intent of the inhibition is limited, and made, to a considerable extent, ineffective.

On principle this objection would apply to actions to recover for injury by the construction of railroads, or changes of street grades, because, in either case, the authority to take private property for the improvement is derived, either directly or indirectly, from the state. Whether exercised by a city, a county, or a railroad company, the right of eminent domain is exercised under power delegated by the state.

The purpose of such provisions is, as the courts have many times declared, to prevent a property owner from being made to suffer an uncompensated injury, not common to the public, as a result of the construction of a public improvement. Such improvements are frequently made or authorized by counties; and to say that because of that fact damages so suffered cannot be recovered is to deny to the language of the Constitution its obvious import.

This construction, however, in no way changes the rule that a county, as a subdivision of the state, is not ordinarily liable for the torts of its agents. That rule is always subject to the qualification that a county may be made liable by law. Section 15 of article 2 of our Constitution is a consent by the state to the bringing of suits against a county under such circumstances as are disclosed in this case.

The second objection is that a right of recovery claimed under the constitutional provisions mentioned does not exist, because of our decision in North Sterling Irrig. Dist. v. Dickman, 59 Colo. 169, 149 Pac. 97, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 973. The plaintiff there asserted the right under said provision to recover for injuries resulting from seepage; but this court held that the provision "refers and is limited to proceedings in eminent domain, or to cases where injury results by reason of the taking of property in which the abutting owner has an interest. Its purpose was to require compensation to be paid the owner of land taken in such cases, not only for the land actually taken, but for damages to the residue."

It is to be observed that, although in the Dickman Case the damages alleged were claimed because of seepage upon land no part of which had been taken in condemnation proceedings, the statement in the opinion refers only to damages to the residue of lands taken. This would seem to limit the protection afforded by the constitutional provision to property directly concerned in condemnation proceedings.

If the rule announced in that case is to be applied to the determination of this case, defendant in error had no right of action. There was no condemnation proceeding, and if there had been he would not have been a party to it.

The importance of this question justifies, in the mind of the court, a re-examination of the subject, a determination of the scope of the provision, and of the proper construction to be given to the term "damaged," as there used.

As is well known, constitutional provisions prohibiting the taking of private property for public use without compensation have been included in practically all of the state Constitutions. Where a part of a property was taken and the residue suffered a direct physical damage as a result of the taking, such damage was held by many courts to be a "taking," within the meaning of the constitutional provision like that above mentioned. This court so held in Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 120, 2 Pac. 6. But this left a property owner who sustained merely consequential damages from a public improvement without remedy. The injustice of this result was generally recognized.

In 1870 the Illinois Constitution was amended so as to prohibit both the taking and the damaging of private property for public use without compensation. The propriety of the change made in the Illinois Constitution has been recognized by amendments to nearly all the state Constitutions; and doubtless the framers of our Constitution adopted the language under consideration from the Constitution of Illinois.

This section applies to proceedings in eminent domain, and to situations in which such proceedings would be proper; i. e., where condemnation would be necessary were the required property not otherwise acquired.
